There were also reports of violence in southern Iraq, where the British government announced the evacuation of its consulate in Basra, apparently in response to mortar and rocket attacks on the heavily fortified compound. Employees of the consulate were to take cover at a British air base eight miles away or return to London.

Three people were killed just north of Basra when a convoy guarded by private security contractors was targeted by a roadside bomb, a police spokesman said. It was unclear whether the dead were contractors.

October U.S. Death Toll In Iraq Hits 101 (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, October 31, 2006

The American death toll for October climbed past 100, a grim milestone as a White House envoy turned up unexpectedly in Baghdad on Monday following a rough patch in U.S.-Iraqi ties. At least 81 people were killed across Iraq, including 33 in a bombing targeting workers.

A member of the 89th Military Police Brigade was killed in east Baghdad on Monday, and a Marine died in fighting in insurgent-plagued Anbar province the day before, raising to 101 the number of U.S. service members killed in a bloody October, the fourth deadliest month of the war. At least 2,814 American forces have died since the war began in March 2003.

According to an Associated Press count, October has also recorded more Iraqi civilian deaths — 1,170 as of Monday — than any other month since the AP began keeping track in May 2005. The next-highest month was March 2006, when 1,038 Iraqi civilians were killed in the aftermath of the Feb. 22 bombing of an important Shiite shrine in Samarra.

The war and the rising American casualties have produced a huge drag on Republican candidates as the U.S. midterm election approaches. The vote is seen in many cases as a referendum on the war, which has stretched into its 44th month. The Bush administration has invested heavy attention on Iraq in recent weeks, trying to put a new face on the conflict with mixed results.

Upon arriving for an unannounced visit, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley went straight into meetings with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his security chief, Mouwafak al-Rubaie, telling them he "wanted to reinforce some of the things you have heard from our president."

Al-Rubaie told the AP late Monday that Hadley was here to discuss the work of a five-man committee that al-Maliki and Bush agreed to Saturday. Hadley also presented some proposals concerning the training and equipping of Iraqi security forces as well as security plans.

"It was a useful visit," he said, but refused to give any details, saying only that Hadley's meetings were limited to al-Rubaie and al-Maliki.

The White House said Hadley was not on a mission to repair ragged relations, accounts of which it said had been "overblown" by the news media.

"Absolutely not," said Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the National Security Council in Washington. "This is a long-planned trip to get a firsthand report of the situation on the ground from the political, economic and security fronts."

But the timing of the visit argued otherwise.

The ambassador announced that the prime minister agreed to implement a set of timelines, prompting al-Maliki to accuse the White House of infringing on his government's sovereignty and say that he was not consulted.

By week's end, al-Maliki and President Bush held a hastily convened video conference call and agreed to speed the training of Iraqi forces and the return of control over all territory to the Iraqi army.

With American voter support for the war at a low point as the Nov. 7 congressional election approaches, a top aide to al-Maliki said the Iraqi leader was using the GOP's vulnerability on the issue to leverage concessions from the White House — particularly the speedy withdrawal of American forces from Iraqi cities to U.S. bases in the country.

Al-Maliki has said he believes that the continued presence of American forces in Iraq's population centers is partly behind the surge in violence.

The case of a kidnapped American soldier, meanwhile, took a curious turn when a woman claiming to be his mother-in-law said the soldier was married to her daughter, a Baghdad college student, and was with the young woman and her family when hooded gunmen handcuffed him and threw him in the back seat of a white Mercedes last week. The marriage would violate military regulations.

The soldier's disappearance has prompted a massive manhunt in Baghdad, with much of it focused on Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite slum of 2.5 million people in extreme northeastern Baghdad.

The military still had checkpoints surrounding the district Monday when a suspected Sunni insurgent bomber slipped in and set off a bomb among day laborers. There were conflicting reports as to whether the explosion was caused by a suicide bomber or a device concealed amid debris by the roadside. The blast tore through food stalls and kiosks shortly after 6 a.m., killing at least 33 and wounding 59.

Sadr City is a stronghold of the Mahdi Army, a militia loyal to radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. The district has witnessed repeated bomb attacks by suspected al-Qaida fighters in what were seen as attempts to incite Shiite revenge attacks and drag the country into full-blown civil war.

Al-Sadr, in a statement addressed to supporters in Sadr City, warned of unspecified action if the "siege" continues and criticized what he called the silence of politicians over actions by the U.S. military in the district.

"If this siege continues for long, we will resort to actions which I will have no choice but to take, God willing, and when the time is right," he said in the statement, a text of which was obtained by the AP.

Ali Abdul-Ridha, wounded in the head and shoulders, said he was waiting for a job with his brother and about 100 others when he heard the massive explosion and "lost sight of everything."

He said the area had been exposed to attack because U.S. and Iraqi forces had driven into hiding the Mahdi Army fighters who normally police the district.

"That forced Mahdi Army members, who were patrolling the streets, to vanish," Abdul-Ridha, 41, said from his bed in al-Sadr Hospital, his brother lying beside him asleep.

However, Falih Jabar, a 37-year-old father of two boys, blamed the militia for provoking extremists to attack civilians in the district.

"We are poor people just looking to make a living. We have nothing to do with any conflict," said Jabar, who suffered back wounds. "If (the extremists) have problems with the Mahdi Army, they must fight them, not us," he added.

The last major bombing in Sadr City took place Sept. 23 when a bomb hidden in a barrel blew up a kerosene tanker and killed at least 35 people waiting to stock up on fuel for the Muslim holy month of Ramadan.

Elsewhere in the capital Monday, gunmen killed hard-line Sunni academic Essam al-Rawi, head of the University Professors Union, as he was leaving home. At least 156 university professors have been killed since the war began. Hundreds, perhaps thousands, more are believed to have fled to neighboring countries.

Police and security officials throughout Iraq reported that at least 47 other people, many of them police, were killed in sectarian violence or found dead Monday, many of them dumped in the Tigris River and a tributary south of the capital.

The AP count that found a record number of Iraqi deaths in October includes civilians, government officials and police and security forces, and is considered a minimum based on AP reporting. The actual number is likely higher, as many killings go unreported.

US Death Toll In Iraq Tops 100 In October (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Steve Negus

DOJ_NMG_0088881

An announcement by the US military on Monday that a marine had been killed in the western province of Anbar sent US military fatalities in Iraq in October over the 100 mark, making the month the fourth-deadliest for the US military since the 2003 invasion. Ask the expert

Should troops stay in Iraq? Michael Rubin, editor of the Middle East Quarterly, answers your questions

This month's death toll is surpassed only by those of April and November 2004, during the first and second assaults on the Sunni stronghold of Falluja, and in the run-up to the elections at the end of January 2005.

The holy month of Ramadan, which coincided with much of October, traditionally sees an upswing of violence, and US officials have suggested that insurgents may also have stepped up the violence prior to the November 7 US Congressional elections.

US troops have also taken a higher profile role as part of their campaign to secure Baghdad, taking on both Sunni insurgents and Shia militias. At least 42 of this month's deaths happened in or around the capital.

At least another 33 were killed in the western province of Anbar, where cities like Ramadi and Haditha have been centres of guerrilla activity for over two years.

In addition to US forces' higher profile, some insurgent groups are reported to have obtained sophisticated armour-piercing explosives, possibly supplied from Iran. US officers have also said that insurgent snipers have become more effective, and sniper attacks more numerous.

• A bomb blast ripped through a crowd of labourers in a square inBaghdad on Monday, killing 28 people and wounding 60, Iraqi Interior Ministry sources said. The bombing occurred as Shia labourers were lining up for day jobs in a square in Sadr City, a stronghold of radical Shia cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who heads the powerful Mehdi Army militia.

Warner Says Iraqis Need Time To Curb Violence (NVP)

By Tom Holden

Norfolk Virginian Pilot, October 31, 2006

U.S. Sen. John Warner said Monday that Iraqi leaders need more time to contain worsening violence in their country, but that "every single day counts" when measured against the loss of American lives.

Speaking after a political appearance in Virginia Beach, Warner said that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki believes violence can be contained through continued diplomacy and not escalating military force.

"Let's give him that opportunity," said Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Warner touched off an intense debate on Oct. 5 when he said that Iraq was "drifting side-wise" and that Iraq's government "was not living up to, or not able to meet just the fundamental responsibilities of a government."

His comments came amid a barrage of car bombs, kidnappings, murders and military operations that this month claimed 101 American troops, the deadliest month since January 2005, when 107 died.

Last week, a I-Maliki issued a series of complaints, saying at one point he wasn't "America's man in Iraq" after the U.S. ambassador to Iraq revealed changes to American strategy. Al-Maliki said the White House was infringing on his government's sovereignty.

By week's end, al-Maliki and President Bush held a video conference and agreed to speed up the training of Iraqi forces and return control of all territory to the Iraqi army.

Warner said his remarks "started a good deal of very constructive dialogue across America and, most importantly, within the administration."

He praised Bush for calling al-Maliki to straighten out their differences, "so that we have a strong, working relationship with that government. I think it's essential that we keep 'em running, keep 'em up."

Warner has visited Iraq eight times and has become increasingly measured in his assessment of the situation. Asked whether al-Maliki can contain the various factions that now control large portions of some cities, Warner said, "That's the question."

IED-resistant Vehicles Speeding To War Zones (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — The military is rushing armored vehicles with specially designed hulls to Iraq and Afghanistan to limit the damage from roadside bombs, the No. 1 killer of U.S. troops.

The bombs, which the military calls improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, have killed or wounded thousands of troops and shredded conventional military vehicles. The new vehicles have a V-shaped hull, which disperses the force of an explosion and helps keep the vehicle from flipping over.

"It's just going to be the standard for any vehicle on the battlefield over the next 10 years," John Pike, a military analyst at GlobalSecurity.org in Alexandria, Va., said of the V-shaped hull.

Not only are lives at stake, but also millions — and potentially billions — of dollars.

The Pentagon's Joint IED Defeat Organization is spending nearly $3.5 billion this year to combat IEDs. Pentagon records show that since the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq began, 1,074 troops have been killed and 11,513 others wounded by insurgent bombs.

A major Pentagon supplier of V-shaped vehicles is 9-year-old Force Protection of Ladson, S.C. The Pentagon says the number of the company's Buffalo and Cougar V-shaped vehicles in Iraq is classified, but public records show the military has bought almost 300. That compares with more than 35,000 Humvees, the military's main multipurpose vehicle, in Iraq. The Buffalo vehicles cost $750,000 apiece, about five times the cost of an armored Humvee, which is smaller.

Force Protection says nobody inside a Buffalo has been killed in Iraq or Afghanistan despite encountering thousands of IED blasts.

Retired general Montgomery Meigs, head of the anti-IED organization, said the Buffalo's armor and shape make it "a lot more robust than the Humvee."

Foreign companies, many of them in South Africa, have been the leaders in developing the vehicles. Some of the Pentagon's largest contractors are marketing V-shaped vehicles with foreign partners. They include:

•AM General, the maker of the Humvee, is pitching to the Pentagon a V-shaped armored car called the Cobra. It is made by Otokar, a Turkish company, and uses a Humvee drivetrain.

•Oshkosh Truck, which makes many of the military's trucks, has partnered with ADI of Australia to market the Bushmaster armored vehicle.

•Blackwater, a private security firm that protects U.S. diplomats in Iraq, developed is own vehicle, the Grizzly, which it will send to Iraq soon.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican and a member of the Armed Services Committee, pushed the Pentagon to buy the Buffalo and Cougar.

Graham said the Pentagon has acted quickly to deploy the vehicles, without the kind of delays seen in sending body armor and armored Humvees to Iraq.

"This is an example of where (the Pentagon) has gotten it right," Graham said. "They're doing it as fast as they can."

Auditors Want Rules For Iraq Aid (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, October 30, 2006

Federal auditors are recommending that the Iraqi government meet specific milestones of progress to receive any future aid for reconstruction, according to a report released Monday that echoes a message the Bush administration has delivered to Iraqi leaders.

The study, issued by the special inspector general who audits U.S. work in Iraq, also concluded that reconstruction is being blocked by violence, and efforts to empower Iraqis to do more are fraught with problems 3 1/2 years after the U.S. invaded the country.

The Iraqis should "meet concrete milestones and political and economic benchmarks as a condition of future aid," the report recommended. It said U.S. relief and reconstruction aid could be provided through conditional loans and be tied to specific actions by the Iraqi government.

During the past two weeks U.S. officials have pressed the Iraqis to begin to meet milestones of progress, an effort that has revealed rifts in the relationship between the two governments.

Last week Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki complained publicly after U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said the Iraqis had agreed to meet specified benchmarks for progress. Bush later voiced confidence in al-Maliki, but warned that the U.S. will not have "unlimited patience" with the Iraq government's failure to quell sectarian violence.

The strains have surfaced in the run-up to the Nov. 7 elections for control of Congress, a campaign in which voters' dissatisfaction with Bush administration policy in Iraq has become a significant weak point for Republicans.

The quarterly audit report by the inspector general said the "deteriorating security situation across Iraq continues to impede progress," causing construction project delays, increasing costs and preventing repairs to critical power supplies.

The report underscores the persistent problems faced by the Iraqi government as it struggles to rebuild and take control of its own security in the face of a stubborn insurgency and a populace on the brink of civil war.

"The U.S.-funded phase of Iraq's relief and reconstruction has entered its concluding stages," the report said. "The government of Iraq's success in building on the foundation established by the U.S. relief and reconstruction program will now depend in part on (Iraq's) ability to attract more support from other donors and the private sector."

A consistent theme in the audits is that the escalating violence in Baghdad is stalling reconstruction. For example, auditors found that "repairing power lines is nearly impossible because of sniper attacks and death threats to repair crews." As a result, on one day earlier this month there was only enough power to generate a few hours of electricity.

The audit also said corruption continues to exist in a number of the Iraqi government ministries, and that building up a system of inspectors general is the most important initiative to fight such wrongdoing.

It said the Iraqi government must improve its ability to spend and manage its own money on capital projects, or international aid could dry up. The budget available for capital projects is about $6 billion, the audit said.

Auditors Say Shift Of Rebuilding To Iraqis Appears 'Broken Down' (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Ten months into a year-long effort to transfer control of Iraq's reconstruction to the Iraqis, federal auditors say, the government there is spending very little of its own money on projects, while the process for handing off U.S.-funded work "appears to have broken down," according to findings released yesterday.

The fledgling Iraqi government, in power since May, has about $6 billion this year to devote to major rebuilding projects, representing about 20 percent of its overall budget. But auditors with the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction found that beyond paying employee salaries and administrative expenses, only a small amount of money is being spent on actual work. Auditors blamed "bureaucratic resistance within the Ministry of Finance, which traditionally has been slow to provide funds."

Auditors also found fault with the way the Finance Ministry is keeping track of U.S.-built projects as they are handed over to the Iraqis and said some of the U.S. data on the subject are "incomplete or inaccurate."

The findings speak to the difficult path that lies ahead as the United States attempts to turn over a decidedly incomplete reconstruction effort to an Iraqi government that remains beset by corruption and has had huge problems exercising authority amid rising violence.

At the beginning of the year, Inspector General Stuart W. Bowen Jr. labeled 2006 "the year of transition" as the U.S. winds up its dominant role in the reconstruction. But in yesterday's report, his office said the year is already into its fourth quarter and the transition remains "fraught with challenge."

Among the obstacles: a "deteriorating security situation across Iraq," pervasive corruption in Iraqi ministries, and possible problems raising funds from international donors unless the Iraqi government can prove it is willing to spend the money it already has on roads, health clinics, power plants and other much-needed infrastructure.

"I don't think the Iraqi government is prepared to take over the reconstruction," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who has been overseeing the U.S.-led effort as chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee. "But I don't know that continuing to pour our money and manpower into these projects is the answer, either."

The United States has devoted more than $38 billion to relief and reconstruction in Iraq since the 2003 invasion, and yesterday's report does point to some successes. Electric capacity nationwide passed prewar levels in recent months, though in Baghdad it remains lower than before the war. Oil exports, at 1.66 million barrels a day, met Iraqi goals.

Overall, 88 percent of U.S. projects have been completed, with only a small minority yet to begin. Out of the $18 billion reconstruction package Congress passed in November 2003, about three-quarters has been spent.

In some areas, however, results have fallen well short of expectations. Of 142 primary health clinics funded by the United States, just six are operational.

In the past week, Bowen's office has exposed new problems. Auditors found, for instance, that on some of the biggest contracts with major U.S. firms, anywhere from a third to more than half of the costs were administrative overhead.

On Sunday, meanwhile, auditors revealed that thousands of weapons that the United States had provided to Iraqi security forces could not be accounted for. The total number of missing weapons -- including semiautomatic pistols, assault rifles, machine guns and rocket-propelled grenade launchers -- was 14,030, or roughly 4 percent of the weapons the United States has supplied to Iraq since 2003. Auditors also found that spare parts and repair manuals were not available for many other weapons.

Bowen's office is slated to close on Oct. 1 next year. But Collins said yesterday that she is working with members of both parties to keep it open longer so it can continue overseeing the reconstruction. "I think it's a huge mistake to prematurely terminate the special inspector general's office," she said.

The Untracked Guns Of Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

About the last thing the United States ought to be doing in Iraq is funneling weapons into black-market weapons bazaars, as sectarian militias arm themselves for civil war. Yet that is just what Washington may have been doing for the past several years, thanks to an inexplicable decision that standard Pentagon regulations for registering weapons transfers did not apply to the Iraq war.

Of more than 500,000 weapons turned over to the Iraqi Ministries of Defense and Interior since the American invasion — including rocket-propelled grenade launchers, assault rifles, machine guns and sniper rifles — the serial numbers of only 12,128 were properly recorded. Some 370,000 of these weapons, some of which are undoubtedly being used to kill American troops, were paid for by United States taxpayers, under the Orwellian-titled Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund.

This chilling information comes to us from the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, which has distinguished itself as the most vigilant agency monitoring the money spent on the Iraq conflict. The agency, led by a Republican lawyer who once worked in the Bush White House, has previously reported on the contracting lapses and failures of supervision that allowed billions of taxpayer dollars to be wasted instead of being used to rebuild Iraq.

The latest special inspector general's report came in response to a request from Senator John Warner, another conscientious Republican. As chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator Warner wanted to be sure that the Iraqi security ministries had the skills and resources necessary to make good use of the huge quantities of arms that Washington has been turning over to them.

It turns out that the Pentagon not only failed to register the weapons, but also failed to provide the spare parts, repair manuals and maintenance technicians needed to keep them in working order. The agency found that Iraqi security forces are still heavily dependent on Washington's support for the most basic military functions. And with America planning to scale back much of that support over the next year, it is far from clear whether Baghdad is preparing to pick up the slack.

Separately, the inspector general's office also found insecurity so rampant in six Iraqi provinces — five of them in the predominantly Shiite south — that America's joint military and civil reconstruction teams could not operate there effectively.

These findings go a long way toward explaining why Iraq appears to be ever more violent, with no clear plans yet coming from Baghdad or Washington that seem likely to restore a semblance of order.

British Civilians Being Moved From Basra (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

Baghdad — The British government said Monday that it was moving most civilian staff members out of its compound in the southern Iraqi city of Basra because of rocket and mortar attacks by militias.

Officials said the move was temporary. But the decision underscored the fraying security climate in southern Iraq, a largely Shiite Muslim region under the sway of various militias, such as that controlled by anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr.

British officials said some of the employees would be moved to the Basra airport and others would be sent to Kuwait or London.

"In recent weeks the threat from mortar and rocket attacks on our office in Basra has increased. Given the threat to the safety of civilian staff, we have decided temporarily to reduce the number of staff at our compound," the government said in a statement.

A spokesman for the British Foreign Office said the consul general would remain in Basra with a small support staff.

"We will stay in Iraq until the job is done," the government statement said. "We have adapted because we remain committed to the people of Basra and the elected Iraqi government."

The British compound, a former palace, has been staffed by about 200 employees, according to British media reports.

Though it is under heavy guard, it has come under daily attack.

Don't Worry. Just Back Off. (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Go ahead, people, you have your orders from Napoleon Bonaparte, I mean Donald Rumsfeld. "Back off" and "relax." Book a cruise to Chillsville. Don't worry your pretty little heads about the debacle in Iraq, because "it's complicated, it's difficult." Are mere mortals going to be able to get their minds around a problem that even Albert Einstein, I mean Donald Rumsfeld, finds complicated? Let's be realistic here.

We should all thank our lucky stars that "honorable people" are willing to do all this super-advanced thinking for us. Aristotle, I mean Donald Rumsfeld, was kind enough to phrase it that way rather than spell out what he really meant, which was "people who are smarter than you."

I realize that a few news cycles have come and gone since the secretary of defense held that stunning news conference at the Pentagon last week, but it was such a telling moment -- such a revealing glimpse behind the curtain -- that it deserves to remain fresh in our minds, even amid the distracting cacophony of eleventh-hour electioneering. There, in just two words, you have the Bush administration's approach to the war in Iraq. Indeed, you have the Republicans' theory of government:

Could anyone else have summed it up so efficiently? Maybe Tony Soprano, but his vocabulary can't be printed in a family newspaper. The basic style of leadership is the same, though. I'm the boss, so shut up and do as I say.

Republicans who have to face the voters next week, especially those who find themselves trailing badly in the polls, have been going AWOL from Rummy's brigade. Some, such as Maryland senatorial candidate Michael Steele, explicitly disown the Pentagon czar; others avoid mentioning his name and, when pressed, speak of him as if he were some kind of daffy uncle. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) made news Sunday when he ventured that "Donald Rumsfeld is the best thing that's happened to the Pentagon in 25 years." Boehner would be hard-pressed to find professional soldiers who agree with that assessment, but maybe blind loyalty in the face of overwhelming evidence will turn out to be a winning strategy. I have my doubts.

At least Boehner isn't trying to pretend that the disaster in Iraq is all Rummy's fault. Alexander the Great, I mean Donald Rumsfeld, may have authored the mistakes that have cost nearly 3,000 American lives, including more than 100 in October alone -- sending too few troops, disbanding the Iraqi army, failing to plan for an extended occupation, training Iraqi "security forces" that promptly turned into sectarian militias. But George W. Bush, Dick Cheney, Condoleezza Rice and the rest of the Vulcans were with him every step of the way, and the Republican majority in Congress sang hosannas of praise like an amen chorus.

Now that most Americans oppose the war and want to bring the troops home before more young men and women die needless deaths, Republicans can't blame Democrats, because they froze them out of all the decision making.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert's immutable rule -- that any legislation brought to the floor had to be supported by a majority of the Republican caucus -- effectively muffled any concrete expression of the public's growing doubts about the war. What if substantial numbers of Democrats and moderate Republicans, enough to constitute a majority of the House, had questions about Iraq, or about torturing detainees, or about the whole course of this incoherent "war on terror"? Tough.

Back off.

The Republican majority came to Washington claiming a populist mandate but has ended up governing with the same breathtaking arrogance that Genghis Khan, I mean Donald Rumsfeld, let slip the other day. Congress is all about lobbyists, earmarks and pork. Democrats aren't immune to these depredations, of course, but if you aren't allowed to participate in any meaningful decisions, you can't be held responsible.

And at the White House and the Pentagon, fantasy reigns. President Bush famously pledged to stay the course in Iraq even if Laura and Barney the dog are his only supporters. Last week he said U.S. forces constantly change tactics to "stay ahead" of the Iraqi insurgents. Excuse me, but when have we ever been ahead of the insurgency? "We're winning" the war, Bush insists. Excuse me, but could you elaborate? In what sense are we winning in Iraq? Where are you seeing anything that resembles victory?

Silly me. Ordinary Americans just aren't smart enough to think about such things. Thank you, Sir Isaac Newton, I mean Donald Rumsfeld, for reminding us of our patriotic duty: Back off.

Pakistani Attack On Al-Qaida Kills 80 (AP)

By Habibullah Khan

AP, October 31, 2006

Pakistani troops and helicopters firing missiles killed as many as 80 militants training at a religious school used as an al-Qaida training center near the Afghan border, officials said.

Local leaders said all those slain when the school, or madrassa, was destroyed were civilians.

Army spokesman Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan said initial estimates based on intelligence sources on the ground indicated that the attack killed about 80 suspected militants, who appeared to be in their 20s and were from Pakistan and other countries.

"These militants were involved in actions inside Pakistan and probably in Afghanistan," Sultan told The Associated Press.

The bodies of 20 men killed in the attack were lined up in a field near the madrassa, in Chingai village near Khar, the main town in the Bajur tribal district, before an impromptu burial attended by thousands of local people, according to an Associated Press reporter at the scene.

Dozens of villagers sifted through the rubble of the madrassa, shifting blocks of smashed concrete and mud bricks aside to try to find survivors. Some picked up body parts scattered across the area and placed them in plastic bags normally used for fertilizer.

"We heard helicopters flying in and then heard bombs," said one of the villagers, Haji Youssef. "We were all saddened by what we have seen."

Among the dead was Liaquat Hussain, a local Islamic cleric who ran the madrassa, locals said. Several of his aides also died, they said.

The attack came two days after 5,000 pro-Taliban tribesmen held an anti-American rally in the Bajur area near Damadola, a village close to the site of an alleged U.S. missile attack that killed several al-Qaida members and civilians in January.

"We received confirmed intelligence reports that 70-80 militants were hiding in a madrassa used as a terrorist-training facility, which was destroyed by an army strike, led by helicopters," Sultan said.

An Associated Press reporter living in the area said he saw several helicopters hovering near his house early Monday before hearing a series of explosions, apparently caused by missiles being fired into the madrassa compound.

Helicopters fired four to five missiles into the madrassa, Sultan said.

The strike came on the day a peace deal was expected to be signed between Bajur tribal leaders and the military, similar to an accord signed earlier this year in nearby North Waziristan.

"This attack is very strange as we were told Sunday that the peace agreement would be signed today," local lawmaker Mohammed Sadiq said.

Sultan declined to say if an accord was scheduled to be signed Monday, but added that militants cannot hide behind peace deals. He said the purported militants using the madrassa had rejected orders to end their activities.

A senior intelligence official in Bajur also said a local al-Qaida leader, Faqir Mohammed, who led Saturday's rally, was believed to have been inside the madrassa.

It was unclear if Mohammed was among those killed, said the official, who declined to be identified further because he was not authorized to speak to the media.

Siraj ul-Haq, a Cabinet minister from the North West Frontier Province, condemned the attack and announced he would resign from the government in protest.

"The government has launched an attack during the night, which is against Islam and the traditions of the area," ul-Haq told the AP during the funeral. "They (the victims) were not given any warning. This was an unprovoked attack on a madrassa. They were innocent people."

Ul-Haq, who belongs to the powerful Islamic political party, Jamaat-e-Islami, said protests would be staged throughout the northern tribal region on Tuesday to denounce the attack.

Pakistan has been trying to defeat militants along its porous border with Afghanistan since the U.S.-led invasion of that country in 2001 fanned increased terrorist activity on the Pakistan side of the frontier.

Pakistan became a key U.S. ally in its war on terror after the Sept. 11 attacks in the U.S., and has deployed about 80,000 soldiers to flush out Taliban and al-Qaida members hiding in the mountainous frontier tribal region.

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan -- Pakistani helicopter gunships yesterday destroyed a religious school that the military said was fronting as an al Qaeda training camp, killing 80 persons in the country's deadliest military operation targeting terrorism suspects.

Islamic leaders and al Qaeda-linked militants blamed the United States for the air strike and called for nationwide demonstrations to condemn the attack that flattened the school -- known as a madrassa -- and ripped apart those inside. Furious villagers and religious leaders said the pre-dawn missile barrage killed innocent students and teachers.

Among those killed in the attack in the remote northwestern village of Chingai, two miles from the Afghan border, was a cleric who had sheltered militants and was thought to be associated with al Qaeda's deputy leader, Ayman al-Zawahri.

The raid threatens efforts by President Pervez Musharraf to persuade deeply conservative tribesmen to back his government over pro-Taliban and al Qaeda fighters, who have strong support in many semiautonomous regions in northern Pakistan. The planned signing of a peace deal between tribal leaders and the military was canceled yesterday in response to the air strike.

Gen. Musharraf has been under intense pressure, particularly from the United States and Afghanistan, to rein in militant groups, particularly along the porous Pakistan-Afghanistan border, where al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and al-Zawahri are thought to be hiding. The Pakistani leader, as well as Afghan President Hamid Karzai, met with President Bush in Washington last month to address the issue.

Protests were held from the northwestern city of Peshawar to the southern city of Karachi, the largest occurring in Chingai and the Bajur district's main town of Khar, where 2,000 tribesmen and shopkeepers chanted, "Death to Musharraf. Death to Bush."

Fearing unrest, Britain's Prince Charles, who arrived in Pakistan on Sunday for a five-day stay, canceled a visit planned for today to Peshawar.

The raid was launched after the madrassa's leaders, headed by cleric Liaquat Hussain, rejected government warnings to stop using the school as a training camp for terrorists, said army spokesman Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan.

"These militants were involved in actions inside Pakistan and probably in Afghanistan," Gen. Sultan told the Associated Press.

Militant groups in Bajur are thought to ferry fighters, weapons and supplies to Afghanistan to target U.S. forces there and Pakistani soldiers on this side of the ethnic Pashtun majority tribal belt.

Gen. Sultan said 80 persons were killed in the building, which was 100 yards from the nearest house. Local political officials and Islamic leaders corroborated the death toll.

Gen. Sultan denied reports that al-Zawahri was in the area at the time of the attack. "It is all wrong, speculative, and we launched this operation on our own to target a training facility," he said. A Bajur-area intelligence official said word was spreading among residents that al-Zawahri may have been expected at the madrassa, but he said the reports were wrong.

Hussain, the cleric thought to have been a deputy of al-Zawahri, was among those killed, the intelligence official and residents said.

Another al-Zawahri lieutenant, Faqir Mohammed, apparently left the madrassa 30 minutes before the strike, said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the press.

Hours later, Mr. Mohammed addressed 10,000 mourners at a funeral for some of the victims.

"We were peaceful, but the government attacked and killed our innocent people on orders from America," said Mr. Mohammed, who was surrounded by dozens of militants brandishing semiautomatic weapons. "It is an open aggression."

Three funerals were held one after the other in a field near the madrassa, where the remains of at least 50 persons were laid on wooden beds placed side by side in rows and covered with colored blankets.

Villagers walked among the beds and offered prayers. Militants, their faces covered with brown and red scarves, patrolled the crowd.

On Saturday, Mr. Mohammed led a rally of 5,000 Taliban and al Qaeda supporters nearby, during which he denounced the Pakistani and U.S. governments and praised bin Laden.

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Oct. 30 — The Pakistani military said today that it had destroyed a religious school used for training militants in the Bajur tribal area, which straddles the border with Afghanistan. The attack killed at least 80 people, the military said, describing them as militants.

The strike started at about 5 a.m. local time, when helicopter gunships fired missiles into the religious school, known as a madrassa, that was run by a local cleric, Maulvi Liaqut, according to military officials. Ground troops then stormed the compound.

Local news reports said Mr. Liaqut was killed in the attack.

He had once been a member of the defunct militant movement Tehreek Nifaz-e-Shariat Mohammadi, which sent thousands of tribal fighters into Afghanistan to support the Taliban before being banned in 2002 by President Gen. Pervez Musharraf. Mr. Liaqut was accused by the government of harboring local and foreign militants at the school.

"We received confirmed intelligence reports that 70 to 80 militants were hiding in a madrassa used as a terrorist-training facility, which was destroyed by an army strike, led by helicopters," Maj. General Shaukat Sultan, a spokesman for the Pakistani military, told The Associated Press.

He also told reporters that security forces had information that the madrassa was being used for military training, and that the militants had been warned to close down the facility but had not done so.

General Sultan said that no "high value target" was present during the raid, referring to leaders of Al Qaeda or the Taliban. General Sultan also said that no children or women were present inside the madrassa, and he denied that any American or NATO troops were involved in the raid.

"The information that we are receiving so far is that majority of the facility has been destroyed and most of the miscreants present there, they have been killed," he said.

General Sultan said that the madrassa was in an isolated location. "There is no house within about a 100-meter radius of this madrassa," said General Sultan. "As per information that we had, there were no women or children present there," he said.

Pakistani officials dismissed any suggestions that the United States was behind the attack. Tasnim Aslam, a spokesman for Pakistan's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said at a news conference that the attack was not carried out under foreign pressure.

But opposition Islamist parties were quick to denounce the attack and blamed the United States. Qazi Hussain Ahmed, the leader of Jamaat-e-Islami, alleged that innocent children were killed and that the Pakistan Army was covering up for the alleged Americans strike.

"This area is not an area where there can be any training camp," Mr. Ahmed said at a news briefing in Islamabad. "This is actually tantamount to the declaration of war on Pakistan," he said.

After the attack, helicopters were reported hovering over the area. Telecommunication links were also reported to be suspended, according to local news media.

The madrassa was located in the village of Chingai near Khar, the main town in the tribal region of Bajur, one of the semiautonomous tribal areas in northwestern Pakistan that have long been considered safe havens for Taliban and Al Qaeda remnants.

Bajur, which borders Afghan province of Kunar, has a history of troubled militancy. Itwas the scene of a widely unpopular American military strike in January, when al Qaeda's No. 2 leader, Ayman al-Zawahiri, was the target.

As it happened, Mr. Zawahiri was not present at the time of that attack, but at least 18 people, mostly civilians, were killed. The incident helped spark nationwide protests against the United States and President Musharraf.

President Musharraf has sent more than 80,000 troops to the tribal areas along the Afghan border to flush out Taliban members.

NATO and Afghan officials have repeatedly said that Taliban fighters who have found refuge in Pakistan are responsible for attacks inside Afghanistan.

Responding to Afghani official accusations that Pakistan was not doing enough, General Sultan said both countries were responsible for curbing cross-border infiltration.

"If at all, there is any kind of infiltration taking place, the responsibility to check the infiltration is not only of Pakistan Army," he said. "The responsibility is of every one else. On the Pakistan side, we need to patrol the borders and on the Afghanistan side, they need to patrol the borders. If anyone is crossing the border, well, it also indicates failing on their part." "And as far as we are concerned, we do not support any such activity," General Sultan said. "And the purpose of the peace agreement is that the militant activity is to be marginalized, not to be supported."

Political fallout became evident in Pakistan soon after today's attack Siraj ul Haq, a senior minister in the provincial cabinet, and Haroon-ur-Rashid, a member of the Parliament, condemned the strike and announced plans to resign, a local television station reported.

Today's attack came two days after thousands of tribal militants staged a protest rally in Bajur and vowed to continue their opposition to the United States and its Pakistani supporters. Faqir Mohammad, a local tribal leader, told the protesters that jihad would continue against America and its allies, according to The A.P., calling supporters of America the enemy.

The attack also threatens to disrupt a peace deal that was expected to be signed today between Bajur tribal leaders and the military. The agreement is meant to control the flow of weapons and militants into Afghanistan. A similar accord was signed with tribal leaders this year in neighboring North Waziristan.

"This attack is very strange, as we were told Sunday that the peace agreement would be signed," Mohammed Sadiq, a local lawmaker, told The A.P.

Pakistan Attack A Setback To Border Peace (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, October 31, 2006

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN

Missiles rained down Monday on what the military said was an Al Qaeda hideout in Bajaur district, a restive tribal area along Pakistan's border with Afghanistan.

The attack, which reportedly killed about 80 people in a madrassah, or religious school, is the second on Bajaur in less than a year. But it has erupted across a vastly different political context, raising concerns about the direction of Pakistan's efforts to contain terrorism in the area.

When missiles last January destroyed a compound in Damadola, killing 13 civilians, the government of Pakistan was still at war with militants in the tribal zones.

Now, however, they are nominally at peace, having signed a controversial accord in North Waziristan that many, including officials in Afghanistan and NATO, have viewed with skepticism.

Under the deal, tribal elders agreed to remove foreign fighters from tribal areas and to stop militants from entering Afghanistan. In return, the Army released hundreds of Taliban militants and returned their weapons, vehicle and equipment.

Monday, the tribal zone's provincial government had been expected to sign a similar accord - now in doubt - in Bajaur, broadening a peace process with Taliban-linked tribesmen.

The timing of the strike raises questions about Pakistan's commitment to such deals, as well as the commitment of its allies across the border. It also threatens to stoke extremism in an area that seemed, somewhat shakily, to be moving toward peace.

Pakistan has worked hard to stave off concerns about its policy of negotiating with terrorists. Some observers say they have failed, and that Monday's strike was a vote of no confidence from American and NATO forces across the border.

"What has happened today is a remarkable disapproval of the Pakistani government's policy [in the tribal areas]," says Rasul Bakhsh Rais, a political-science professor at the Lahore University of Management Sciences. "NATO and the Americans are telling Pakistan, 'If you have retreated from the area, then we will go there.' "

Pakistan's military spokesman, Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, said Monday that the dawn strike was conducted by Pakistan military helicopter gunships, which fired four to five missiles into the facility. The madrassah targeted, he added, was used as a base for terrorist activities and housed as many as 80 militants.

General Sultan said that the attack occurred after the leaders of the facility refused to close it down.

One of those killed was Liaquat Hussain, a cleric linked to Al Qaeda No. 2 Ayman al-Zawahiri, according to the Associated Press.

While the Army took responsibility for the attacks, Pakistan's leading Islamic political leader immediately blamed the United States and called for protests to take place Tuesday. One religious leader, Faqir Mohammed, who was not at the madrassah when it was struck, called for broad protest during a funeral attended by thousands of tribesmen. Two days earlier, Mr.

Mohammed had denounced the Pakistani and US governments and praised Osama bin Laden during a pro-Taliban rally of 5,000 in Damadola.

Uncertainty persists, however, over who fired the missiles, and based on what intelligence. There are speculations that the strike, as in January, was miscalculated, and mistakenly targeted civilians rather than militants.

"It looks very odd for the Army to strike this madrassah," says Talat Masood, a retired lieutenant general and analyst in Islamabad. "Why couldn't they strike in a normal ground operation?"

Confusion has also prompted many to wonder whether the attack was conducted by American or NATO forces across the border in Afghanistan. The Pakistani Army, they speculate, might be claiming responsibility to avoid a political firestorm, as occurred after last January's attack. At that time, protests broke out when it was learned that a CIA drone had entered Pakistani airspace and fired upon a compound.

"[The strike] symbolizes a disagreement with the government of Pakistan. The agreement that Pakistan has signed, it has not been able to sell that to the US or Afghanistan," says Mr. Rais.

Whatever the source of the attack, there is consensus that peace efforts in the tribal areas have been undermined, if not derailed.

"I don't think another tribal elder will sign an agreement now," says Kamal Matinuddin, a retired lieutenant general. "It will put the government in a very difficult position."

Pakistan's counterterrorism strategies have been under fire for months. Its military strategy in the tribal areas, which began in 2003, had largely been seen as backfiring.

Hundreds of militants were killed, but so, too, were civilians and Army personnel. Rather than beating back extremism, military operations turned the tribal areas into an enclave of Taliban and Al Qaeda sympathies.

The Army, many analysts say, finally backpedaled, pulling out troops and devising a new strategy. The peace accord signed in September, and the one scheduled for Tuesday, constituted radical alternatives. Monday's strike, and the calls for violence by protesters, have now cast a shadow over the process.

Pakistan Strike Called Response To U.S. Reports (WP)

By Pamela Constable And Kamran Khan

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

A missile strike that killed close to 80 people at an Islamic school in Pakistan early Monday was launched because of U.S. intelligence reports that senior al-Qaeda figures were hiding there, Pakistani intelligence officials said. The strike generated angry protests by religious and tribal leaders, who accused the government of doing Washington's bidding at the cost of Pakistani lives.

The country's major Islamic party charged that U.S. military planes carried out the attack, which demolished the school, located near the border with Afghanistan. Pakistani and U.S. military officials denied that, saying the raid was the work of Pakistani helicopter gunships and forces, though U.S. intelligence had prompted it.

"This was a training camp, and they had been warned to stop their activities," said Gen. Mahmud Ali Durrani, Pakistan's ambassador in Washington. "They did not pay heed, so they were hit by our gunships and all the people there were killed. There will be a lot of unhappy or misguided people saying we are killing our own people for the sake of the Americans, but we had a commitment to fight terrorism on our soil, and we made a decision."

Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, are widely believed to be hiding in the rugged Afghan-Pakistani border region, home to fiercely independent tribal peoples. Afghan officials also contend that Pakistan's side of the border is serving as a sanctuary for newly aggressive Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan.

The attack in the Bajaur tribal district near the village of Khar caused the highest number of deaths of any single anti-extremist attack in Pakistan since 2001, when Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, agreed to side with the United States to help overthrow the Taliban in Afghanistan.

The raid on the Islamic studies school, known as a madrassa, seemed to represent an abrupt shift from the Musharraf government's recent policy of seeking peaceful negotiations with extremists in the border regions. In the past several months, two peace deals were signed in the tribal areas of North and South Waziristan after sustained attacks there by the Pakistani military drew strong local opposition and caused heavy casualties on both sides.

A third such agreement was due to be signed in Bajaur this week, but it seemed almost certain to collapse now. Monday's events are bound to compound problems for Musharraf, whose domestic political support has been steadily eroding.

"What a stupid operation, just one day before an accord between the local Taliban and the government. It has killed the entire spirit and the peaceful atmosphere in the tribal areas," said Maulana Fazlur Rehman Khan, who heads one of two major religious parties in parliament. Protesters who turned out in many towns Monday pledged to return to the streets Tuesday.

A similar strike occurred in January, when U.S. missiles devastated a nearby compound that authorities believed Zawahiri was visiting. Officials initially denied, then acknowledged, reports that a U.S. drone had carried out the strike, which killed 18 people. The incident set off protests across Pakistan and forced the Musharraf government to publicly condemn the U.S. action.

Among those killed Monday was Maulana Liaquat, an Islamic cleric allied with al-Qaeda who is believed to have hosted a dinner for Zawahiri in January that led to the missile strike in Damadola village. At a mass funeral for Liaquat and his followers Monday afternoon, news agencies reported, thousands of armed men shouted, "Down with Musharraf! Down with Bush!"

Some religious politicians from the area rejected the official version of events, saying it bore strong similarities to the January attack.

"Exactly like Damadola, there was a big flare before a missile hit the madrassa with a huge bang. Several minutes later, Pakistan army gunship helicopters appeared on the horizon firing aimlessly," said Sahibzada Haroon-ur Rashid, the local member of parliament from the religious Jamaat-e-Islami party. "I don't have an iota of doubt that the missile was fired from an American drone."

Rashid resigned from parliament in protest Monday, as did another senior leader of the religious political alliance that controls North-West Frontier Province, near Afghanistan. Until now, the country's religious parties had maintained an uneasy alliance with Musharraf, and he often deferred to their demands.

Pakistani officials dismissed comparisons with the January attack. "I can say with 100 percent surety that our forces targeted the terrorist training facility," the chief military spokesman, Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, asserted. "It is wrong to draw any comparison with U.S.-led action in Damadola."

If Monday's attack was carried out exclusively by Pakistan's military, it suggests that Musharraf -- long squeezed between domestic and international pressure on the terrorism issue -- decided to risk near-certain outrage at home to bolster his faltering credentials as a partner in the United States' global campaign.

Musharraf visited Washington last month, where he met with President Bush and Afghan President Hamid Karzai at the White House. In the past, Musharraf's government has earned U.S. praise for arresting and killing many al-Qaeda fighters. But relations have been cool with Karzai because of the Afghan accusations that Pakistan is harboring Taliban fighters.

According to Durrani, the Pakistani ambassador, the Washington meetings included pledges by Pakistan to make a strong effort to fight terrorism, to involve tribal leaders in both countries in that effort and to share intelligence with U.S. and Afghan officials.

"Yes, there are sensitivities, but we cannot sit on our haunches and do nothing," he said. "Many times, things we do in the tribal areas are misinterpreted and not popular. But you have to do tough things. This sends the message that we mean business."

One Pakistani intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the religious school in Khar was "serving as nucleus for all pro-al-Qaeda and pro-Taliban activities" in the Bajaur tribal district.

Publicly, Sultan and other Pakistani officials acknowledged that the attack was partly based on foreign intelligence. Privately, other officials said the information was developed solely by Americans. "They pressed the intelligence hard against our face. . . . A rapid military action was inevitable," one said.

Durrani said no one at the school was younger than 20 and that no children or other civilians were believed killed.

By Jim Mannion

AFP, October 31, 2006

The Pentagon is expanding its public affairs operations to counter "inaccurate" news stories and editorials and exploit "new media" to get its message out, its chief spokesman said, denying the effort was linked to the US elections.

The initiative comes amid plummeting domestic support for the war in Iraq and just before crucial mid-term congressional elections in which opposition Democrats are contesting Republican control of the Congress.

Eric Ruff, the Pentagon press secretary, insisted that the new public affairs program was not prompted by either the elections or polls showing that only about 37 percent believe the war is going well.

"What were looking at doing is, 'How can we get better, how can we get faster, how can we transform public affairs?'," he told reporters.

"And we're looking at being quicker to respond to breaking news. Being quicker to respond, frankly, to inaccurate statements," he said.

"And we're looking at this whole issue of new media -- podcasting, and IM-ing and all those kinds of things, where people are basically running circles inside us," he said.

Ruff disclosed the expanded operations after questions were raised about a wall being built in the Pentagon press operations center that will separate the new unit from Pentagon public affairs officials who deal with the media.

He denied that the intent of the new operation was to go around the mainstream news media.

Ruff said he did not know how much the operation is costing or how many people were being hired.

The unit includes a rapid response team, a "new media" group, and a team that specializes in getting Pentagon officials booked on radio and television shows.

"Well, just for example, letters to the editors: the operational tempo for letters to the editor has gone up considerably," Ruff said.

Dorrance Smith, the assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, has written a torrent of letters to editors in recent weeks seeking corrections or rebutting articles and editorials.

The Pentagon's daily compilation of defense-related news articles on Monday ran five such letters, including one to the Washington Post that has not been published.

Ruff said the new operation also was set up by Smith, a former ABC television producer and media adviser in Baghdad to L. Paul Bremer, who led the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq in the year after the US invasion.

But US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, a strident critic of media coverage of Iraq, also has pushed for a sweeping overhaul in the way the military communicates with the public.

In a speech to the Council on Foreign Relations in February, he called for 24-hour press operations centers and an approach that would give Internet operations and other channels of communications equal status to "20th century press relations."

"It will result in much less reliance on the traditional print press, just as publics of the US and the world are relying less on newspapers as their principal source of information," he said.

Efforts to expand the military's use of "information operations" overseas aroused controversy following disclosures last year that a private contractor was used to secretly plant paid stories in the Iraqi media.

"Information operations" is a military term used to describe propaganda aimed at influencing foreign publics. Traditional Pentagon public affairs, on the other hand, is bound by laws that prohibit propagandizing of Americans.

Asked whether the new Pentagon operations fell under the category of "information operations," Ruff said, "I've not looked at it that way at all."

"I've looked at it as getting better at what we do, from the standpoint of taking advantage of technology, of setting the record straight from a public affairs position," he said.

Pentagon Ramping Up Public Relations Efforts (AP)

PENTAGON Think of a political campaign's "war room," and then picture it within the Pentagon's giant rings.A memo obtained by The Associated Press shows the Defense Department is adding to its public relations staff. It plans to set up teams to quickly answer opponents' claims, develop messages for news cycles and coordinate officials or politicians to speak out on issues.Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has said the thing that keeps him up at night is his belief that terrorists have been able to manipulate the media, while the Pentagon's communications efforts have been lacking. He once graded those efforts as a D or a D-plus.A Pentagon spokesman denies the new effort is aimed at shaping public opinion about the war, or at influencing next week's elections.

Pentagon Boosts Public Relations Arsenal (AP)

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Pentagon is buttressing its public relations staff and starting an operation akin to a political campaign war room as Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld faces intensifying criticism over the Iraq war.

In a memo obtained by The Associated Press, Dorrance Smith, assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, said new teams of people will "develop messages" for the 24-hour news cycle and "correct the record."

The memo describes an operation modeled after a political campaign -- such as that made famous by Bill Clinton's successful 1992 presidential race -- calling for a "Rapid Response" section for quickly answering opponents' assertions.

Another branch would coordinate "surrogates." In political campaigns, surrogates are usually high-level politicians or key interest groups who speak or travel on behalf of a candidate or an issue.

The plan would focus more resources on so-called new media, such as the Internet and Web logs. It would also include new workers to book civilian and military guests on television and radio shows.

Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff did not provide the exact number of people to be hired, or the costs.

Rumsfeld has complained bitterly that the press focuses too much attention on bad news coming out of Iraq, and not enough on progress being made there.

As an example, he said during a trip to Nevada earlier this year that he was deeply troubled by the success of terrorist groups in "manipulating the media" to influence Westerners.

"That's the thing that keeps me up at night," he said during a question-and-answer session at a naval base.

The Pentagon changes, in the works for months, come as voters prepare to go to the polls next week with the war in Iraq as a key issue.

Polls suggest that the Republicans could lose their majority in the House, and perhaps the Senate, too.

The new public relations plan began to take concrete shape on Friday as new construction began in the E-Ring, the Pentagon's outermost corridor, to accommodate new hires.

Ruff said Monday that the reorganization, spearheaded by Smith, will help the department "set the record straight" and provide accurate, timely information.

He denied that the effort was set up to respond to the eroding public support for the war, or that it was aimed at helping in next week's elections.

He also said he would not call it an "information operations" program, which generally refers to a propaganda-type campaign.

Ruff said the effort grew out of Rumsfeld's criticism of the department's communications capabilities, which the secretary compared unfavorably to how quickly and effectively terrorists can get their message out.

"If I were grading I would say we probably deserve a 'D' or a 'D-plus' as a country as to how well we're doing in the battle of ideas that's taking place in the world today," Rumsfeld said during a visit to the Army War College in March.

"I'm not going to suggest that it's easy, but we have not found the formula as a country" for countering the extremists' message.

"We're trying to do better than a D-plus," said Ruff.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Monster's Founder Quits Board Amid Options Probe (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Mark Maremont

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

Monster Worldwide Inc.'s founder, Andrew McKelvey, resigned from the company's board after declining to be interviewed by lawyers conducting an internal investigation into backdating of stock options at the company.

Mr. McKelvey, who founded the company that was the precursor of Monster 39 years ago, had been the company's chairman and chief executive until earlier this month, when he stepped down from both posts, citing the demands of dealing with the options probe. Yesterday, he resigned his remaining positions as director and chairman emeritus. Monster is the parent of the popular Monster.com job-search Web site.

The broadening options-backdating scandal so far has focused on more than 150 companies, and white-collar attorneys say executives increasingly are refusing to cooperate with in-house probes for fear that their statements will be used against them by the government. But failure to cooperate makes it difficult or impossible for the executive to stay in his or her position. Nearly all of the companies involved are conducting internal probes, and typically turn over the results to federal investigators.

Robert Jones, a Monster spokesman, said the company and its board "demanded full compliance with the special committee and its representatives." He declined to comment further.

Behind yesterday's departure was an initial interview Mr. McKelvey, 71 years old, gave in July to the lawyers at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer Feld LLP conducting an internal probe for a special committee of Monster's board. At that time, Mr. McKelvey said that he had no knowledge of any options backdating at Monster, a person familiar with his interview said. This person said that Akin Gump lawyers found evidence contradicting this assertion.

Mr. McKelvey's new attorney, in a letter dated Oct. 29 submitting his client's resignation, tried to clarify remarks the former Monster chief had made in July. He said his client was "jet-lagged, came in without counsel and....did not express his thoughts and recollections as clearly or accurately as he would have liked."

Mr. McKelvey's lawyer, Steven F. Reich, said in the letter that his client had "misunderstood" what the July questions were about, and "focused too narrowly on the issue of whether he knew at the time that improper conduct had occurred, and not on the more general issue of whether backdating had occurred." Mr. Reich added that his client now wished to make clear that he didn't understand at the time that backdating of options was improper or that the practice could have legal or accounting implications.

Mr. McKelvey had been scheduled to be interviewed again by the Akin Gump lawyers yesterday, but Mr. Reich canceled the meeting, saying as new counsel he needed more time to prepare.

"We think the letter from Mr. McKelvey's lawyer is fairly self-explanatory," said Andrew Levander, an outside lawyer for Monster.

Options give their recipient the right to buy a stock at a fixed price, allowing the recipient to profit if the market value of the stock rises from the day the option was granted. But it turns out many companies cheated by pretending that their options were granted on earlier dates, when the stock price was much lower, a practice that gives an instant paper profit to grant recipients. Backdating is illegal if not properly disclosed to shareholders, and also can pose serious accounting and tax problems for companies and executives.

Three former executives at Comverse Technology Inc. have been charged criminally with fraud connected with alleged options backdating at the New York telecommunications software firm. All three purportedly had given confessions to private lawyers conducting an internal probe. One, the company's former finance chief, has pleaded guilty.

At Monster, several top executives, not including Mr. McKelvey, received options supposedly granted at highly favorable times when the company's stock price was low. Several grants were at quarterly or annual low points. The company previously announced the suspension of Myron Olesnyckyj, its general counsel, and has said it is very likely to restate its financial results over options issues.

In a June interview with The Wall Street Journal, Mr. McKelvey said his practice was to sign off on grants and pass them on to the board's compensation committee, but he didn't know the "mechanics" of how options were ultimately awarded. In June, Mr. McKelvey also said that he didn't know of evidence of backdating or other improprieties.

Yesterday, Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said the corporate response to stock-option abuses was "unprecedented" and reflects how the corporate environment has changed after accounting scandals at companies such as Enron Corp.

In remarks to reporters after addressing a Stanford University conference in Washington, D.C., Mr. Cox said the forceful private-sector response shows "an unmistakable message has been received" on the need for firms to investigate and address stock-option abuses.

Mr. Cox told reporters the SEC has a number of investigations into stock-option abuses, and said he expects "we'll be seeing more." SEC enforcement division director Linda Thomsen said the agency has more than 120 probes under way, focusing on the worst behavior, such as falsifying documents, creating fictitious employees and lying to auditors -- conduct the SEC alleged against former Comverse executives, which Ms. Thomsen suggested may have occurred at other firms as well.

Separately, Intuit Inc. said that the SEC has decided not to recommend any enforcement action in its investigation of the company's options-granting practices. Intuit, a Mountain View, Calif., maker of personal-finance software, previously had said an internal probe found no evidence of fraud or wrongdoing in its options practices. The company concluded it didn't need to restate historical results.

Monster's Founder Steps Down As Chairman Emeritus (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, October 31, 2006

As federal authorities continue to investigate Monster Worldwide in its stock-option granting practices, the company said Monday that former CEO and founder Andrew McKelvey has resigned as chairman emeritus of the company.

The 71-year-old stepped down last month as CEO and chairman, and Chief Operating Officer William Pastore was promoted to CEO of Monster, the parent corporation of a popular job-search website.

McKelvey was scheduled to meet Monday with a Monster special committee investigating the company's stock-option grants, but he changed his mind.

The company said in a statement that “Mr. McKelvey had declined to be interviewed” and “would not provide assurance that he would appear at a later date.”

McKelvey's attorney, Steven Reich of Manatt Phelps & Phillips, said in a letter Sunday to Monster's private attorneys that “we need a good deal more time to get up to speed on this fact-intensive matter that covers a period of many years.”

The letter, addressed to attorney James Benjamin at law firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, also said that McKelvey was ill, was suffering from jet lag and lacked legal representation during a key meeting with the committee last July on the stock-option scandal.

When questioned, McKelvey did not understand the legal and accounting implications of stock-option backdating, or whether Monster engaged in improper practices, according to the letter filed Monday with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The SEC and Justice Department are investigating Monster's stock-option practices, the company has said. Monster also is conducting its own investigation, by the Akin Gump law firm and a special committee of directors.

Company spokeswoman Kathryn Burns said the company hopes to restate its financial results by December. “Now that we know the magnitude of the restatement,” she says, “we're planning to start 2007 on a clean slate.”

Nasdaq officials have warned Monster that it may be delisted if the company does not file by Dec. 13 its quarterly earnings statement for the June quarter.

Monster expects to restate its finances for the years 1997 through 2005, according to the company's SEC filings.

Meanwhile, recent shareholders' lawsuits accuse Monster executives and directors of securities fraud and of allegedly failing to disclose the backdating of stock-option grants worth millions of dollars.

Backdating option awards involves choosing an award date when a company's stock price was lower than the date the options were actually awarded. That gives the holder a chance for a bigger profit when they exercise the options and sell the shares.

Monster's senior executives were motivated “to overpay themselves, to profit from their misconduct by cashing in on underpriced stock options and to issue false financial statements to cover up their misdeeds,” according to a lawsuit filed by the National Roofing Industry Pension Plan in U.S. District Court in New York.

Another federal lawsuit, filed by Philadelphia's Board of Pensions and Retirement, alleges that dozens of “suspicious grants” totaling millions of dollars were issued to Monster executives and directors from 1997 to the present.

Shares of Monster rose 2.6% to $41.32 in Monday trading on the Nasdaq stock market.

Federal authorities are investigating more than 100 companies on suspicion of illegal stock-option grants.

Ex-CEO Of Monster Worldwide Resigns From Board Over Stock Options Investigation (AP)

By Vinnee Tong, The Associated Press

The scandal over stock options backdating spread to yet another executive as the former chief executive of Monster Worldwide Inc., Andrew J. McKelvey, quit his board seat and refused to sit for questions from fellow board members.

Monster Worldwide, parent of the world's largest job search Web site, announced McKelvey's resignation on Monday. A board committee conducting an internal investigation had sought to interview him further following a meeting in July. Monster has received a subpoena from the U.S. attorney's office in the Southern District of New York over stock options and has said it wants to complete its own investigation by the end of the year.

McKelvey, who is 71, is the latest company chief to be affected by investigations of the accounting of past options grants. In all, at least 135 U.S. companies have disclosed internal inquiries or government investigations and at least 39 executives and board directors at 19 companies have been fired or have resigned.

McKelvey's full resignation from the board comes weeks after he stepped down from the posts of chairman and chief executive on Oct. 9. At that time, he retained a spot on the board and was named as a chairman emeritus.

Top executives who have recently resigned from other companies over options investigations include: UnitedHealth Group Inc. Chief Executive William McGuire, KLA-Tencor Corp. Chairman Kenneth Levy, CNET Networks Inc. Chief Executive Shelby Bonnie and McAfee Inc. CEO George Samenuk. McGuire quit as chairman earlier this month and will resign as CEO by Dec. 1.

So far, federal authorities have filed charges against former officials of two technology companies. And Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said on Monday that he expected more such charges in the coming days.

"This is very, very serious," said Jerry Reisman, an attorney specializing in corporate fraud at the firm Reisman Peirez & Reisman. About McKelvey, he said, "He doesn't want to answer questions because anything he says can be used against him in any criminal investigation. He may already be a target, we don't know."

Backdating involves issuing stock options retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price, potentially increasing profits for recipients when they sell their shares at higher prices.

Monster issued a statement Monday disclosing that, through a lawyer, McKelvey declined to be interviewed by a special committee of the board in a meeting that had been set for Monday. He also would not assure the board that he would appear at a later date.

A lawyer for McKelvey wrote in a letter that the former executive refused to meet because he did not have sufficient time to review the facts of what had happened over the course of several years. Attorney Steven Reich also clarified answers McKelvey gave in a July meeting, arguing that McKelvey did not know backdating was illegal.

"He did not understand that it was improper for the exercise price of stock to be different than the price on the grant dates, nor did he understand there were legal or accounting implications associated with that difference," Reich wrote in the letter.

The company's ongoing internal investigation had also delayed the release of its latest quarterly earnings results and led to the suspension of Myron Olesnyckyj, the company's senior vice president, general counsel and secretary.

When McKelvey resigned as CEO, he was replaced by William Pastore. Monster's board also created a three-person executive committee for board matters.

Shares of Monster Worldwide rose $1.10, or 2.73 percent, to $41.39 on the Nasdaq Stock Market in afternoon trading.

More Options-tied Cases Likely (AP)

By MARCY GORDON And VINNIE TONG, The Associated Press

SEC: Many companies, however, are stepping forward and voluntarily reporting irregularities.

WASHINGTON - With about 100 companies under investigation, new cases will be brought on suspicious timing of stock options grants in the near future, the head of the Securities and Exchange Commission said Monday.

Meanwhile, there have been an "unprecedented" number of companies that have voluntarily reported irregularities in stock options awards to the authorities -- a cooperation that will be taken into account by the SEC in those cases, Chairman Christopher Cox said.

Federal authorities have filed charges so far against former officials of two technology companies.

"I'd expect that we'll see more as a result of that process in the days ahead," Cox told reporters.

His remarks came amid news that the former chief executive of Monster Worldwide Inc., parent of the world's largest job-search site, had resigned from its board after refusing to be interviewed about the company's past options practices.

Andrew J. McKelvey's resignation came weeks after he stepped down from the posts of chairman and chief executive on Oct. 9. At that time, he retained a board seat and was named chairman emeritus.

To date, at least 135 public companies have disclosed internal inquiries over options grants or investigations by the SEC or the Justice Department, and at least 39 executives and directors at 19 companies have been fired or resigned.

"This is very, very serious," said Jerry Reisman, an attorney specializing in corporate fraud at the firm Reisman Peirez & Reisman. About McKelvey, he said, "He doesn't want to answer questions because anything he says can be used against him in any criminal investigation. He may already be a target; we don't know."

A lawyer for McKelvey wrote in a letter that the former executive refused to meet because he did not have sufficient time to review the facts of what had happened over the course of several years. Attorney Steven Reich also clarified answers McKelvey gave in a July meeting, arguing that McKelvey did not know backdating was illegal.

Backdating is an issue in many of the investigations. In the practice, stock options are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price. This can fatten profits for options recipients.

Backdating options can be legal if the practice is disclosed properly to investors and approved by the company's board.

Missed Deadlines Raise Possibility Of More Backdated Option Grants (MERCN)

By Therese Poletti

The San Jose Mercury News, October 31, 2006

Hundreds of companies have missed the regulatory deadlines to disclose how many stock options they have granted to insiders, raising questions about whether more options grants may have been backdated even amid new tougher securities laws, according to a report by Glass Lewis.

In an Oct. 20 report called ``The Backdating Scandal's Second Act?" Glass Lewis, an institutional shareholder advisory firm in San Francisco, noted that its research has identified hundreds of companies with late filings to the Securities and Exchange Commission. Those filings, called Form 4s, are now required within two days of the grants, per new securities laws as a result of Sarbanes-Oxley legislation.

``This suggests backdating continued to occur after the adoption of new disclosure rules," wrote Todd Fernandez, a senior research analyst at Glass Lewis, in the report. He noted there are many examples of companies that were late in disclosing grants to insiders and the stock price rose materially from the purported grant date to the disclosure date.

Glass Lewis said it reviewed hundreds of thousands of insider transactions from January, 2004 to June 2006, for its report.

To date, the SEC and the Justice Department have said they are investigating more than 100 companies for giving executives and employees a head start on profits, by backdating their stock options grants to a more favorable date. Backdating per se is not illegal, but the companies are being investigated for not properly disclosing these options grants in their financial statements. Companies and employees could also face some tax implications.

SEC's Grip On Hedge Funds Reviewed (DEAL)

By Ron Orol And Donna Block, The Deal

The Deal, October 31, 2006

Congressional investigators are examining whether stock exchanges and the Securities and Exchange Commission are equipped to police trading activity ahead of market-moving deals, particularly as hedge funds become an increasingly large presence in the financial markets.

At the request of Sen. Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, the Government Accountability Office earlier this month agreed to examine whether the SEC had adequate procedures in place to oversee stock exchange regulators, including the New York Stock Exchange and NASD.

Ostensibly, those exchanges are self-regulatory organizations, but the SEC ultimately is charged with ensuring that the public markets are carrying out their obligations to root out insider trading, fraud and other abuses.

Financial industry sources say Grassley is right to suspect some fire behind the smoke of suspicious trading and that the SEC appears to suffer a backlog of referrals of suspected improper trading from the exchanges.

With the advent of decimalization, increased domination by institutional trading, short-term trading strategies by hedge funds, and the move to a for-profit model of the major trading venues, it's unclear whether the SRO's market surveillance budgets, staffing levels and computer technology are keeping up.

"The tasks are bigger, the volumes are bigger and the rapidity of trading is bigger," said Steve Howard, a partner at Washington law firm Thatcher Profitt & Wood.

As for the SEC, Howard added that the agency has maintained the initiative in areas like insider trading. "Their actions [on insider trading] are at a low relative the number of actions taken in the 1980s and with a faux pas like Pequot it begs the question -- what happened?"

In fact, according to testimony by NYSE Regulation executive vice president Robert Marchman in September, the NYSE in the last two years has seen "a significant increase in the number and complexity of our insider trading referrals to the SEC." According to his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, referrals to the SEC increased from 68 in 2004 to 111 in 2005, a 63 percent increase. For 2006, at the current pace, "we project 140 referrals to the SEC, an increase of 26 percent from 2005," he said.

Combined, insider trading referrals to the SEC have increased a cumulative 105 percent over the last two years. "The projected 140 referrals in 2006 will handily surpass the five-year high-water mark of 98 referrals in 2000," Marchman said.

So what is the SEC doing with all these referrals?

The agency declined comment pending a review of its records. But one suggestion is that the SEC has not acted on many of them because is focused on other areas like the roll out of XBRL -- a quest to modernize the agency's data retrieval system.

The personnel-strapped agency also focused a lot of attention in the past year on unsuccessful attempts to require hedge fund manager registration, an initiative that was struck down in court. A court also struck down a rule that would have required independent directors to sit on mutual fund boards.

The SEC is indeed hurting for bodies. According to a source close to the SROs at a recent meeting with the SEC, the organizations were told that trading referrals were not acted upon because of a "hiring freeze." It's estimated that the SEC lost 31 "full-time equivalent" positions in enforcement in fiscal 2006, a 2.4 percent decline from fiscal 2005.

Nevertheless, Grassley wants to scrutinize in greater detail the SEC's handling of an insider trading case involving a large hedge fund and an influential investment banking executive prior to mergers or other market moving activities. Grassley questioned whether the agency gave Morgan Stanley chief executive John Mack special treatment during a probe of insider trading at Pequot Capital Management Inc., which runs $7 billion in hedge funds.

In a letter to clients last month, Pequot announced that the SEC staffers had determined they would not bring charges against the fund or any of its employees.

The revelation fueled alarm on Capitol Hill, where lawmakers already had raised concerns about the SEC's handling of the Pequot investigation. The former leader of the SEC's Pequot investigation was fired after telling Congress that senior SEC officials blocked his efforts to question Mack, who now heads Morgan Stanley. The agency has been investigating whether Pequot relied on insider information to buy stock of Heller Financial Inc. prior to its 2001 takeover by General Electric Co.

Beyond the Pequot matter, Grassley wants the General Accounting Office to investigate the SEC's enforcement division and compliance department and whether the agency is prepared to oversee hedge fund trades. Grassley asked the GAO to examine the SEC's "planning, oversight, control and other management processes." More broadly, the study will look at the overlapping SEC and SRO compliance networks and whether there is an overly cozy relationship between the stock exchanges and their investment banking clients.

It's unclear how long the GAO will take to issue its report, but the oversight office, which agreed to do the investigation on Oct. 16, will likely take several months and could be completed by June.

Hedge fund and other regulatory observers expect that should the GAO identify problems with the SEC's investigation of this situation, then it is likely stock exchanges and the SEC will spend more time and energy inspecting market transactions and other activities. The result is also likely to be an increased level of communications between the stock exchanges and the SEC on market activity.

"I expect the SROs will likely need to devote a significantly larger portion of their resources looking at market activity," said William Natbony, partner at Katten Muchin Rosenman in New York.

Stock exchanges have already both invested heavily in reviewing market moving activities, with possible plans for more funding in that area.

But Arthur F. Bell Jr., president of Arthur Bell & Associates, a Hunt Valley, Md., hedge fund consultancy firm, said there isn't enough evidence available yet to determine whether there is a problem and if there is an issue, whether it needs a whole new regulatory regime.

Grassley's efforts also may have set up a three-way congressional turf battle over the hedge fund regulation. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., in June held a hearing on the industry, charging that the SEC and the Justice Department had better get serious about investigating market manipulation by hedge funds and collusion between hedge fund managers and ostensibly independent research firms that supply analysis to investors.

Efforts to rein in the hedge fund industry by both Grassley and Specter have put a spotlight on Senate Banking Committee Chairman Richard Shelby, R-Ala. The Senate Banking Committee has jurisdiction over hedge funds and investment banking.

But securities lawyers also contend that whatever the results of the GAO report, it is not likely to put pressure on SEC Chairman Christopher Cox to restore the requirement for hedge fund manager registration.

As hedge funds have increased in size they have also increased their trading volume, making the job of stock exchange oversight of the trades more difficult. Richard Lashley, co-founder of Naperville, Ill.-based hedge fund PL Capital, says he's worried about the system of intermediaries that processes stock transactions seizing up.

"I don't know if there are too many transactions, but since there is much more capital out there I worry about the system which the trades are made could break down," Lashley says.

Targeting Hedge Funds (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

Targeting Hedge Funds

The big news with last month's implosion of Amaranth Advisors hedge fund was how little news it made. Even as the $9 billion fund was spiraling down after bad energy bets, J.P. Morgan Chase and the Citadel Investment Group stepped in to pick up the pieces. J.P. Morgan even reported that the deal boosted its third-quarter earnings.

But the Amaranth debacle still poses a different threat -- the political kind. Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley is circulating a letter to regulators looking for suggestions on how to regulate hedge funds. He's far from the only one. Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal is bidding to become the next Eliot Spitzer by doing to hedge funds what New York's AG did to the insurance industry. (Someone might want to tell Mr. Blumenthal that if he wants to drive this rich and growing industry out of Greenwich, he should keep it up.)

Rumblings can be heard abroad too. The German government wants the G-8 to take up hedge-fund and private-equity regulation. A select committee of the British Parliament is already examining regulations. Arthur Levitt, a former head of the SEC who opposes more hedge-fund regulation, nonetheless says he'd be surprised if Congress doesn't take up the issue next year, no matter which party controls Congress. * * *

So, just what is driving this push to regulate? First, until recently hedge funds have been growing like Topsy, and the 1998 meltdown of Long-Term Capital Management did little to diminish wealthy investors' appetite for new funds. Today there are more than 3,000 hedge funds, managing more than $1 trillion in assets. This growth has made them an increasingly attractive target for imperialist bureaucrats and rent-seeking politicians.

Then there are the demographics. Hedge funds by definition are open only to the rich. They have received a regulatory pass so far by limiting the number of investors in any given fund and restricting access to those who, essentially, can afford to lose everything they put in. By promising to cater only to the wealthy, hedge funds escape most of the rules passed in the wake of the 1929 crash to protect small investors. They can also take on a lot more leverage than, say, mutual funds. And their managers are not restricted in paying themselves performance-based compensation.

This basic bargain -- stay away from small investors and the SEC will leave you alone -- has held up pretty well for 70 years. There's little political hay to be made by arguing that millionaires need government protection from other millionaires.

But recently the bargain has shown signs of fraying. Senator Grassley cites pension-fund investments in hedge funds as one cause for concern. A large public or private pension fund may have billions in assets, but if it gets burned by a hedge fund that goes belly up, the "little guy" could get hurt, the Senator claims.

Never mind that pension funds have been seeking out hedge funds precisely because the lighter regulatory burden has meant higher returns. Moreover, to say that pension beneficiaries are "exposed" to hedge-fund risk is another way of saying that they are exposed to pension-fund-manager risk. But this is one reason pension funds themselves are regulated and supervised. Pension-fund investments are also highly diversified, or should be, with hedge funds representing only a slice of a pension-fund portfolio.

A second concern is that hedge funds are getting so big and numerous that they may pose a risk to the larger financial system. Thus regulators say they need to know more about, and have more control over, what exactly is going on in Greenwich.

"Systemic" risk is no laughing matter. One such risk that keeps us awake at night is having so much housing risk concentrated in two big firms, Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac -- especially when they enjoy an implicit government guarantee on the leverage they use to fatten their bottom line. Those two companies, by the way, have a combined portfolio nearly as large as the entire hedge-fund industry. But Capitol Hill prefers to ignore that systemic danger because the two mortgage giants and their homebuilder allies lather the place with campaign contributions.

By contrast, when Long-Term Capital Management (LTCM) went bust, it had about $5 billion in assets that it had leveraged into a $120 billion portfolio. That's not chump change, but the banks that had the most to lose stepped up and bought out the hedge-fund managers. The investors in LTCM got wiped out, but the "financial system" barely hiccupped. A report on LTCM issued in 1999 by the Treasury, the SEC and Federal Reserve noted that, even in a worst-case scenario, none of the banks and brokerages "exposed" to LTCM were ever in danger of insolvency. More recently, the failure of Amaranth and Bayou made headlines but barely caused a financial blip.

This is not to say there are no risks, especially when hedge funds are experimenting in complex derivatives and the like. But most of those transactions have banks or other regulated entities as counterparties, and so do not occur in a regulatory vacuum. Banks and their regulators have a duty to understand their exposure to what their hedge-fund clients and counterparties are doing. As long as they do, the risk of contagion can be minimized without intrusive regulation of hedge funds. * * *

All that said, politicians follow the money, so it was inevitable that hedge funds would become targets as they prospered. Some hedge-fund managers have floated the idea of establishing a self-regulatory entity like the NASD for their industry to keep the panting politicians at bay. This could prove a decent hedge of its own against more-intrusive alternatives.

Certainly it beats giving direct jurisdiction over the funds to the SEC and its army of 27-year-old lawyers. Best of all would be for the Members of Congress to leave hedge funds alone and reform the many "systemic" financial risks -- such as Fannie Mae, Social Security -- that they themselves have created.

Delphi Settles Charges With SEC (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission said yesterday that it settled civil fraud charges against embattled auto parts supplier Delphi Corp. and some of its former officials, while others vowed to fight.

The SEC named 13 individuals in the case, which alleges that officers at the company's highest level engaged in accounting schemes to mask Delphi's declining financial condition from 2000 to 2004. In one effort, the SEC said executives misrepresented warranty claims as pension costs to improve financial results.

Under terms of the settlement, Delphi faces no financial penalties.

The SEC said six individuals in the case agreed to settle the charges without admitting wrongdoing and will pay a total of $1.4 million in fines and other payments. The largest amount will be paid by Alan Dawes, Delphi's former chief financial officer, who agreed to pay $687,000.

J.T. Battenberg III, Delphi's former chief executive who was also named in the complaint, denied the SEC's claims.

"I deny the allegations against me and will ask that the Court hear evidence at the earliest possible time," Battenberg said in a statement.

The other former Delphi officials fighting the case are Paul Free, controller and chief accounting officer; John Blahnik, treasurer; Milan Belans, former director of capital planning and pension analysis; Catherine Rozanski, director of financial accounting and reporting; and Judith Kudla, former director of finance in Delphi's information technology department. Scot McDonald, an employee of a Texas IT company ensnared in the case, also is fighting the complaint, which was filed in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan.

Thomas W. Kranmer, Blahnik's attorney, said he hadn't had an opportunity to review the complaint. "However, there is another side to this story and we look forward to making that presentation to the court," he said.

Attorneys for the others fighting the complaints weren't immediately available for comment yesterday.

Linda Chatman Thomsen, director of the commissions enforcement division, said in a statement that the Delphi case stood out on several counts. "The facts here are particularly troubling because of the number of fraudulent schemes engaged in by Delphi, the length of time over which they occurred, and the number of Delphi employees, including senior officers, who carried out the schemes."

Last year, Troy, Mich.-based Delphi restated some earnings in the financial periods under SEC scrutiny. In a statement, chief executive Steve Miller said, "We are pleased to put the SEC investigation behind us and consider this settlement as an important step in our transformation process."

In one of the alleged abuses, the SEC said Delphi engaged in accounting schemes that tried to hide a billing dispute with General Motors Corp. over faulty parts. According to the complaint, GM was asserting in May 2000 that Delphi owed between $350 million and $800 million for warranty claims for faulty Delphi-made parts. The firms eventually agreed to $237 million to satisfy the claims.

Along the way, Delphi officials continually misclassified the items. The SEC complaint says Delphi sought to mischaracterize the $237 million payment as a pension-related expense, which could potentially limit the payment's impact on Delphi's income statement. The SEC says the misclassification resulted in Delphi overstating profit in the second quarter of 2000 by $69 million. In the third quarter of 2000, the SEC says Delphi's profit would have been about $15 million, rather than the $148 million Delphi reported.

Additionally, near the end of 2000, the SEC said Delphi entered into two fraudulent inventory transactions in which it purported to sell $270 million of precious metals to banks and consulting firms, while simultaneously agreeing to buy the inventory back later. The SEC said the transactions were intended to allow Delphi to inflate its cash and improperly report $80 million in profit.

Delphi has been operating under bankruptcy court protection since last October. The firm, once under GM's wing, was spun off in 1999. Delphi then became stalled by crushing U.S. labor contracts and competition from parts makers operating in low-wage countries. Since separating from GM, Delphi has lost billions of dollars. Its problems have cast a shadow over GM, which is also trying to stabilize its U.S. operations.

SEC Files Fraud Charges Against Delphi And Former Top Executives (AP)

By Ken Thomas, Associated Press

AP, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Securities and Exchange Commission said Monday it had settled charges of accounting fraud against Delphi Corp. and six people, including the auto supplier's former chief financial officer, in a scheme to hide the poor conditions of the company's finances.

The SEC, in a filing in federal court in Detroit, charged former Delphi Chief Executive J.T. Battenberg and others with participating in or aiding and abetting the company's fraud.

Delphi, the nation's largest auto supplier, filed for bankruptcy protection in October 2005. Resolving the SEC investigation could help the company move closer to emergence from bankruptcy next year.

The government said in a statement that the Troy, Mich.-based company had settled its charges and will not face penalties because of its cooperation with investigators.

Delphi Chairman and CEO Robert S. "Steve" Miller said the auto supplier had "cooperated fully with the commission's investigation and will continue to do so. We are pleased to put the SEC investigation behind us and consider this settlement an important step in our transformation process."

Delphi settled the charges "without admitting or denying the Commission's allegations," the SEC said.

The agency said it settled charges with six of the people named in the complaint, including former Chief Financial Officer Alan Dawes, who agreed to pay $687,000 in fines and restitution.

The SEC investigation found that Delphi manipulated its earnings from 2000 to 2004, using several illegal schemes to boost its earnings, including the concealment of a $237 million transaction in 2000 with its former parent company, General Motors Corp., involving warranty costs.

Linda Chatman Thomsen, director of the SEC's division of enforcement, said the facts were "particularly troubling because of the number of fraudulent schemes engaged in by Delphi, the length of time over which they occurred, and the number of Delphi employees, including senior officers, who carried out the schemes."

The SEC said its investigation was continuing. The Justice Department has also been conducting a criminal investigation of the company related to the accounting practices. A Justice spokeswoman declined to comment.

Battenberg, in a statement, said the SEC complaint against him "relates entirely to a settlement of disputes between Delphi and General Motors in September 2000 that I believed and continue to believe was entirely lawful and proper.

"I fully cooperated with Delphi and with the SEC in their investigations of this matter both before and after my retirement, and am disappointed to say the least that this lawsuit has been filed," Battenberg said. "I deny the allegations against me and will ask that the court hear the evidence at the earliest possible time."

Battenberg, Delphi's founding chairman after it was spun off from GM in 1999, announced his retirement in February 2005, shortly before the SEC probe was announced.

Peter Henning, a former SEC attorney who teaches at Wayne State University Law School, said the chief financial officer's knowledge was key to the government's probe in similar accounting fraud cases involving Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. He said Dawes, the former CFO, would likely be the linchpin in the Delphi case.

"The CFO not only knows the accounting but he also knows the management decisions for certain transactions, so he will be a key to the case," Henning said.

In addition to Battenberg and Dawes, the SEC complaint also named Paul Free, Delphi's former controller and chief accounting officer; John Blahnik, Delphi's former treasurer and senior vice president; Milan Belans, Delphi's former director of capital planning and pension analysis; Catherine Rozanski, Delphi's former director of financial accounting and reporting; and Judith Kudla, former director of finance in Delphi's information technology department.

Others charged include: Scot McDonald, who works for a Texas-based information technology company and formerly served as manager of U.S. GAAP Consulting and Reporting; B.N. Bahadur, who led a Michigan-based private management consulting company.

In addition, the complaint charged four other people with aiding and abetting Delphi's reporting and books-and-records violations: Atul Pasricha, Delphi's former assistant treasurer; Laura Marion, Delphi's former director of financial accounting and reporting; Stuart Doyle, a former client executive supporting the Texas IT company's relationship with Delphi; and Kevin Curry, a former client executive supporting the Texas IT company's relationship with Delphi.

In addition to Dawes, the SEC reached settlements with Pasricha, Bahadur, Marion, Doyle and Curry. Bahadur agreed to pay back nearly $490,000 in ill-gotten gains and interest and pay an $80,000 penalty; Pasricha agreed to a $55,000 penalty; Marion and Doyle agreed to pay penalties of $40,000 apiece and Curry agreed to pay a $25,000 penalty.

Attorneys for Belans, Kudla and McDonald didn't immediately return telephone calls seeking comment. Free's attorney, Richard Rossman, had no immediate comment.

David DuMouchel, Rozanski's lawyer, said they were "very disappointed that the (SEC) filed the action against Cathy but now we'll just proceed to defend" her.

Thomas Cranmer, Blahnik's attorney, said, "there's another side of the story to be told, and we look forward to presenting our case in court."

AP Business Writer Marcy Gordon contributed to this report.

Delphi's Ex-CEO To Fight Fraud Charges (USAT)

By Sharon Silke Carty

USA Today, October 31, 2006

DETROIT — Delphi's former CEO says he'll fight a lawsuit by the Securities and Exchange Commission that charges him and six other former Delphi employees with incidents of fraud from 2000 to 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0088905

The SEC said its two-year investigation revealed the auto-parts supplier manipulated its finances during that period to boost cash flow and earnings.

An additional six people, including the former chief financial officer, have settled charges related to the incidents.

J.T. Battenberg, Delphi's founding chairman and CEO from 1999 (when the supplier was spun off from General Motors) until he retired in June 2005, insists the actions he took were "entirely lawful and proper."

"I fully cooperated with Delphi and the SEC in their investigations of this matter both before and after my retirement, and am disappointed — to say the least — that this lawsuit has been filed," he said in a statement.

Six of those charged, including former CFO Alan Dawes, reached settlements with the SEC without admitting guilt and will pay a total of $1.4 million in fines.

Delphi, which filed for bankruptcy-court protection in October 2005, also did not admit guilt and, because of its cooperation with the probe, won't have to pay fines.

"The facts here are particularly troubling because of the number of fraudulent schemes engaged in by Delphi, the length of time over which they occurred, and the number of Delphi employees, including senior officers, who carried out the schemes," said Linda Chatman Thomsen, director of the SEC's division of enforcement.

The SEC alleges that it uncovered seven incidents of fraud, including:

•Two moves in 2000 that hid a $237 million liability Delphi faced for defective parts, allowing it to falsely boost its net income for the year by $202 million.

•Two schemes in which Delphi shifted the way it accounted for its inventory of metals, batteries and generator cores from fourth-quarter 2000 to first-quarter 2001.

The moves made Delphi's cash flow look $200 million better and its inventory $270 million slimmer, and boosted net income by $80 million.

•In exchange for new business, Delphi made EDS, an information technology supplier, pay it $20 million, which Delphi agreed to pay back over five years, with interest — essentially turning the deal into a loan to Delphi.

But in an attempt to make its earnings targets for the 2001 fourth quarter, Delphi booked the $20 million as income. The SEC began its investigation of Delphi in 2004, after EDS informed the agency of the loan.

Nine Ex-Delphi Execs Charged With Fraud (DEN)

By David Shepardson

Detroit News, October 31, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission filed civil fraud charges against nine former Delphi executives, including former CEO J.T. Battenberg III and former Chief Financial Officer Alan Dawes, in U.S. District Court in Detroit on Monday in connection with allegations of widespread accounting fraud.

Also charged were four company officials from two companies that conducted allegedly improper transactions with Delphi -- including three employees at EDS and B.N. Bahadur, the CEO of Southfield-based turnaround firm BBK Ltd.

Bahadur, Dawes, two of the EDS employees and two other former Delphi officials agreed to settle the allegations with the SEC.

Delphi Corp., General Motors Corp.'s former parts unit, was also charged with wrongdoing as a corporation; it agreed to settle the allegations and will not pay any civil fine.

"The SEC's complaint against me relates entirely to a settlement of disputes between Delphi and General Motors in September 2000 that I believed and continue to believe was entirely lawful and proper. I fully cooperated with Delphi and with the SEC in their investigations of this matter both before and after my retirement, and am disappointed to say the least that this lawsuit has been filed. I deny the allegations against me and will ask that the Court hear the evidence at the earliest possible time."

In March 2005, following a 10-month internal investigation led by an outside law firm, Delphi ousted Dawes and then-chief accounting officer Paul Free, who was also charged in Monday's filing, and said many of the company's financial statements were inaccurate. It also removed at least four other officials.

The investigation into Delphi began in July 2004 after EDS, another former GM subsidiary, told the SEC in June 2004 about a $20 million loan in 2001 that Delphi booked as income. The SEC upgraded its probe into a formal investigation in August 2004.

Unresolved is the ongoing criminal investigation into Delphi Corp. being led by the Justice Department's fraud section.

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

NEW YORK -- The son of billionaire oil tycoon T. Boone Pickens pleaded guilty to securities fraud Monday, admitting his role in a scheme to inflate the stock value of three companies so he could make hundreds of thousands of dollars illegally.

Michael O. Pickens, of Nocona, Texas, entered the plea in U.S. District Court in Manhattan after signing an agreement calling for him to be sentenced to as little as four years and nine months in prison or as much as five years and 11 months.

Judge Loretta A. Preska set sentencing for Jan. 30 after Mr. Pickens, 52, entered the plea to three charges of securities fraud. The charges carry a potential fine of $3 million.

Mr. Pickens was arrested July 18, 2005, and was accused of sending hundreds of thousands of hoax faxes throughout the U.S. in December 2004 to fraudulently induce investors to buy three stocks. (See related article1.)

Prosecutors said each fax purported to be a handwritten note conveying a stock tip to a person, suggesting it had been mistakenly sent to each recipient. An indictment said the fake faxes caused the trading values and market prices of the stocks to increase dramatically. It said one stock's value almost doubled in one day.

In one fake note, a financial planner identified as Chris tells Dr. Mitchel that his newest stock idea will be like the last one, which tripled in value.

The government, which didn't say how many people acted on the phony faxes, said Mr. Pickens used the faxes Dec. 17-22, 2004, to pump up the price of three stocks so he could sell them at a premium of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. Pickens told the judge "the faxes were made to appear as a misdirected tip from a stock broker to a customer. In fact, as I knew, there was no broker, no customer and no tip."

He added: "I knew at the time what I was doing was wrong, and I'm very sorry for my conduct."

During his plea, Mr. Pickens, a Texas stock promoter, said he has been undergoing treatment for substance abuse since June.

A spokesman for T. Boone Pickens, Jay Rosser, said: "Mr. Pickens is proud of Mike for accepting responsibility for his actions. This is an important step and a significant milestone. Boone and his whole family are fully supportive of him in his rehabilitation efforts."

Radler Assets Frozen (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

The assets of F. David Radler, the former publisher of The Chicago Sun-Times, were recently frozen by a Canadian court at the request of Hollinger Inc., Conrad M. Black's former holding company, which is suing Mr. Black and Mr. Radler to recover management fees.

A British Columbia Supreme Court judge in Vancouver granted the order on Oct. 25. Hollinger is suing Mr. Black and Mr. Radler to recover management fees and noncompetition payments.

The injunction, which applies worldwide, prohibits Mr. Radler and his company, F. D. Radler Ltd., from disposing of, mortgaging or transferring any assets, and freezes their bank accounts while the suit remains before the courts.

Mr. Radler is allowed to spend up to $22,255 a month for living expenses and legal fees. The order will remain in effect until Nov. 9, unless the court agrees to extend it, the judge, Deborah Satanove, said in a three-page ruling.

Mr. Black's assets were frozen Aug. 18 at Hollinger's request by the order of an Ontario Superior Court judge. Mr. Black and his wife were limited to a monthly allowance of 50,000 Canadian dollars. Mr. Black and Hollinger agreed on Sept. 29 to replace the judge's order with a confidential settlement.

Hollinger, the holding company that Mr. Black used to control the newspaper publisher Hollinger International, is seeking 636 million Canadian dollars in damages. In July, Hollinger International changed its name to the Sun-Times Media Group.

In Chicago, Mr. Black faces 12 charges of racketeering, money laundering, wire fraud and obstruction of justice. He is accused of moving $92 million from Hollinger International through other companies and using Hollinger Inc. to enrich himself at shareholder expense. Mr. Black has denied any wrongdoing. His trial in Chicago is scheduled to start in March.

Mr. Radler pleaded guilty in September to United States fraud charges and agreed to cooperate with the Justice Department.

Prosecutors have recommended that Mr. Radler serve 29 months in jail and pay a $250,000 fine. He remains free on a $500,000 bond until all proceedings in the case are finished.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutor Argues Issues For Leak Trial (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, October 30, 2006

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald told a federal judge Monday that he shouldn't have to explain during the upcoming trial of a former White House aide why nobody was charged with leaking the identity of a CIA operative.

Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, faces trial for obstruction and perjury in January and is the only person charged in the case. His supporters have accused Fitzgerald of singling out Libby while not charging the source of the leak, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage.

In court documents, Fitzgerald said he shouldn't have to address that issue at Libby's trial. While never addressing Armitage by name, Fitzgerald said it would be irrelevant to discuss other officials.

"If Mr. X was investigated for leaking classified information, the government's decision not to charge Mr. X should have nothing to do with the jury's role as the finder of fact in Libby's case," Fitzgerald wrote.

If jurors disagree with his decision not to charge anyone else, they might be less likely to convict Libby, Fitzgerald wrote.

Armitage told prosecutors he inadvertently revealed Plame's job to syndicated columnist Robert Novak in July 2003. Novak's story ran as Plame's husband, Joseph Wilson, criticized the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Libby was one of several Bush administration officials questioned about the leak and prosecutors said he lied about his conversations with reporters.

Defense attorneys have sought information regarding Armitage's role in the leak and have been unsuccessful.

Fitzgerald's court filing is an attempt to prevent Libby's attorneys from making the argument that Libby had no reason to lie because, if he had leaked classified information, prosecutors would have charged him with it.

"The government's decision not to charge a crime is not a declaration as to the legality or propriety of the defendant's conduct," Fitzgerald wrote.

Libby's defense attorneys are expected to respond to Fitzgerald's motion.

Fla. Prison Guards Stand Trial (AP-Y)

By Bill Kaczor, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 31, 2006

Lawyers for two prison guards charged in a contraband-for-sex scandal that ended in a deadly shootout told a jury Monday that the government's case relies on the testimony of inmates who are willing to lie in exchange for reduced sentences.

DOJ_NMG_0088908

Gregory Dixon and Alan Moore, who both work at a federal prison for women, are accused of participating in a scheme to swap sex with female inmates for such commonplace items as gum, cigarettes and perfume. Both are charged with conspiracy and bribery. Dixon also is accused of witness tampering.

"You will hear a lot of nonsense from inmates all trying to punch their tickets home," said Thomas Findley, Dixon's lawyer, as the trial opened.

Authorities said the suspected plot ended June 21 in a shootout after prison guard Ralph Hill smuggled a gun into the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution and opened fire when FBI and Justice Department agents arrived to arrest him and other defendants. Hill and an FBI agent were killed.

Three guards have since pleaded guilty in the scheme, but none have been implicated in the shootout. Dixon and Moore have been suspended from their jobs.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Alan Sprowls acknowledged his key witnesses are convicted felons but promised the jury that the government will introduce sufficient evidence to show the guards abused their authority for personal benefit.

He said the conspiracy, punishable by up to 20 years in prison, was not based on a formal agreement or even a handshake.

"This is going to be a much more subtle understanding. ... 'I'm not going to tell on you; you're not going to tell on me,'" Sprowls said.

Findley said his client has admitted to having sex with inmates but was not charged with that crime. He denied that Dixon was part of a conspiracy to commit bribery, mail fraud and other crimes or that he traded contraband for sex.

Moore has not admitted to having sex with inmates. His attorney, Robert Harper, questioned whether the government has a case.

"Where's the DNA? There isn't any," Harper said. "Where's the recording? Where is the videotape? There isn't any."

Date Set For Death-penalty Trial (HONADV)

By Ken Kobayashi, Advertiser Courts Writer

Honolulu Advertiser, October 31, 2006

The first death penalty trial here since Hawai`i abolished capital punishment in the 1950s is scheduled to begin in October of next year.

Army Spc. Naeem Williams pleaded not guilty today to a charge of murdering his 5-year-old daughter Talia Williams, who died July 16 last year. He faces the death penalty, which was authorized earlier this year by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Federal Magistrate Judge Leslie Kobayashi today set Williams' trial for Oct. 16, which is later than usual because of legal issues that may arise because the charge carries the death penalty.

Williams' wife Delilah Williams is also scheduled to go on trial with her husband on a charge of murdering Talia Williams, but the attorney general did not authorize the death penalty prosecution for her. Delilah Williams earlier pleaded not guilty. If convicted, she faces a maximum sentence of life in prison.

Lee Man Claims He Was Victim In Pornography Case (BONITAN)

By Kristen Zambo

Bonita (FL) News, October 31, 2006

Former Lee County school bus driver Donald Deverso told a federal judge that he was taken advantage of by a girl from the Philippines.

He said he didn't do anything wrong, that he was the real victim in the child pornography case he accused the federal government of manufacturing.

At times becoming argumentative, former Lee County school bus driver Donald Deverso staunchly maintained his innocence Monday, telling a federal judge during his sentencing hearing that he was taken advantage of by a girl from the Philippines.

"To keep calling these women victims — I didn't have any victims, your honor," Deverso said before U.S. District Judge John E. Steele sentenced him to 16 years behind bars. "I didn't write to them. They wrote to me."

Deverso, 59 and of Cape Coral, was convicted on May 19 in the high-profile case. He was accused of keeping child porn on his home computer from May 11, 2002, through April 15, 2005. He also was charged with transporting child pornography in October 2004, and manufacturing it while he vacationed in the Philippines. Deverso photographed underage girls he met online through Asian dating Web sites, one victim and investigators testified in spring during his weeklong trial.

Prosecutors said Deverso chatted with numerous women online, proposing marriage to them. Deverso remains married to his third wife, Zong Yu Deverso, whom he met on a Chinese brides Web site. Deverso countered that he never promised these others marriage, just that it was possible if they got along well.

Based on federal sentencing guidelines, Steele had to sentence Deverso to a minimum of 15 years in prison. He could have been sentenced to 20 years.

"What kind of person flies around the world to take advantage of poor and desperate women?" Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney Doug Molloy asked. "One who deserves the maximum penalty of incarceration this court can impose."

Deverso never has shown remorse for the crimes, he said, and Deverso didn't care about hurting the women and girls, nor his family.

"Those were children in those pictures," Molloy said. "That was a young lady that man defiled."

Deverso lashed back against Molloy, saying he didn't know why the region's top federal prosecutor was treating him like that.

Deverso maintained he did nothing illegal. The girl had to be at least 18 years old to participate in the Asian dating Web sites. She told Deverso she was 18 when they met, Deverso said, and he bought her a 19th birthday present in November 2004, one month after they first met in the Philippines.

Deverso has been held in the Lee and Hendry county jails since his arrest in April 2005.

One girl, now 19 years old, testified in May during Deverso's trial that he had sex with her and took graphic naked pictures of her. Deverso was not charged with rape.

Wracked with sobs, the girl — who the Daily News is not naming because of the nature of the charges — fled from the courtroom twice during the trial. Deverso's defense attorney, John Bergendahl, asked for a mistrial at the time, and Monday in court said Steele should have declared one.

During the almost 2½ hour sentencing hearing, Steele said he still wouldn't grant a mistrial.

The girl testified she told Deverso she was 17. She turned 18 less than one month after his first visit with her in October 2004. He referred to her as his fiancee, investigators said.

"I did not take advantage of (the girl)," Deverso said. "I helped her."

He bought her clothes, furniture, an apartment to live in with friends and tried to make her life better, he added.

"The first time we met we did not have sex," he said, adding that they decided to wait until he gained her father's approval. "How could I knowingly take those pictures of a minor when she lied about her age?" Deverso asked.

His niece, Linda Rachoza, told Steele her uncle was a good man. The girl should take some of the blame, she added.

"She should have held some accountability for what she did wrong," Rachoza told the Daily News after the sentencing.

Prosecutors contend Deverso recorded himself having sex with underage Asian girls. Deverso said investigators didn't show any of the photos he took with the girl's family on vacation, including of them "jet-skiing."

He was considering retiring to the Philippines, where he could buy land and a home much more cheaply, Deverso said.

Bergendahl vowed to appeal the conviction and sentence, saying the mandatory 15-year term amounts to cruel and unusual punishment, a violation of the Eighth Amendment. After the hearing he said he "strongly disagrees with the applicability of the 15-year" required minimum sentence.

He argued that Deverso shouldn't be sentenced to a stiffer penalty because the girl "contributed to the offense," Deverso is older and he suffers from a variety of medical problems, such as back pain and a hernia.

Bergendahl late last week asked Steele's permission to withdraw from the case. He asked again Monday, saying their relationship had deteriorated. He said Deverso's family wanted to hire a California defense lawyer, but Steele rejected both requests, saying that lawyer isn't licensed to work in Florida.

"We believe Mr. Deverso creates conflict to delay even more," Molloy said.

Deverso and his wife, nicknamed Ming-Mei, since have reconciled. She received her green card in February 2005. She asked Monday for her husband to come home.

"I know him," she said in halting English. "I sleep with him before. No monster."

Deverso said he also wanted one of the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents who worked on the case, Keith Cramsey, to be investigated. He accused Cramsey of lying and illegally obtaining evidence. Prosecutors stood behind Cramsey's work.

"I'm not happy," Deverso told Steele before being led away by U.S. marshals. "I just don't know how I can be lied to and lied about. I'm not gonna survive prison, your honor. I know that, you know that, and now my family knows that. Welcome to paradise."

Masilotti Charged (PALMBEACHP)

By Tom Dubocq, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), October 31, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH — Former Palm Beach County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti faces up to five years in prison and forfeiture of $9.5'million in cash and real estate for his leading role in a land deal conspiracy that stretched from 2000 to this past June, federal prosecutors said Monday.

Masilotti, who in a sorrowful resignation letter said he will plead guilty, is expected to surrender Friday at the federal courthouse in Fort Pierce, where he will appear for the first time before a judge. Still to be determined: when Masilotti formally will plead guilty and when he'll be dispatched to prison.

The grand jury investigation of Tony Masilotti was triggered by a series of stories in The Palm Beach Post this year documenting how the county commission chairman's family secretly profited from land deals that Masilotti had pushed.

The Post's investigation, launched in January, involved the review of thousands of documents from 16 government agencies in four counties in Florida and Illinois as well as dozens of interviews. It began with records of Masilotti's recent divorce, which included financial statements and a document index that identified marital property holdings in the name of an accountant who represented a secret land trust. The trust, it turned out, was involved in a tangled series of transactions that generated a $1.3 million profit for the family.

Feds Charge Masilotti With Conspiracy, Allege He Made Millions On Secret Land Deals (FLSUNSEN)

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 31, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH -- Federal authorities on Monday formally charged former Palm Beach County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti with conspiracy to commit fraud by making millions from three secret land deals.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in West Palm Beach said it would seek to fine Masilotti $250,000, put him in prison for a maximum of 5 years and request the forfeiture of millions of dollars in assets.

In a 35-page list of charges, the U.S. Attorney cited Masilotti's land deals in Martin County, Brevard County and Palm Beach County.

In one Palm Beach County deal, Masilotti is accused of receiving between $40,000 and $50,000 for his assistance in helping a developer solve traffic problems concerning land the Diocese of Palm Beach County was selling in the town of Royal Palm Beach.

In another deal, Masilotti and family members allegedly got $100,000 in free air travel from a developer who did business with county in purchasing a former public horse riding area near Wellington. The property was bought by a group headed by developer Bruce Rendina, who was only identified by his initials in the charges.

In a Brevard County deal, Masilotti allegedly created a trust called the ARM Family Land Trust. In the deal, Masilotti bought some 60 acres of land for $100,000 and then, while on the commission, voted "to advocate and publicly endorse zoning changes dramatically increasing the value of the land," the charges said. Masilotti then had a part in swapping the land for land in Brevard County worth nearly $8 million, the charges said.

In the Martin County deal, Masilotti and his ex-wife Susan made $1.3 million in a complicated set of secret, land deals that involved land purchases there by the South Florida Water Management District.

Last Friday, Masilotti announced he planned to plead guilty to federal corruption charges, admitting for the first time to wrongdoing and expressing "regret and sorrow."

The chastened county commissioner faxed his five-paragraph resignation, effective immediately, to County Administrator Bob Weisman early Friday morning.

Masilotti, 50, pledged to cooperate with the FBI, Internal Revenue Service and U.S. Attorney's Office, which have been investigating for six months his potential abuse of power and a secret land deal in Martin County, which enriched Masilotti and his ex-wife but was hidden through a secret trust.

"Eventually I will plead guilty," Masilotti wrote.

Former Chief Caillier Sentenced (KATC-TV)

KATC-TV, October 31, 2006

Former Opelousas Police Chief Larry Caillier, who had a stellar career in law enforcement, was sentenced Monday in federal court for filing a false claim. His department was paid for bike patrols that never happened. Before sentencing, his attorneys asked the court to take into account Caillier's accomplishments and untarnished record.

Caillier could have faced up to five years in prison. Instead, U.S. District Judge Richard Haik sentenced him to five years probation, 10 months of house arrest and he must pay restitution to the U.S. Clerk of Court. The FBI determined Caillier owes $26,300. "Without question this was a mistake, a very costly and disastrous mistake - costly to the chief, costly to his family, very costly to the community," says attorney Elbert Guillory.

Caillier's attorneys pleaded for leniency. Attorney Ed Lopez recounted the former chief's career beginning with serving in the U.S. Air Force, Louisiana State Police, then 15 years as chief in Opelousas. "This man has spent 35 years protecting the general public, and he's had an exemplary record," Lopez says. Guillory says, "This situation today, aside, Chief Caillier is still one of the nation's best and most successful law enforcement officers."

In court, Caillier apologized. "I'd like to offer a sincere apology to the United States Of America for incidences that happened on my watch." Elbert Guillory says law enforcement agencies have expressed interest in hiring Caillier as a consultant. He wouldn't say which agencies, but one is in-state and a couple are out-of-state.

Former Chief Gets 10 Months Of House Arrest (OPELDW)

By Jacqueline Cochran

Opelousas Daily World, October 31, 2006

There will be no jail time for the former Opelousas police chief found guilty of a federal charge of filing false claims while in office.

But Larry Caillier will serve five years of probation and 10 months under house arrest, and he's been ordered to pay $26,300 in restitution for his crime. Perhaps more painful for the four-term chief, he'll never be allowed to work in law enforcement again, nor is he allowed to own a gun.

"Your true punishment will not be your going to jail but, as a person, to have to live with this," U.S. District Judge Richard Haik told Caillier during sentencing. "I'm not sure if anything worse could happen to you. Standing here, a convicted felon." The conviction is the first and only found against the former chief, though the state remains poised to proceed with another 26 separate charges - five malfeasance in office charges connected with Caillier allegedly ordering OPD officers not to respond to disturbance calls and several other charges ranging from forgery to money laundering.

Also still facing both federal and state charges in connection with the patrols is former OPD Maj. Ronnie Trahan. Trahan was just charged last week in federal court with aiding and abetting Caillier in the filing of a false claim for reimbursement on the patrols. The state has also charged Trahan with criminal conspiracy, public payroll fraud, six counts of prohibiting splitting of profits, fees and commissions, 10 counts of forgery and money laundering.

Motions made Monday by attorney Elbert Guillory on behalf of Caillier to change court records to reflect Trahan's greater role were systematically rejected by Haik, as each was offered for consideration.

Guillory asked for the court record to read:

the defendant did not participate in creation of three documents and in time became aware of documents created by subordinate.

the defendant at no time authorized or instructed Trahan to make up or adjust time sheets.

the addition of officers names so the maximum $3,000 per month would be paid by the housing authority was done without the knowledge and consent of the defendant.

"I Larry J. Caillier, at this time would like to offer a sincere apology to the United States of America for incidents that happened on my watch as chief of police for the city of Opelousas."

Haik told Caillier that while the measure of the offense was substantial, in all fairness he had to take into consideration "all the good you have done for your country and state in service and community."

His Vietnam War service, his having worked 20 years as a state trooper and his 15 years as police chief all stand as proof of that good, Haik said.

"I feel sorry for you and your family and for putting them through this," Haik said. "You should apologize to all of your family and all of the police officers that served for you, and all of the people you put in jail because now, basically, you have become one of them. And that is something you will never be able to wash away."

Caillier's family sat somberly in the rear of the court. Some with heads down as the judge reprimanded the man who once referred to himself as "the wizard."

"Do you understand?" Haik asked after each condition of sentencing was stated.

Former Opelousas Police Chief Sentenced (BRADV)

By Richard Burgess

Baton Rouge Advocate, October 31, 2006

Former Opelousas Police Chief Larry J. Caillier was sentenced Monday to 10 months of home confinement and ordered to pay $26,300 in restitution for a scheme to win unearned federal grant money.

U.S. District Judge Richard Haik chose not to put the ex-chief behind bars, citing Caillier's record as a military veteran, long-time State Police trooper and leader of the city's Police Department for 15 years.

"You had a tremendous, bright future, which is now not very bright," Haik said.

Caillier declined to comment after the court hearing and made only a brief statement to the judge, apologizing for "an incident that happened on my watch."

Caillier and one of his top officers were accused in a federal investigation that focused on a $225,000 U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development grant for bicycle patrols at public housing projects in Opelousas from 2000 to 2003.

Federal prosecutors allege that Caillier and former Maj. Ronnie Trahan Sr. were involved in a scheme to falsify records to receive grant money for patrols that were never done.

Caillier pleaded guilty earlier this year to a federal false-claims charge but has maintained that he did not orchestrate the scheme.

DOJ_NMG_0088913

He admitted only not intervening when he learned Trahan was allegedly falsifying time sheets.

Caillier's attorneys said Monday that the estimated $23,000 to $26,000 the ex-chief was paid under the grant was for legitimate supervisory work.

Charges are pending against Trahan in the case.

Trahan told investigators that Caillier directed him to falsify time sheets to ensure that the Police Department billed $3,000 every two weeks, regardless of whether the money was earned by patrolling officers.

A federal false-claims charge carries a maximum of five years in prison.

Caillier was facing a recommended sentencing range of from six months to 12 months in prison under federal sentencing guidelines, which are based on a person's criminal history and the severity of the crime.

Retrial Sought In Perjury Case (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

Federal prosecutors say they have new evidence against Joann Wiggan, acquitted earlier on four of five charges linked to the Pellicano probe.

Federal authorities announced Monday that they will retry a former phone company employee acquitted last month of four of five charges in the first trial resulting from the wiretapping investigation of indicted private investigator Anthony Pellicano and others.

Citing "compelling" new evidence in the case, Assistant U.S. Atty. Daniel Saunders told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer that the government would again prosecute Joann Wiggan for perjury for allegedly lying to a federal grand jury last October when she said she never retrieved a single message from her voicemail account at work. The jury last month hung on that charge.

Additionally, Saunders said, he expects a superseding indictment with additional charges against Wiggan to be returned in two weeks. She was found not guilty on four other felony counts of lying about her contacts with former co-worker Ray Turner, who is accused of illegally accessing telephone company records for Pellicano and assisting him in his alleged wiretapping. Saunders and co-prosecutor Kevin Lally declined further comment about the alleged new evidence or additional charges.

After the brief hearing, Wiggan's attorney, David Reed, expressed dismay at the government's decision.

"We are troubled and concerned at the timing of this new evidence, which I am unable to talk about at this point," Reed said outside court. "And I will look at whether motions are appropriate to dismiss the superseding indictment prior to trial."

On advice of her attorney, Wiggan did not comment.

Last month, Reed likened Wiggan's acquittal to "David beating Goliath," saying that the divorced mother of three withstood "tremendous pressure" from prosecutors and federal agents to plead guilty to perjury.

Though separate from the larger Pellicano case, the prosecution of Wiggan arose from the same FBI probe of the former private eye and allegations that he and others used a variety of illegal means, including wiretaps, to benefit his clients. He, Turner and other defendants have denied the charges.

During Wiggan's four-day trial, prosecutors produced a 23-page log of phone calls to and from Wiggan's home, office and cellphones between late 1998 and 2002, alleging that the records proved that she was lying when she said she had no contact with Turner and had not begun using her office voicemail until sometime in 2003.

The logs showed more than 1,000 calls from Wiggan's phone numbers to her voicemail, 117 calls from Turner's number to her office voicemail, and other calls between numbers assigned to Turner and Wiggan.

But Wiggan and her attorney attributed her misstatements to forgetfulness or innocent oversights. In addition, Wiggan's ex-husband and eldest son also testified that they had made numerous calls to her office voicemail.

Unlike two other former SBC employees who admitted helping Turner, Wiggan took the stand in her own defense to insist that she had not illegally provided him with information or even spoken to him in years.

Though the nature of the new charges was not disclosed, the government's questioning of Wiggan during the recent trial suggested that the new charges could relate to alleged inconsistencies between statements before the federal grand jury and before the trial court.

Newport Beach Man Sentenced In Fraud Case (OCR)

By Ryan Hammill, The Orange County Register

Orange County Register, October 31, 2006

Illya Bond handed eight years in federal prison for various charges connected to energy investment scam.

The former CEO of a defunct Los Angeles energy company who participated in a fraudulent investment scheme was sentenced to eight years in federal prison at the United States District Court in Los Angeles on Monday.

Illya Bond, 57, of Newport Beach, was also ordered by District Court Judge Percy Anderson to pay over $2.4 million in restitution to victims of fraud involving the PowerSource Corporation, a fraudulent company he formerly helmed.

A federal jury convicted Bond on charges of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud and making a false statement to special agents with the FBI in a January decision.

He is the last in a series of seven defendants with ties to the company to be convicted and the sixth sentenced. A previous defendant died before the penalty phase of his trial.

Bond helped create fraudulent sales materials that were provided to investors prior to the company's collapse.

KCAL-TV, October 31, 2006

(CBS) LOS ANGELES A Newport Beach man who headed a bogus energy company was sentenced Monday to eight years in federal prison for his lead role in an investment con.

Illya Bond, 57, orchestrated the scam, which bilked more than 100 people out of more than $2.4 million, according to prosecutors.

He was chief executive of Los Angeles-based PowerSource Corp., which was formed after California's electricity market was deregulated. Investors from across the country, who were lured via spam e-mail, a Web site and telemarketing calls, paid $10,000 for units in a series of limited liability partnerships that were supposed to finance PowerSourc e, according to the government.

PowerSource went out of business in 2001 when the scam collapsed, prosecutors said.

Bond, who also used the name Frank Akberry, was convicted in January of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud and lying to FBI agents.

In addition to the prison time, he was ordered to pay more than $2.4 million in restitution.

PowerSource's president, San Marcos resident E. Douglas Mitchell, was convicted of similar charges after a 2004 trial in Florida, but died before he could be sentenced, according to the government.

Three other California men, Ronald W. Johnson of Rancho Santa Margarita, James V. Miles of Bakersfield and Gary Spink of Menifee, and three people from Florida were also convicted in that state. They received sentences ranging from six months to five years in prison, prosecutors said.

Many Sex Offenders Restricted Tonight (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

Many sex offenders, limited in where they can live or work, are under another restriction today: no costumes, no candy giving, no jack-o'-lanterns, no welcoming front-porch lights.

Some states go further to protect children on the holiday. At least 10 states keep a special eye on sex offenders via house arrest or required meetings, through such programs as Operation Boo in California and Operation Trick No Treat in Virginia.

In New Mexico, a convicted pedophile or violent sex offender who lives alone has, for the first time this year, a sign outside his door today that notifies the public of his offense, says Tim Olsen, a regional manager of the New Mexico Corrections Department. He says offenders must stay inside and keep outside lights turned off.

"They're on virtual house arrest. They can't answer the door unless there's an emergency," and police will drive by to check, he says. "We can't expect all parents will be out there. We want to make sure kids are safe on Halloween."

New Mexico, New Jersey, South Carolina and Tennessee are into their second year of precautions, although Tennessee only recently announced its restrictions after phone calls from anxious parents.

"We wanted the public to know we're taking steps to protect children," says Jack Elder, spokesman for the Tennessee Board of Probation and Parole.

In Virginia, which began its Halloween program in 2002, high-risk sex offenders on parole or probation must report to offices where they are held for several hours while kids go trick or treating. "We try to make it a meaningful experience" by providing counselors and updates on registration rules, says Jo G. Holland, regional director of the Virginia Department of Corrections.

Some states have had Halloween restrictions for years but are increasing surveillance. New York, which requires offenders to stay home between 3 p.m. and 6 a.m., is making checkup calls and unannounced visits.

Violators can be arrested. Robert Goldman, a former Chicago-area TV sportscaster, got six months in jail for violating his probation by handing out candy last Halloween.

The restrictions generally apply only to people on probation or parole, a fraction of the 566,782 sex offenders registered nationwide. In Tennessee, the Halloween restrictions apply to 2,000 of 8,100 registered offenders, Elder says.

Most sex offenders are under no "meaningful supervision," and the Halloween rules are a "desperate effort to do something good," says Grier Weeks, executive director of the National Association to Protect Children, an advocacy group. "It's always good to keep kids from going up the steps of a known sex offender."

Laura Ahearn welcomes the restrictions. "A candy bar represents an opportunity for a sexual predator to start the process of grooming a child," says Ahearn, director of Parents for Megan's Law, a child-advocacy group.

Number Of Police Killed, Assaulted Dips (WP/AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The number of police officers nationwide who were killed by criminals while on the job in 2005 dipped slightly from a year earlier, FBI data released Monday show.

An estimated 1,800 fewer cops were assaulted during the same time period _ the lowest total since 2001.

Nearly all of the officers killed _ 55 in 2005, down from 57 in 2004 _ worked for city police departments, according to the FBI's annual report.

All but one of the slain officers were men, who on average were 37 years old with a decade of law enforcement service. More than half of them _ 28 _ were killed in a swath of southern states stretching from Delaware to Texas. Forty-seven of the officers were white; eight were black.

Traffic duty proved to be the most lethal assignment for the officers, the report shows.

Fifteen cops were killed during traffic pursuits or on traffic stops, compared with eight slain while making arrests and another eight who were ambushed. The rest of the killings came while breaking up family quarrels, investigating suspicious activity, transporting prisoners and other duties.

Additionally, 67 officers were accidentally killed on duty last year, down from 82 in 2004.

Another 57,546 police officers were assaulted while on the job in 2005, down from 59,373 in 2004. The largest number of assaults came in the early morning hours, from midnight to 2 a.m., while police were breaking up bar fights, family quarrels and other disturbances.

The FBI's assault data were collected from 10,032 law enforcement agencies nationwide, serving 75 percent of the population.

City Fears Crime Report Fallout (SLPD)

By Jeremy Kohler, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 31, 2006

Here we go again: A publisher in Kansas, using a formula decried by criminologists, says St. Louis is the most dangerous city in the United States. And city officials are fuming.

As the buzz lifted from Sunday's World Series parade, the ranking kept national media focused here. The storyline? St. Louis: First in baseball, first in crime. Detroit finished second in both.

All the attention from the annual safety ranking by Morgan Quitno Press — a publisher of reference books and lists of statistics — had St. Louis officials seeing red — and not of the Cardinals variety.

But bogus or not, Rainford said, there is good reason to worry the ranking could hurt St. Louis.

Nancy Milton, spokeswoman for the St. Louis Convention & Visitors Commission, said she fielded phone calls Monday from convention planners concerned about what they were hearing. She declined to identify them.

"A majority of them say they're going to face questions from their boards of directors and their constituents, and they want to get ahead of those questions," she said. Milton said most seemed to understand that the ranking had little to do with the safety of conventioneers.

"Chicago had 448 murders and St. Louis had a regrettable 131, but I don't think anyone is going to stop going to Chicago," she said.

Morgan Quitno's assessment is based on a given city's rates last year in six crime categories — murder, rape, robbery, aggravated assault, burglary and auto theft — as reported to the FBI. The firm, in Lawrence, Kan., scored cities against national averages in each category and added the scores, weighting each crime the same.

Richard Rosenfeld, a criminologist at the University of Missouri at St. Louis, said Morgan Quitno's methodology is flawed because it compares places like Memphis, which includes miles of outlying areas, to St. Louis, where the city limits barely extend from the urban core.

"Does St. Louis have a crime problem? Yes, sure, it has a crime problem, and every big city has a crime problem. Like every big city, it's worse in some areas than others," he said.

Using the same methodology, the St. Louis area ranked 129th most dangerous out of 344 metro areas, said Morgan Quitno's president, Scott Morgan.

He said such lists are what they are, and he's not surprised this one draws some criticism. "I am stunned if there is a criminologist out there who will support this," he acknowledged.

St. Louis last held the mantle of shame in 2002, but sloughed it off. It finished no higher than fourth in intervening years, and lost this year in a landslide, Morgan said.

A bad finish was not a surprise, as reports of violent crimes surged 20 percent last year to their highest levels in seven years.

On Monday, the city struck back, decrying the timing of the release and the methodology behind the ranking. Morgan Quitno usually releases its study around Thanksgiving.

"I've got to give them credit," Rainford said. "They don't know anything about crime or statistics but they do know something about public relations."

Rainford, a former PR man, blasts Morgan Quitno every fall. (Last year: "worthless"; two years ago: "charlatans".) On Monday, he said City Hall was ratcheting up the city's defense.

Morgan said he did not purposefully release the report to coincide with the World Series; he said it was released earlier than in other years because his firm received crime data from the FBI earlier.

"I am fine getting fried by people who want to go after this thing and say there is not a problem in St. Louis," he said.

Not that everyone was unhappy. Some 900 miles away, Gwendolyn Faison, mayor of Camden, N.J., told the Associated Press that her day was made.

Her hard-luck community held the mantle the past two years. Without the most dangerous title, "There's a new hope and a new spirit," she said.

St. Louis Mayor Disuptes Crime Ranking (BVND)

By Christopher Leonard

The Belleville News Democrat, October 31, 2006

ST. LOUIS - Mayor Francis Slay makes no bones about it: Morgan Quitno Press is dead wrong to call St. Louis the most dangerous city in the United States.

"It's bogus," Slay said of the group's annual ranking released Monday. "To suggest that St. Louis is more dangerous than Miami, New Orleans, Los Angeles and Chicago - it just doesn't make any sense."

The study placed St. Louis atop the most dangerous list after murders in the city jumped nearly 20 percent between 2004 and 2005.

Slay took issue with the study's methodology. He said the group used population figures from the U.S. Census Bureau that were too low, exaggerating the crime statistics. The city previously challenged the Census Bureau's figures, getting the population estimate bumped up from roughly 330,000 people to 353,000 people.

Scott Morgan, president of Morgan Quitno, said he used a population estimate of 346,000 derived from an FBI report. Changing the figure to 353,000 doesn't change St. Louis's ranking, Morgan said.

Slay also repeated a long-standing criticism of the ranking, which only looks at crime within St. Louis city limits. More than 1 million people live in suburbs outside the city and including them in the study would greatly dilute the overall crime rate, Slay said.

Morgan basically agreed. He said city's like New York City benefit in the rankings because they include higher-income and lower-crime areas like Stanton Island.

But St. Louis still beat out several cities like Philadelphia and Detroit that have a similar population divide, Morgan said.

"St. Louis is not unique in being a core city surrounded by affluent areas that are in a different jurisdictions," he said. The whole purpose of the ranking is to send up a "red flag" for high-crime cities and promote discussion, Morgan said.

Slay acknowledged there are high-crime neighborhoods inside the city that push up the rate of murders and robberies, and he said the city is doing something about it.

City voters passed an increase in business license fees this year that will raise more than $3 million annually for law enforcement programs, Slay said.

The city is in the process of hiring and training 40 new police officers and launched a program in the prosecutor's office to crack down on career criminals.

Slay said there is simple proof the city isn't as dangerous as Morgan Quitno makes it out to be. The downtown population is steadily increasing as new lofts, restaurants and offices are being built.

"People are coming to the city, they like the city. They feel safe here," Slay said.

KPD Says "most Dangerous Cities" List Flawed (KNOXNS)

By Staff And Wire Reports

ST. LOUIS -- A surge in violence made St. Louis the most dangerous city in the country, leading a trend of violent crimes rising much faster in the Midwest than in the rest of nation, according to an annual list.

The city has long fared poorly in the rankings of the safest and most dangerous American cities compiled by Morgan Quitno Press. Violent crime surged nearly 20 percent in St. Louis from 2004 to last year, when the rate of such crimes rose most dramatically in the Midwest, according to FBI figures released in June.

"It's just sad the way this city is," resident Sam Dawson said. "On the news you hear killings, someone's been shot."

Knoxville Police Chief Sterling P. Owen IV was not immediately available for comment. KPD spokesman Darrell DeBusk said the study appears flawed as far as Tennessee numbers are concerned.

Law enforcement agencies in Tennessee use a more comprehensive and detailed crime reporting system than that used in most other states.

"It's like comparing apples to oranges," he said. "All Tennessee law enforcement agencies use an incident based reporting system, versus the Uniform Crime Report system that most law enforcement agencies in the county use."

In Tennessee, four separate crimes will be reported if, in a single incident, a house is burglarized, the homeowner stabbed, the house vandalized and the homeowner's car is stolen. "But in the uniform crime report system, all of that is reported as a single crime, the most serious one."

The FBI has recommended the incident based system as more accurate, but only a few states have adopted it so far, DeBusk said.

St. Louis' unwanted top ranking came as the city was still celebrating Friday's World Series victory at the new Busch Stadium. St. Louis has been spending millions of dollars on urban renewal even as the crime rate climbs.

Mayor Francis Slay did not return calls to his office seeking comment Sunday.

Scott Morgan, president of Morgan Quitno Press, a private research and publishing company specializing in state and city reference books, said he was not surprised to see St. Louis top the list, since it has been among the 10 most dangerous cities for years.

The study looks at crime only within St. Louis city limits, with a population of about 330,000, Morgan said. It doesn't take into account the suburbs in St. Louis County, which has roughly 980,000 residents.

Visiting St. Louis on Thursday, FBI director Robert Mueller said it was too early to tell why some types of crime were rising faster in the Midwest.

Mueller said the FBI is working harder to form partnerships with police departments to launch programs like St. Louis' Safe Streets task force, which focuses police efforts on problematic neighborhoods.

The safest city in 2005 was Brick, N.J., with a population about 78,000, followed by Amherst, N.Y., and Mission Viejo, Calif. The second most dangerous city was Detroit, followed by Flint, Mich., and Compton, Calif.

The bad news for St. Louis was good for Camden, N.J., which in 2005 was named the most dangerous city for the second year in a row.

Camden Mayor Gwendolyn Faison said Sunday she was thrilled to learn that her city no longer topped the most-dangerous list.

"You made my day!" said Faison, who has served since 2000. "There's a new hope and a new spirit."

Cities are ranked based on more than just their crime rate, Morgan said. Individual crimes such as rape or burglary are measured separately, compared to national averages and then compiled to give a city its ranking. Crimes are weighted based on their level of danger.

The national FBI figures released in June showed the murder rate in St. Louis jumped 16 percent from 2004 to 2005, compared with 4.8 percent nationally. The overall violent crime rate increased nearly 20 percent, compared with 2.5 percent nationally.

While crime increased in all regions last year, the 5.7 percent rise in the 12 Midwestern states was at least three times higher than any other region, according to the FBI.

Candidate For Mayor Disputes Louisville's Ranking Among Top 10 'Safest Cities' (WAVE-TV)

By Janelle MacDonald

(LOUISVILLE) -- The annual list of the safest and most dangerous cities in the country was released Monday, and a couple of Kentuckiana cities were on it. Louisville made the list of the 10 safest large cities for the second year in a row. But some say the question of how safe we really are depends on how you look at it. WAVE 3's Janelle MacDonald investigates.

A company called Morgan Quitno has compiled the list for the past 13 years, using FBI crime statistics on murder, rape, robbery, aggravated assault, burglary and motor vehicle theft. This year Louisville comes in at number eight.

But like so many things right now, the ranking has turned in to a political issue, with some saying it proves crime fighting efforts are working here, and others saying just the opposite.

Just how safe do you feel in the city of Louisville? If you believe the latest rankings, you should feel pretty good, with Louisville at number eight, just behind other large cities like San Antonio, Texas and San Diego, California.

Shortly after visiting with school children Monday morning, Louisville Mayor Jerry Abramson said the ranking is proof things are working here in the River City.

"The fact that we've been able to hold our own in the top 10 once again, I think says a lot about the police department, says a lot about Chief White and his leadership, and it also says a lot about the citizens that are joined with us in our community policing effort."

But this being political season, obviously, there may be some different opinions.

Councilman Kelly Downard has made crime a major part of his own campaign for mayor and he disagrees with the Louisville's ranking, calling it a "fluke."

"We do not have a safe city," Downard said. "When we have children being killed on Cherokee Road, and Buechel and in Victory Park -- in the same week, three people murdered -- we've got a problem."

Downard says another list put out by the same company tells a different story. That list ranks Louisville 185th out of 344 in metropolitan areas.

Downard says Louisville's inclusion in the other "large cities" list is misleading because it includes areas formerly a part of Jefferson County.

"What they did was, they added the entire county, where there is less crime, and said therefore we have less crime in our city because we've added 400,000 people and not many more crimes."

Mayor Abramson doesn't see it that way. "When you look at cities like Indianapolis that have had significant problems, Nashville has had significant problems, when you look at the cities that have consolidated, you know we really show up well when you talk about a city of 700,000 people."

Downard says Louisville is included in a category with notoriously rough major cities like Detroit and New York City, and points out, the metro comes in behind the Big Apple on the current ranking.

He says Louisville should compare itself to its past history, and says if you do that, crime has risen every year since the merger. But the mayor says major violent crimes like murder and robberies are down overall.

A couple of Kentuckiana cities also made the safest lists. Elizabethtown came in at number 17 on the list of overall safest metropolitan areas. That city became a metro area with the 2000 census.

Columbus, Indiana, just north of Seymour, is number 11 on that same list, just six spots ahead of E'Town.

WLNS-TV, October 31, 2006

It's a list no city wants to top, a list of the most-dangerous cities in the United States. A new list is out and Saint Louis tops the list of most-dangerous cities. Two Michigan cities follow- Detroit at #2 and Flint ranks third. Lansing ranks as the 96th most-dangerous city.

The new list gives the perception Lansing isn't that safe, but the Lansing Police Department says their numbers tell a different story. An independent research company put together the latest list of most-dangerous cities. The company based their rankings on FBI crime numbers in six categories- murder, rape, robbery, aggravated assault, burglary and motor vehicle theft.

According to the company's method, Lansing comes in as the 96th most-dangerous city in the country, and the third most-dangerous city in the state.

Lt. Bruce Ferguson: "We don't agree with their numbers."

The Lansing Police Department says the company omitted many other crimes for its list, like arson or drug arrests. Therefore, the department doesn't believe the numbers give an accurate picture.

Lt. Bruce Ferguson: "Homicides in the past several years have decreased, motor vehicle thefts, we have seen a steady decrease in crime in Lansing in the past decade."

While all crime can't be prevented, Ferguson adds the city has actively tried to keep the crime numbers low.

Ferguson says there's always room for improvement. He says the Lansing Police Department is always trying to find new programs targeting areas, like domestic violence, where the department sees the most problems.

CHARLOTTE, N.C. -- Charlotte has been named one of the most dangerous big cities in the country, but police say the ranking is wrong.

The national research firm out of Kansas that compiled Crime In The United States ranked the Queen City the eighth most dangerous city in the United States with a population above 500,000.

Morgan Quitno Press used Federal Bureau of Investigation numbers to determine how safe the cities are. Charlotte-Mecklenburg police, however, say the group shouldn't compare cities using that method, and it's misleading.

"The extent to which we enjoy a safe community depends on everybody in the community accepting some responsibility for helping deal with the environment and the situations that help create crime," said Charlotte-Mecklenburg Police Department Chief Darrel Stephens.

He also said not all of the FBI numbers are used in the ranking, so the data is selective.

The CMPD is constantly working to make the city safer though. After a hike in robberies and homicides last year, the department formed the Street Crimes Task Force to focus on the city's crime hotspots and has already seen a reduction in those kinds of crimes.

The change has people in Charlotte feeling pretty safe. People who spoke with Eyewitness News said they were surprised to hear where the study placed the Queen City.

"I think the safety thing is just scary, that we can't come to the park and not feel like we're comfortable and our children can run around without us having all eyes or ears on them," said mother Alli Murr.

Parent Angela Lamkin agreed.

"It is a little bit concerning, especially being a mom with a young child," she said. "I guess we just pick the safest places we can be."

The CMPD also said that violent crime is down this year, which should help the city in next year's rankings.

According to the study, Brick, N.J., is America's safest city and St. Louis, Mo., is the United States' most dangerous city.

In The Most Secure Town, A Most Pleasant Afterglow (NSL)

By Maryann Spoto, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), October 31, 2006

The day after it was named the safest place in the nation, Brick Township was soaking up the good press.

"Did you hear?" Chris Diedrich, a fitness instructor, asked her morning step class at Brick Fitness for Women. "It's all over the news. Brick is the safest city in the country."

But some were more than a little suspicious. After all, wasn't the Ocean County municipality located near some pretty nice little Jersey Shore towns that seem synonymous with safe?

"It's a great title to have, but I want the people of Brick Township to know that it's not because crime doesn't occur," said Scott Pezarras, Brick's acting business administrator, sounding a bit cautionary on a day City Hall was brimming with smiles.

So was the honor bestowed on Brick Township a sign the burgeoning bedroom community is a bit of utopia in a densely packed Northeast? Or was it more statistical anomaly?

Turns out it's a bit of both.

The survey in question, an analysis of FBI crime statistics by a Kansas publishing concern that tends to attract huge national press each year, does have a few quirks. Most notable in the case of Brick Township is the fact that the company, Morgan Quitno Press, looks only at municipalities of 75,000 people or more.

Brick Township is on the low side of that cutoff with an estimated population of 80,000. It joined only 11 other communities in the state in the study. In other words, 554 of New Jersey's 566 towns were excluded.

Scott Morgan, who heads Morgan Quitno, publisher of the book City Crime Rankings, said there is nothing wrong with that.

"Most people will accept these are the towns that they have heard about nationwide, and they want to know about," Morgan said.

The survey considers just 371 communities in the country. In New Jersey, Brick was up against mostly gritty cities like Newark, Camden, Paterson, Trenton and other places where extreme poverty and street crime have long gone hand in hand. Most of those places had the dubious distinction of winding up on the other end of the safe-cities ranking.

A few New Jersey places included in the study pool were similarly large suburbs -- Dover Township and Edison -- and they, too, fared very well nationally, 14th and 23rd, respectively.

That is because New Jersey's large suburbs and large cities are very different places, according to demographers who know the state well. They noted it is difficult to make meaningful comparisons of places that are so different.

Take Camden, for example, which is often listed as the most dangerous city in the nation in the study, but improved its standing by five notches this year.

Last year, the median income in Camden was $26,171, compared with $59,752 in Brick. The 2000 Census showed 83 percent of Brick's residents owned their homes, versus 46 percent in Camden.

"There has never been an easy way to make a comprehensive measure so that we can rank municipalities, no matter what it is," said James Hughes, a Rutgers University demographer. "There are always some nuances and codicils to what it is."

Hughes also said the size of the survey takes nothing away from Brick or its relative safety.

The No. 1 ranking for the township, which last year placed second in the national study, was cause for municipal joy.

"It's nice," he said of the honor. "It helps (the officers) do their job better."

Brick Township Council vice president Stephen Acropolis, head of the town's public safety committee, said he realizes the scope of the study was somewhat thin. But he said the police department still deserves credit for its work.

"We know we've had a great police department for years," he said. "It's just nice to get the national recognition."

Acropolis said he was bombarded with comments about the ranking from residents yesterday while he coached high school ice hockey.

"People know about it. They're very aware of it. Even when we were second-safest, they talked about it a lot," he said.

Kathy Botticelli, who has lived in town for three decades, said a friend e-mailed her a story about the ranking early yesterday morning.

"I'm just proud to be in a town that wants safety for everybody," Botticelli said as she stood outside the municipal building after paying her taxes.

Resident Margaret Roush said she feels safe in town as she stood in Windward Beach Park, watching her 2-year-old son Danny play on the jungle gym.

"It's a family community," Roush said. "I don't think it draws a lot of heavy crime. Between the families and the elderly, it's not that big a draw for crime."

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court Case: Are Jury Awards Too High? (CSM)

By Warren Richey

WASHINGTON

Jesse Williams smoked two packs of cigarettes a day for 45 years. Following his death in 1997 after being diagnosed with lung cancer, his wife, Mayola, sued the Philip Morris tobacco company seeking $100 million in punitive damages.

The Oregon jury that heard her case rejected the $100 million request. Instead, it awarded her $79.5 million.

Tuesday, the case arrives at the US Supreme Court where lawyers for Philip Morris are asking the justices to strike down the punitive damage award as constitutionally excessive and fundamentally unfair. The case, Philip Morris v. Mayola Williams, is being closely watched to see whether a majority of justices are willing to issue strict guidelines to identify when a punitive damage award is unconstitutionally excessive.

Lawyers for Philip Morris say the judge in the case allowed the jury to punish the tobacco company for alleged harms done to other smokers in Oregon beyond the specific harm suffered by Mr. Williams and his family.

They also argue that the $79.5 million award violates "guideposts" set by the Supreme Court in earlier cases barring punitive damage verdicts that are out of proportion to the harm done.

Lawyers for Ms. Williams counter that Philip Morris engaged in a massive and deadly fraud by pushing an addictive product on the public while concealing information it knew about the unhealthful effects of smoking.

Instead of supporting a government health campaign against smoking in the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s, the tobacco company cast doubt on research showing the deadly effects of smoking. The lawyers say Philip Morris launched a deceptive public campaign to offer a crutch and an excuse to its addicted customers so they would keep using their product. Under these circumstances, the lawyers say, the $79.5 million award is appropriate rather than excessive.

"Where a fraud is as monstrous as this one was in its willingness to put lives at risk for profit, strong medicine is required," writes Robert Peck, a Williams lawyer, in his brief. High Court has limited punitive damages

In recent years, the Supreme Court has moved toward limiting large punitive damage awards by establishing a three-part test. But the champion of that approach, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, has retired from the court and it is unclear how the newest members of the court, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, will view the issue.

In addition, some state courts have declined to strictly apply the high court's three-part test and have allowed large punitive damages.

"What is really at stake fundamentally is the Supreme Court's holdings on whether there is an outer limit to punitive damages," says Sherman Joyce of the American Tort Reform Association in Washington. "It seemed to us that the Oregon courts had not been faithful to the Supreme Court's holdings."

Trial lawyers and their supporters argue that the high court never completely closed the door on large punitive damage awards in cases involving extraordinarily reprehensible conduct. In such cases, they say, the size of punitive damage awards should be up to juries and to state lawmakers, rather than Supreme Court justices.

"Punitive damages throughout the history of our country have been a matter relegated to the states," says Edward Sweda of the Tobacco Control Resource Center at Northeastern University School of Law in Boston. "If Oregonians thought that punitive damage awards were too high, they could go to their lawmakers to enact a cap, but they have chosen not to do so." Jury told to consider other injured smokers

In the Williams case in Oregon, a lawyer for Williams urged the jury to consider not only how the tobacco company had injured his client but how other smokers in Oregon had been injured as well. The lawyer raised the issue in his closing argument even though the jury had heard no evidence concerning other Oregon smokers.

"When you determine the amount of money to award in punitive damages against Philip Morris ... it's fair to think about how many other Jesse Williams[es] in the last 40 years in the State of Oregon there have been," the lawyer said. "It's more than fair to think about how many more are out there in the future."

Philip Morris lawyers asked the judge to issue a special instruction to the jurors before their deliberations to make sure the panel didn't punish the company for hypothetical injuries allegedly suffered by other Oregon smokers - or potential injuries yet to be suffered by smokers in the future.

The judge refused. The $79.5 million punitive damage award was cut in half on appeal, but later reinstated. Ultimately, it was upheld by the Oregon Supreme Court.

Philip Morris attorney Andrew Frey says there is no historical precedent supporting the Oregon punitive damage award. "Only three years ago, this court held that a defendant cannot be punished in an individual action for harms to persons other than the plaintiff," he writes in his US Supreme Court brief.

Lawyers for Williams say the references to other Oregon smokers were intended to help jurors quantify the magnitude of the offense, not calculate individual punishments. "Philip Morris conflates consideration of total harm within Oregon and the enormity of the offense with punishment for the thousands of Oregonians also defrauded. The two are not the same," Mr. Peck writes in his brief.

In earlier decisions, the Supreme Court ruled that a judge assessing punitive damage awards must consider three factors before deciding whether the award should be struck down as excessive.

The three so-called guideposts are: the reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct, the ratio between the amount of compensatory damages awarded and the punitive damage award, and the difference between the punitive damage award and other civil or criminal sanctions that could be imposed for similar misconduct.

The courts in Oregon concluded that Philip Morris's conduct was so reprehensible that it outweighed the two other factors.

Under the ratio guidepost, the high court has suggested that most punitive damage awards should fall within a single-digit ratio of compensatory damages. In contrast, the ratio in the Philip Morris case is 97:1.

The last time the Supreme Court addressed the punitive damage issue in 2003, it left the door open for larger ratios in instances of "particularly egregious" conduct.

"Because there are no rigid benchmarks," Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote for the majority in a case called State Farm v. Campbell, these larger ratios may be acceptable "where a particularly egregious act has resulted in only a small amount of economic damages."

In the wake of that decision, several state courts have allowed sizable punitive damage awards, and some analysts suggest that those courts haven't been faithful to the Supreme Court's holding. Now the question is whether the court will close the door it left open in the State Farm case, or throw it wide open and allow state lawmakers and individual juries to decide how large is too large for punitive damage awards.

High Court To Hear Tobacco Firm's Appeal (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Jesse Williams, according to his widow, never gave any credence to the surgeon general's health warnings about smoking cigarettes.

When Williams contracted inoperable lung cancer after smoking two packs a day for 45 years, he told his wife: "Those darn cigarette people finally did it. They were lying all the time."

Nine years after Williams' death, the Supreme Court is considering this question: Can Williams' widow collect $79.5 million in punitive damages for fraud from the cigarette company Philip Morris USA?

To the dismay of anti-smoking groups, the Supreme Court agreed to hear the company's appeal of a jury verdict in Oregon.

Philip Morris, the maker of Marlboros, is struggling to turn back unfavorable rulings by Oregon state courts in the Williams case. One ruling upheld the jury award after the Supreme Court sent the case back to Oregon once before to make sure it conformed to a 2003 high court opinion limiting punitive damages.

Gary Lawrence, convicted of beating his wife's lover to death with a pipe and baseball bat then setting the body on fire, is asking the Supreme Court to allow the appeal of his sentence to proceed despite a lower-court ruling that he missed a deadline. Among Lawrence's arguments is that his lawyer, supervised by Florida courts, was responsible for timely legal filings.

In the case over punitive damages, the Williams family is counting on justices to find that Philip Morris' conduct was so reprehensible that it justifies exceeding guidelines the court has laid out in two rulings in the past 10 years that struck down large awards.

One difference is that the earlier cases did not involve physical injuries.

The company doesn't deny making public statements rejecting a link between smoking and cancer; rather, it says there's no evidence Williams ever heard the statements or ever read them.

The court also will be looking at the decision of the state courts that declared it acceptable for the jury in the Williams case to consider harm by Philip Morris to other smokers for conduct similar to that which allegedly injured Williams.

Three years ago, the U.S. Supreme Court said in a different case that a defendant cannot be punished in an individual lawsuit for harm to people other than the plaintiff.

The cigarette company says the approach of the Oregon courts is collective punishment in an individual action, a violation of due process. Philip Morris complained that the nonparties in the case were never identified, their individual circumstances were not presented in court, and there was no way for a defendant to respond to allegations of widespread harm.

The jury awarded Williams' widow, Mayola, $800,000, in actual damages, a ratio of 97 to one. Justice Anthony Kennedy said three years ago that the ratio of punitive to compensatory damages rarely should be higher than nine to one.

The company says that under long-established practice, when compensatory damages are substantial, the constitutional maximum punishment is between zero and four times the amount of compensatory damages.

The cases are Philip Morris USA v. Williams, 05-1256, and Lawrence v. Florida, 05-8820.

Assessing The Damages (NYT)

The Supreme Court has been struggling to address the thorny question of when, if ever, punitive damages become so large that they violate the Constitution. The court made a good start when it laid down guidelines on when punitive damages are excessive. But eventually, it went too far. Today, it hears arguments in a case that offers a perfect opportunity to pull back to a more reasonable position.

The case involves Philip Morris's challenge to damages awarded to the widow of a smoker who died of lung cancer. An Oregon jury awarded Jesse Williams's widow, Mayola Williams, more than $821,000 in actual damages, and $79.5 million in punitive damages. Mrs. Williams said Philip Morris had engaged in 40 years of publicity to undercut concerns about cigarettes, even though it knew for most or all of that time that smoking was deadly.

The Oregon Supreme Court upheld the punitive damages award. The court said the conduct that Philip Morris was charged with "would have kept many Oregonians smoking past the point when they would otherwise have quit." It said the company's "deceit thus would, naturally and inevitably, lead to significant injury or death."

The Supreme Court has already indicated that at some point punitive damages become so large that they violate due process. But it has done a poor job of identifying that point. Originally, it laid down some reasonable factors for lower courts to consider, including how reprehensible they considered the defendant's conduct. But in 2003, the court put forth the dubious proposition that punitive damages should generally be in a "single digit" ratio to actual damages — so with actual damages of, say, $100,000, punitive damages should be under $1 million.

Constitutional principles can seldom be boiled down to a formula, and it is difficult to see why the court should rein in juries so tightly. The purpose of punitive damages is, the Supreme Court has noted, "punishing unlawful conduct and deterring its repetition." In cases of extremely bad conduct, particularly when a defendant is large and willful, a bigger award may be necessary. In this case, $79.5 million does not strike us as unreasonable. Nor do we see any basis for holding that this jury verdict, affirmed in a thoughtful decision by Oregon's highest court, is a denial of Philip Morris's due process rights.

A final problem with the Supreme Court's rule of thumb on punitive damages is that it has been far less restrictive when it comes to punishing people. In 2003, the court held that California did not violate the ban on cruel and unusual punishment when it sentenced a man under its three-strikes law to 50 years for a theft of $153.53 worth of videotapes. That is a far more disproportionate punishment than Philip Morris got, for far less offensive conduct.

By Brett Barrouquere, Associated Press

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - Kentucky can continue to enforce laws requiring small cigarette companies to make payments to help cover smoking-related health costs, a federal appeals court ruled Monday.

The ruling means the state can continue collecting escrow payments from small cigarette companies that did not participate in the 1998 master settlement agreement between tobacco companies and 52 states and U.S. territories. Attorneys said it was the first ruling by a federal appeals court addressing the issue of whether states can force smaller companies to make the payments.

The landmark agreement in 1998 required payments to be made over 25 years and settled all of the state's lawsuits over the public costs of treating sick smokers. More than 30 states passed laws requiring nonparticipating cigarette-makers to make escrow payments.

A three-judge panel from the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati turned away a challenge from three companies that said Kentucky laws effectively barred the businesses from selling tobacco in the state.

Chicago-based Tritent International Corp.; DWI, LLC; and Cibahia Tabacos Especias, a Brazilian company, each of which imports discount cigarettes, filed the lawsuit. A federal judge in Frankfort rejected the companies' claims in September 2005, prompting the appeal.

The three tobacco companies had argued that Kentucky's laws were pre-empted by the federal Sherman Antitrust Act, which is aimed at preventing monopolies.

Kentucky's laws require companies that didn't take part in the master settlement agreement to place funds into an escrow account. The amount to be paid is based on their cigarette sales in Kentucky. The money is held for 25 years to cover any future medical costs resulting from those companies' tobacco products.

The state keeps a list of which companies make the payments. Any company not on the list is barred from selling cigarettes in the state.

Because Kentucky's laws treat every cigarette the same, whether or not it took part in the master settlement and every seller is required to pay the same amount of money per pack sold, the federal antitrust act doesn't pre-empt the state law, the appeals court ruled.

"They simply require that all tobacco companies - whether or not they choose to join the MSA - make payments to the state or face blacklisting from the Kentucky market," Judge Ronald Gilman wrote for the panel.

The companies also claimed the laws created an illegal cartel made up of the states and the tobacco industry.

Michael Plumey, an assistant Attorney General in Kentucky who worked on the case, said the cartel allegation "sounds really bad," but the ruling should help put that issue to rest.

"This decision strongly rejects that idea," Plumey said. "There was no anticompetitive cartel created by these statutes."

Four other appeals courts - the New York-based 2nd Circuit, the St. Louis-based 8th Circuit, the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit and the 10th Circuit in Denver - are currently considering similar challenges.

Plumey said the decision isn't binding with the other appeals courts, although it could be filed there as part of the cases in an effort to affect the outcome.

"It could have a persuasive effect," Plumey said. "We hope that it will."

Tenet Selling Infamous Hospital (MEMBIZ)

Memphis Business Journal, October 31, 2006

The hospital that helped launch Tenet Healthcare Corp. on a painful four-year odyssey with the Department of Justice now has a new owner.

Tenet announced late Friday that it had reached an agreement with a physician-owned company to take over the 306-bed Alvarado Hospital Medical Center in San Diego. The new owner, Plymouth Health, will pay $36.5 million for Alvarado, with the money going into Tenet general funds. The sale is expected to be completed by Dec. 31.

Alvarado came under scrutiny four years ago when the Justice Department looked into the hospital's physician recruitment efforts, including the payment of some physician relocation expenses. The law is vague on the subject and two California juries were unable to reach a verdict in a case that was filed in 2003.

Tenet agreed to sell Alvarado as part of a deal to drop the case.

Dallas-based Tenet (NYSE: THC) operates acute care hospitals in 13 states, including 519-bed Saint Francis Hospital in East Memphis and 100-bed Saint Francis-Bartlett.

Tenet has sold other properties, including some in Florida and Louisiana, in a company-wide effort to become smaller and more focused.

Arrests Made In Smuggling Probe In Ariz. (AP)

By ARTHUR H. ROTSTEIN, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 31, 2006

TUCSON, Ariz. — More than 40 people were arrested Monday in connection with a family-run smuggling ring that brought hundreds of illegal immigrants into the country, officials said.

The 44 arrests came after a two-year investigation into the ring, which operated out of the southern Arizona town of Bowie, officials said. Many of those arrested are American citizens, officials said. Eleven more suspects, including at least five Mexican nationals, remained at large Monday.

The ring recruited young women to smuggle migrants' infants through ports of entry, posing as their mothers, while the parents were smuggled through the desert separately, said John Lewis, the FBI special agent in charge in Arizona.

The operation smuggled people from Mexico into the U.S. for more than 10 years — most from Mexico, but also from El Salvador and the Dominican Republic, Lewis said.

"This network organized, housed, fed, guided and transported large numbers of illegal aliens across the border," said Paul K. Charlton, U.S. attorney for Arizona.

The suspects were named in an indictment this month. They included the suspected ring leader, Pablo Esteban Juarez, 31; his wife, Lori Gutierrez Juarez, 30; guides who walked people across the border; drivers who transported illegal immigrants; and "money runners" who picked up smuggling fees.

Officials said each migrant was charged between $500 and $800 to be smuggled from Agua Prieta, Mexico, to Bowie, about 83 miles east of Tucson. They would be charged more — typically around $2,000, and sometimes even higher — to be moved from Bowie to their destination.

People paid the ring more than $500,000 in the past four years, Lewis said.

The indictment charged that members of the ring were involved in a conspiracy to transport and harbor illegal immigrants and to launder money for profit.

There were no telephone listings for the Juarezes in Bowie. It was not immediately known whether they had lawyers or whether they were American citizens.

44 Seized In Migrant Smuggling Syndicate (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, October 31, 2006

More than 150 federal agents, sheriff's deputies and police officers swarmed over the tiny southern Arizona town of Bowie on Monday, cracking down on a family-owned syndicate suspected of smuggling thousands of illegal immigrants into the United States.

By day's end, at least 44 suspects had been arrested on criminal counts of conspiracy and money laundering. Fifty-five defendants are listed in a 728-count federal grand-jury indictment.

Although the so-called Juarez Alien Smuggling Organization is based in Bowie, federal agents also made arrests in nearby Willcox and in New Mexico, California, Minnesota and Ohio.

"This is not just a couple of coyotes," said Deb McCarley, an FBI spokeswoman. "This was the entire organization from top to bottom that we took down."

The bust came on the same day the Border Patrol announced that arrests along the U.S.-Mexican border were down 8.5 percent in fiscal 2006 from the year before. Officials attributed the decline to tougher enforcement.

According to the indictment, Pablo Esteban "Stevie" Juarez, 31, of Bowie, oversaw a highly organized gang that had been in existence for at least 10 years. The U.S. Attorney's Office also identified his wife, Lori Juarez, 30, as a leader. Officials believe Pablo inherited the gang from his father, Marcos Ruiz Juarez, and his brother, Marcos Abel Juarez. All three also were indicted.

"This was not just any family business," said Paul Charlton, U.S. attorney for Arizona, adding that the ring transformed Bowie into "a major staging area for the movement of illegal aliens to the Phoenix hub."

Undocumented immigrants were assembled south of the border and guided into Arizona or New Mexico before being driven to drophouses in Bowie, about 80 miles east of Tucson on Interstate 10.

Immigrants paid up to $2,000 to the coyotes, and the indictment lists more than 700 Western Union money wires as smuggling fees. Those funds were sent to Bowie from all across the nation.

"This affects every state in the United States, not just Arizona," McCarley said.

Bowie, an unincorporated community in Cochise County, is barely more than a roadside stop with a burger stand and gas station surrounded by pecan and pistachio groves.

The extended Juarez family accounts for a significant portion of Bowie's population of about 700. Bruce E. Brown, the local school superintendent, said there are 110 students in the community, and many saw parents or relatives taken away in handcuffs Monday. Brown said administrators spent the afternoon finding relatives to take children who no longer had adult supervision at home.

"It probably affected a third of my kids," he said. "We had a lot of children that were pretty upset today."

McCarley said the case was developed with intelligence gathered by the Cochise County Sheriff's Office and the Border Patrol. Those agencies were joined by the FBI, Immigration and Customs Enforcement and Willcox police in a two-year investigation of the syndicate, which used a motel and two houses to warehouse immigrants.

Forty-five weapons were seized. Investigators said the smugglers used guns to protect themselves and to intimidate illegal immigrants.

McCarley said some gang members were paid to bring undocumented immigrant babies through vehicle checkpoints along the border, posing as parents, while the real mother and father were smuggled into the country. In some instances, the infants were drugged to ensure they would not make a fuss.

McCarley said the family also charged competing coyotes a "tax" to use smuggling routes in the area.

The suspects made initial appearances Monday in U.S. District Court in Tucson. Each is charged with conspiracy, which carries a maximum prison sentence of 10 years. The majority of suspects also were indicted on charges of money laundering, which also has a 10-year maximum sentence.

Attention, Voters: Have Your ID Ready In Many States, New Rules On Identification At The Polls Spark Confusion, Controversy By CHRISTOPHER CONKEY (WSJ)

May I see your ID?

Americans are used to hearing that question at airports and in bars, but on this Election Day many will also hear it when they go to the polls.

That's because nearly half of the states have passed laws -- many since widely publicized irregularities in the 2000 presidential race in Florida -- requiring voters to prove their identity before they're allowed to cast a ballot. It sounds like a simple plan, but these laws are sparking confusion, partisan rancor and a frenzy of legal challenges in the days leading up to the midterm election. Luckily for voters, they have to know the current rules only in their own state. And any voter in any state is entitled to cast a provisional ballot if he or she encounters a problem at the polling place. States do, however, vary on how they determine whether a provisional ballot is later counted and how long a voter has to come back and prove his identity.

In Arizona, a proposition passed in 2004 requiring residents to show ID was struck down this month by a federal court only to be reinstated by the U.S. Supreme Court. Arizona Secretary of State Jan Brewer said the lower-court ruling stirred "a lot of questions, confusion and anger," and that poll workers are now being retrained to apply the law. Linda Brown, executive director of the Arizona Advocacy Network, says she spent primary day last month outside a polling station talking to frustrated voters who weren't allowed to cast provisional ballots for lack of proper ID.

"The most disturbing thing we witnessed were poll workers who were ill-informed and making it up as they went along," Ms. Brown says.

In Georgia, a state judge in September overturned a new law requiring every voter to show a photo ID at the polls. The ruling came just as the state elections board was mailing informational letters to some 305,000 registered voters whose names didn't show up on the state's list of licensed drivers and thus might lack valid photo IDs. The first 200,000 letters were already out the door, and the board's Republican member in charge of voter education decided to mail the rest after the ruling, leading to charges that he was deliberately misleading likely Democratic voters.

"The point was to tell these people, 'Hey, you can't really vote,' and suppress their turnout," said David Worley, a Democratic member of the board.

To try to clear up the matter, which has led to a call for a Justice Department investigation, the Georgia elections board has been running public-service announcements and is sending the same group of voters a new letter telling them to disregard the earlier one. "To the extent that there was any confusion, we've corrected it," said Republican board member Tex McIver, whose decision on the mailing put him at the center of the storm.

The courts have upheld Indiana's photo-ID requirement so far, but a federal appeals court will rule on it after the election. Missouri's Supreme Court declared the state's ID requirements invalid this month, saying the state couldn't prove any instances of voter fraud at the polls. Ohio officials will defend some of their ID rules in court tomorrow.

In all of the disputes, voter-identification laws tend to break down along party lines. Republicans generally support the laws, saying they are necessary to rebuild trust in the voting process. Democrats say that in-person voter fraud is extremely rare and that ID laws do more harm than good by disenfranchising elderly, disabled, low-income, minority and other voters who might not have the right documentation.

In Minnesota, Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty recently pushed for the state legislature to adopt a photo-ID requirement, saying 32 noncitizens had registered to vote since 2004, and 11 of them had actually cast ballots. Brian Melendez, chairman of the state's Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party, says the proposal is "using a cannon to swat a fly." He figures the 32 registrations constituted 0.001% of the state's registered voters.

The movement toward stricter voter verification comes after Congress passed the Help America Vote Act in 2002. The law has spurred a raft of new voting machines in polling places across the country. It also required first-time voters who register by mail to provide identification before they can vote. What's more, a commission led by former President Jimmy Carter and former Secretary of State James Baker in 2005 recommended a nationwide voter-ID requirement.

California, New York and 22 other states don't go much further than the minimal HAVA requirement for first-time voters. But many states have set additional rules. Texas, Ohio and 17 other states require some form of identification, such as a utility bill or paycheck. Louisiana and South Dakota encourage registered voters to bring photo IDs but still allow them to cast a regular ballot without them if they sign an affidavit. Kansas and Pennsylvania require all first-time voters to show identification at the polls.

Despite the best efforts of many election officials and civic-participation groups, though, some election officials say confusion among some voters and poll workers on Election Day is inevitable given the hodgepodge of new laws and the legal battles surrounding them. "I'm personally worried that there's going to be some voter confusion over what's required," says Deborah Markowitz, president of the National Association of Secretaries of State.

At a time when many precinct workers are also coping with new electronic voting machines and new statewide registration databases, the identification rules add to the confusion. "Conditions are good for bad things to happen," says Doug Chapin, director of electionline.org, a nonpartisan group that tracks election reforms. He fears that many poll workers "may ask for ID when it's not required."

Electionline.org1 and canivote.org2, a Web site run by the National Association of Secretaries of State, both list voter-ID rules by state.

Many of the new in-person voter requirements don't apply to absentee or early voters, a fact often derided by opponents of voter-ID laws since the most-documented type of voter fraud involves absentee voting.

But efforts to beef up ID requirements for absentee and early balloting have ended up in the courts, too. In Ohio, a federal judge put the new absentee voting ID rules on hold, saying they were vague and applied inconsistently across the state. The Republican secretary of state, J. Kenneth Blackwell, didn't want the ruling appealed so close to the election. "We did not want there to be conflicting court rulings and confusion added to the process," said James Lee, a spokesman for Mr. Blackwell's office.

But the state's Republican attorney general, Jim Petro, who lost to Mr. Blackwell in the primary for governor in May, filed an appeal anyway. On Sunday, an appeals court sided with Mr. Petro, reinstating the identification rules for absentee ballots, and once again raising questions about how those ballots might be counted.

By Bob Davis

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Smartmatic Corp., whose voting machines will be used in midterm elections next week, says it adopted a complicated ownership structure to minimize taxes and protect intellectual property, and not to mask any control by Venezuela's government.

Smartmatic, which is owned by Venezuelan entrepreneurs who split their time between Boca Raton, Fla., and Caracas, has been caught up in a government probe over foreign ownership. On Election Day, Smartmatic equipment will be used in 16 states, including Florida and California, and the District of Columbia.

The actions of the voting-machine company are being reviewed by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S. The committee reviews foreign acquisitions to see if they pose national security concerns.

Most reviews by the committee occur before an acquisition is completed -- and publicity engendered by the probes can kill a deal. This year, for instance, a company owned by the government of Dubai, a Persian Gulf emirate that is part of the United Arab Emirates, was forced to back away from plans to run commercial operations at several U.S. ports, amid an outcry on Capitol Hill.

With Smartmatic, the pattern is reversed. The company bought a U.S. voting-machine company, Sequoia Voting Systems Inc., in 2005, and the panel is only now starting a formal review. While a review could end in a recommendation for a divestiture, such an action would be rare. A committee spokeswoman recalled just one instance in which a review resulted in a divestiture. In 1990, the first Bush administration ordered China to sell a U.S. maker of aircraft parts.

The Smartmatic purchase has drawn attention because of concerns that the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, an opponent of U.S. policies, has a stake in the company. Smartmatic came to prominence in 2004 when its machines were used in an election to recall President Chávez, which Mr. Chávez won handily -- and which the Venezuelan opposition say was riddled with fraud. Smartmatic put together a consortium to conduct the recall elections, which included a company called Bizta Corp., in which Smartmatic owners had a large stake. For a time, the Venezuelan government had a 28% stake in Bizta in exchange for a government loan.

Bizta paid off the loan in 2004, and Smartmatic bought the company the following year. But accusations of Chávez government control of Smartmatic have dogged the company since. In addition, late in 2004, Smartmatic scrapped a simple corporate structure, in which it was based in the U.S. with a Venezuelan subsidiary. It adopted a complex offshore structure, with headquarters in the Netherlands Antilles; a main subsidiary in the Netherlands and a variety of subsidiaries in the U.S., Barbados, Venezuela and Mexico.

That also led to concern that the structure was designed to mask foreign ownership. "The opaque nature of Smartmatic's ownership is particularly troubling since Smartmatic has been associated" with the Venezuelan government, Rep. Carolyn Maloney, a New York Democrat, wrote to Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson this month. The Treasury Department is the lead agency in the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S..

At a news briefing yesterday, Smartmatic's 32-year-old chief executive, Antonio Mugica, presented a simpler explanation: tax reduction. The combination of setting up in the Netherlands and Dutch Antilles produces "a very beneficial tax treatment with the confines of the law," said Smartmatic's attorney, Jeffrey Bialos. Mr. Chávez and the Venezuelan government have no ownership stake in the company, Mr. Mugica said.

In 2004, when the company changed its corporate structure, it debated how much of the company's earnings it should report to the U.S. or the Bahamas, where it also had a subsidiary. Smartmatic said three of its Venezuelan managers own about 91% of the company. They are Mr. Mugica, with 78.8%; Chief Technology Officer Roger Pinate, with 8.5%; and Chief Financial Officer Alfredo Anzola, with 3.9%.

The Cfius review appears to be just into its 30-day period. If the government decides to look further, it starts a 45-day investigation, which can end in a recommendation to the president to take action.

Voting Machine Firm Denies Chavez Ties (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

The nation's third-largest supplier of electronic voting machines said yesterday that it asked the federal government to review its purchase by a company controlled by Venezuelans to allay concerns that it is influenced by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

The company, Smartmatic Corp., and its subsidiary, Sequoia Voting Systems Inc., are being investigated by the Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States.

The CFIUS, which probes international business deals with defense or national security implications, received national attention this year when it cleared the purchase of a major provider of U.S. port security by a Dubai-based company, a transaction that fell apart after uproar on Capitol Hill.

Smartmatic representatives yesterday said that the Venezuelan government does not own and has never owned any part of the company. "No foreign government from any country has ever held a stake in Smartmatic," said the company's chief executive, Antonio Mugica.

The CFIUS investigation was first reported by the Miami Herald over the weekend, but Smartmatic confirmed in a news conference yesterday that it was cooperating with -- and had asked for -- the investigation.

In May, after concerns about the company's ownership structure began to circulate, Smartmatic dismissed the idea of a CFIUS investigation, saying Sequoia's products "do not fall within the parameters of the matters governed by CFIUS."

Jeff Bialos, a Washington lawyer representing Smartmatic and Sequoia, said that Smartmatic decided to request the inquiry to clear up "unfounded accusations" that have "persistently dogged" officials of both companies. "The company is in a policy of full disclosure with these issues," he said.

The development comes before the midterm elections, which will be a major test of the reliability and security of new electronic voting machines. A breakdown in the use of Sequoia voting machines in the March primary in Chicago gave rise to questions about Smartmatic's corporate structure, which is based in the Netherlands Antilles in the Caribbean but owned by Venezuelan nationals.

Generating more concern is the hostile relationship between the United States and Chavez, who called President Bush "the devil" last month. In 2004, opposition groups questioned the results of an unsuccessful 2004 recall election -- run on Smartmatic technology -- that tried to oust Chavez. International observers cleared the election.

"Given the state of the relationship between President Bush and President Hugo Chavez right now, the idea that a Venezuelan firm might be responsible for programming our voting machines is a legitimate concern," said Robert Pastor, executive director of the Commission on Federal Election Reform at American University.

Smartmatic International Group is owned primarily by foundations controlled by three Venezuelans -- Mugica, Roger Pinate and Alfredo Anzola. It was a small company until it beat out Nebraska-based Election Systems & Software in 2004 for a contract to provide voting technology in Venezuela. With millions in profits from that contract, Smartmatic bought Sequoia last year from a British company for about $16 million. Sequoia supplies electronic voting machines to at least a dozen states and the District.

Bizta, a start-up technology company in Venezuela with some of the same owners as Smartmatic, received a $150,000 grant from a financing arm of Venezuela's government before the 2004 recall. In exchange, Bizta pledged nearly 30 percent of the company shares and a seat on the board to the government. Bizta has been folded into Smartmatic, and Mugica said the grant, which he characterized as a loan, has been repaid. He added that a government representative never showed up at board meetings.

Venezuela's government said yesterday that it had no ownership in Smartmatic. "The Chavez administration does not have any type of relationship with the Smartmatic Corporation," said the Venezuelan ambassador to the United States, Bernardo Alvarez.

Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-N.Y.), ranking member on the House committee that oversees the CFIUS, asked the Treasury Department in May to review Sequoia's acquisition. "The ownership of the company that makes machines that we use to exercise our democracy should also be looked at from a national security perspective," Maloney said yesterday.

Election experts said the Smartmatic concern would not be pressing if voting machine companies were more open about their technology. "If things were done truly transparently and it was auditable and there was accountability, it wouldn't really matter," said Warren Stewart, executive director of VoteTrust USA. "Unfortunately, that is not the case."

E-Mail Voting Comes With Risks (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Time was when soldiers, if they wanted to vote, had to request ballots by snail mail, fill them out and return them the same way.

The process typically took weeks.

This year, thousands of soldiers around the world have the opportunity to vote in the Nov. 7 elections by e-mail. It's part of a Pentagon effort to make it easier for overseas military personnel to cast ballots in federal and state elections, and it reflects how the Internet has changed life in the combat zone.

But computer security experts inside and outside the government warned that the Pentagon's Federal Voting Assistance Program ignores the risks associated with unencrypted e-mail: interception, hacking and identity theft.

"E-mail traffic can flow through equipment owned and operated by various governments, companies and individuals in many countries," Joel Rothschild, a Navy Reserve captain, said in an August report prepared for the Pentagon. "It is easily monitored, blocked and subject to tampering."

A separate report by four outside computer security experts released last week raised similar red flags and added that the use of unencrypted e-mail for registering overseas voters invited identity theft.

"No bank would ask their customers to send Social Security numbers over unencrypted e-mail," said the report's co-author, David Wagner, a professor of computer science at the University of California at Berkeley. But that is what the system allows, he said.

Rothschild's report noted that e-mails can be encrypted to reduce tampering risks. Pentagon officials said states would need to arrange for that provision.

States have options for getting ballots to and from voters. They can fax, e-mail or mail the ballots, or use a combination of the methods. The federal government began the use of faxed ballots in 1990, with troops stationed in the Persian Gulf for Operation Desert Shield. E-mail is an option in those states that allow it; at the moment eight do. Mississippi was the first, allowing troops overseas to vote by e-mail in a 2003 gubernatorial election.

Neither the Pentagon nor state officials say they track how many of the 294,000 military personnel overseas are voting by e-mail. That information is held at the county level, state elections officials said.

In Colorado, Jefferson County elections official Shawna Weir said she has received three ballots that soldiers sent by e-mail. The service members -- two in Iraq and one on a ship -- e-mailed their ballots to a federal facility in Virginia, which then faxed them to the county.

They were all "very eager to vote," Weir said, noting that they had called her to make sure they could get their ballots.

The combination of faxing and e-mail "is about as dangerous as you can get," Wagner said. "It's got all of the problems with unencrypted e-mail, plus your ballot is being routed through the Department of Defense. Will soldiers feel free to vote their conscience when they know that the DOD may be able to see how they voted? How do we know that the DOD or their contractors haven't modified soldiers' ballots in transit?"

J. Scott Wiedmann, deputy director of the Federal Voting Assistance Program, said the operators at the federal facility cannot alter e-mail content, which is sent in "read-only" format. Voters are also encouraged to mail in an original copy of their ballot as a backstop, he said.

Soldiers faxing and e-mailing their ballots also must sign waivers saying they understand that somebody might see their ballot, Wiedmann said. "There's no U.S. constitutional guarantee to a secret ballot," he said.

Joni Ernst is a county elections official in Iowa and a major in the Iowa Army National Guard who served in Iraq from 2003 to 2004. She delivered mail to the troops and saw how long it could take, so she is glad that soldiers have the e-mail option. Most every camp has an Internet cafe for soldiers, and if the voting process is simple, she said, the troops are more likely to vote.

"Their time is very limited," Ernst said. "We don't want to detract from the mission. But we want to make sure their vote counts."

Campaign To End Race Preferences Splits Michigan (NYT)

By Tamar Lewin

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

ANN ARBOR, Mich., Oct. 25 — Three years after the Supreme Court heard Jennifer Gratz's challenge to the University of Michigan's affirmative action policy, she is still fighting racial preferences, this time in a Michigan ballot initiative.

"We have a horrible history when it comes to race in this country," said Ms. Gratz, 29, a white applicant who was wait-listed 11 years ago at the state's flagship campus here. "But that doesn't make it right to give preference to the son of a black doctor at the expense of a poor student whose parents didn't go to college."

The ballot initiative, Proposition 2, which would amend Michigan's Constitution to bar public institutions from considering race or sex in public education, employment or contracting, has drawn wide opposition from the state's civic establishment, including business and labor, the Democratic governor and her Republican challenger. But polls show voters are split, with significant numbers undecided or refusing to say where they stand.

Passage would probably reinvigorate challenges to a variety of affirmative action programs in other states. In California, where a similar proposition passed in 1996, the number of black students at the elite public universities has dropped. This fall, 96 of 4,800 freshmen at the University of California, Los Angeles — 2 percent — are black, a 30-year low.

For the University of Michigan, the proposition would require broader changes than the Supreme Court did; it ruled in Ms. Gratz's case and a companion case that while the consideration of race as part of the law school's admissions policy was constitutional, a formula giving extra points to minority undergraduate applicants was not.

The president of the university, Mary Sue Coleman, an opponent of the proposition, said its reach could extend into K to 12 education.

"It would make it illegal to have our program targeting girls in junior high school, and having them come to campus to learn about science and engineering," Ms. Coleman said. "I'm a woman scientist, and I know how fragile our gains are."

Such arguments have resonance in Ann Arbor, where the Democratic headquarters is doing a brisk business in "No on 2" yard signs.

"We need to keep affirmative action because it's still not a level playing field for women or minorities," said Gena Morris, who is black, an event planner who volunteers at Democratic headquarters.

Susan Greenberg, a widow whose husband was a University of Michigan professor, took home a yard sign recently, saying, "It's probably the most important thing on the ballot."

Just 20 miles north of the liberal university enclave, in Brighton, there is less familiarity with the proposition but more opposition to affirmative action.

"I don't know a lot about Proposition 2, but I do know a neighbor kid, a good kid, a local kid with a 3.7-3.8 average, who didn't get into the university and he should have," said Vicki Smith, who is white, shopping one afternoon at Kohls department store. "I do think there's something wrong with their admissions."

Pollsters, in fact, say the Nov. 7 results may well turn on whether the measure is seen primarily as a race issue.

"If voters think about it as being about race, black and white, support goes up," said Ed Sarpolus, vice president of EPIC-MRA, a polling firm in Lansing. "So the opponents are trying to show that it's not just race, that it would hurt women, hurt Michigan's economy, and they're having some success with that."

Though most of the debate on the proposition has been about race and college admissions — four out of five Michigan residents are white — the ballot initiative is also playing out against the state's somber economic picture of high unemployment, high migration of young people and a wrenching transition away from manufacturing.

Opposition to Proposition 2 is strongest in majority-black Detroit and a few liberal strongholds like Ann Arbor. Like California's Proposition 209, which passed in 1996, Proposition 2 has been backed by Ward Connerly, a wealthy black Republican who is a former University of California regent. If Mr. Connerly is successful in Michigan, and maybe even if he is not, he is likely to carry the fight to other states.

"When my toes turn up, that's when I'll stop fighting this," said Mr. Connerly, who has provided nearly $500,000 for the Michigan Civil Rights Initiative, the group Ms. Gratz leads. "As John F. Kennedy said," he continued, "race has no place in public life."

As of Oct. 20, the group had raised $1.4 million and spent $782,000.

Ms. Gratz, who grew up in a working-class suburb of Detroit, graduated among the top 15 in a high school class of about 300. But she only made the wait list for the Ann Arbor campus of the University of Michigan and never returned the postcard that would have kept her on the list for available spaces.

She graduated from the University of Michigan-Dearborn with a math degree and became a product manager at a technology company. She also pursued the suit against the university. She called Mr. Connerly soon after the Supreme Court ruled on her case, and they began working on the Michigan proposition. It has been her full-time job for three years.

Opposition to the measure is led by One United Michigan, an unusually broad coalition that includes Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm, a Democrat, and her Republican challenger, Dick DeVos, as well as unions, churches, businesses and higher education and civil rights groups. It has raised and spent $3.3 million.

"We have the A.C.L.U. sitting with the Michigan Catholic Conference on the steering committee, which is something you don't see very often, " said David Waymire, a coalition spokesman. "There isn't a big Michigan voice on the other side. But it's tough. Two years ago, the initial polling found more than two-thirds supported the proposition. The miracle is that we've gotten it into a winnable range."

Coalition members said Proposition 2 would hamper employers' efforts to diversify their work forces. They said it would also force some local governments to eliminate outreach and set-aside programs for minority contractors and would diminish the already-meager representation of black and Hispanic students at the flagship university here.

"It would be like slamming a door on progress," Ms. Coleman said. "I will do everything that's legal to help us attract minority students. But it's already having a chilling effect."

This year, the freshman class at the Ann Arbor campus has 330 blacks, or 6.4 percent, down from the high of 499 in 2001, and from 350 in the year after the Supreme Court case, when a new admissions process was adopted. Over all, blacks make up 7.2 percent of the undergraduates. But there are other ways to look at the numbers.

The Center for Equal Opportunity in Virginia, which supports the proposition, released an analysis of University of Michigan data finding that black applicants who were accepted by the university had lower grades and SAT scores than white applicants who were admitted. The median SAT for black students who were admitted was 1160 in 2005, it said, compared with 1350 for whites.

The center said the university now weighed race and ethnicity even more heavily than before the Supreme Court ruling.

The university disagrees. "Their analysis is flat-out wrong and carefully calculated to achieve a political outcome," said Julie Peterson, a university spokeswoman.

She said that the center overlooked factors added to the admissions process after the ruling, like recommendations, essays and extracurricular activities, and that the data on which the center based its conclusions did not include all applicants.

Ms. Peterson and others at the university emphasized that because there were so many white applicants and so few blacks, an end to affirmative action would not substantially increase white students' odds of admission. In their book, "The Shape of the River," Derek C. Bok and William G. Bowen estimated that if selective universities had race-blind admissions, the probability of white students' admission would rise only slightly — to 26.5 percent from 25 percent — while black students' admissions would decline by half.

Wade Henderson, executive director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights said the proposition would help determine the future of affirmative action.

"Michigan is ground zero in the national debate on the meaning of equal opportunity," Mr. Henderson said. "It's really important that we stop this, before Ward Connerly takes the battle to other states."

But in many quarters here, public support remained strong, which Ms. Gratz said indicated just how much Michigan's power brokers were out of touch with voters.

"The entire elite establishment is all lined up on the other side of this issue," Ms. Gratz said, "but the mainstream, normal, everyday people who go to work every day think their husbands, their wives, their kids, should be treated equally by our government, and should not be judged on race or sex."

Court Upholds Ban On Enforcement Of Abortion Warning Law (FINDLAW/AP)

By Chet Brokaw, Associated Press Writer

(AP) - PIERRE, South Dakota-South Dakota cannot enforce a 2005 law that would require doctors to give additional warnings to women who seek abortions, a federal appeals panel ruled Monday.

In a 2-1 ruling, the panel of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a lower court's ruling that has prevented the state from enforcing the law. Planned Parenthood, which challenged the measure, has demonstrated a likelihood it will win in its argument that the law violates the U.S. Constitution, the panel said.

The law, passed by state lawmakers in 2005, would require doctors to tell women that abortions end human lives and may later cause serious psychological problems for women who have abortions. A woman also would have to be told she has a legal relationship with her unborn child and that the relationship would be terminated by an abortion that would end the child's life.

U.S. District Judge Karen Schreier of Rapid City issued an order preventing the state from enforcing the law while the lawsuit proceeds. The judge said Planned Parenthood has a fair chance of succeeding on its claim that the law violates the free-speech rights of doctors.

The state argues that the required information is medically accurate and supported by science. State lawyers contend the law would not curb reasonable access to abortion in South Dakota.

The South Dakota Legislature this year passed a much more restrictive law, which would ban nearly all abortions in the state. South Dakota voters will decide the fate of the abortion ban in the Nov. 7 election.

Ban On Abortions Trails In New Poll (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

A South Dakota ballot measure to ban almost all abortions in the state is likely to fail by a wide margin, a new poll says.

Fifty-two percent of 800 likely voters said they would vote "no" next week on a law banning all abortions except to save the life of a mother, according to the poll, conducted for the Argus Leader newspaper in Sioux Falls, S.D.

An additional 42 percent of voters said they would vote "yes" for the ban, and 6 percent were undecided, according to the survey, which had a margin of error of 3.5 percent and was released in the newspaper's Sunday edition.

The poll shows that "voters are seeing through the campaign of misinformation and lies" from the ban's supporters, said Jan Nicolay, co-chairwoman of South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families. "There is a growing consensus that we should keep all options open for women whose health is in jeopardy and for victims of rape and incest."

Leslee Unruh, campaign manager for VoteYesForLife .com, which supports the ban, said yesterday she's seen recent polls that "show us neck and neck."

"The only poll that counts is on Election Day, and we intend to win," she said, adding that if yard signs, bumper stickers and other signs of support are any indication, the VoteYesForLife side is winning.

Earlier this year, South Dakota lawmakers passed a law making it a criminal offense to perform an abortion except to save the life of the mother. The law, which was signed by Republican Gov. Michael Rounds, finds that "life begins at the time of conception" and that a pregnant mother and her unborn child "each possess a natural and inalienable right to life."

The law is on the ballot because South Dakota law allows a newly passed law to be put before the voters if enough signatures are collected asking for it.

Pro-choice advocates see the law as a challenge to the Supreme Court's 1973 ruling in Roe v. Wade, which says that it is unconstitutional for states to ban abortions. Planned Parenthood Federation of America, which is part of the coalition opposing the ban, says the ban must be defeated to protect Roe and women's right to have an abortion.

The campaign has been ugly at times. The VoteYesForLife Web site has posted pictures showing their "Vote Yes on 6 For Life" signs vandalized with a big black "X" or a red coat hanger. The coat hanger is a referral to pre-Roe days, when women reportedly used coat hangers to rid themselves of unwanted pregnancies.

The Argus Leader said the new poll, taken by Mason-Dixon Polling & Research, shows that opposition to the ban has grown stronger with time. A similar poll taken for the newspaper in July found that 47 percent of South Dakotans opposed the ban, 39 percent supported it and 14 percent were undecided.

By Mary Otto, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

When the $60 million Baltimore City Juvenile Justice Center opened in 2003, it was hailed as the kind of solution Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) had promised when he campaigned for office.

Within a year, independent monitors were describing conditions there as bad as those in the state's most notorious juvenile jails. A U.S. Justice Department report this summer found that the center has failed to "adequately protect children from youth violence."

When Cheltenham Youth Facility shut down several of its dilapidated cottages in January 2004, advocates heralded a move toward smaller, more specialized centers. But today, some of the state's jails remain so crowded that teenagers sleep on the floor.

"The system has gotten worse in the last four years," Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, Ehrlich's Democratic challenger, said in a recent interview. "We're writing off too many young lives."

The governor defends his efforts, saying in a recent debate, "We have made great strides on our juvenile justice system. We've changed the whole paradigm there."

Ehrlich did not mince words about the troubled system when he ran for governor four years ago and laid the blame squarely on his Democratic opponent, Kathleen Kennedy Townsend. As lieutenant governor, Townsend had taken on juvenile justice as a priority.

But problems with violence and mismanagement ran deep in many of the nearly two dozen state-run facilities entrusted with more than 2,000 young offenders. The state's juvenile boot camps had been shut down because of brutality.

"The history of juvenile services in Maryland -- up to and including the present," Ehrlich asserted then, "is one of devastating dysfunction that has ruined children's lives."

The Republican who would become the next governor promised a new era and a "child first" approach. He would rename, and redeem, the Department of Juvenile Justice.

But violence and trouble persist. Inspections continue to reveal dangerous conditions, staff shortages, chaotic classrooms, mismanagement and crowding. Despite a boot camp debacle in the past, Ehrlich's administration, too, tried the military approach, with bad consequences.

Officials at what is now called the Department of Juvenile Services say there were no quick fixes for the broken system and the damaged children they oversee, but they can point to some hopeful signs.

"It's by no means a perfect system. But it doesn't mean we haven't moved in that direction," said Juvenile Services Secretary Kenneth C. Montague Jr. "There has been a large, large change."

But advocates say the political stakes make it hard for officials to admit there are problems in the system.

"How can you fix anything you can't admit to?" asked Ralph B. Thomas, former head of the Office of the Independent Juvenile Justice Monitor under Ehrlich and his Democratic predecessor. Ehrlich "inherited a mess, and the mess continues."

Montague said the State Department of Education is slowly taking over schools in the facilities and is scheduled to be running them all by 2012. Drug courts in a growing number of counties are offering some youths a chance at treatment.

Two facilities with long histories of trouble, Cheltenham and the Charles H. Hickey Jr. School in Baltimore, have been downsized, although there was a stabbing at Hickey this month. Two small youth detention centers, one on the Eastern Shore and one in Western Maryland, have opened.

Cheltenham and Hickey are being monitored by teams of juvenile justice experts following a 2005 settlement between the state and the Justice Department following claims of civil rights violations.

Educational programs have improved considerably at both facilities in the past year, said Peter Leone, a University of Maryland professor on a team for the two institutions. "It's safe to say there have been dramatic improvements," he said.

Yet elsewhere, observers have documented chaos. Patrick J. Elder, a Bethesda teacher, tried working at the Alfred D. Noyes Children's Center in Rockville for one day last spring -- then handed in his resignation.

"What I saw was disgusting," he said. "The kids had no pencils, no paper, no books." While two guards sat and chatted in the back of the room, he said, he tried unsuccessfully to get the attention of the 19 boys. Five were playing poker; three were wrestling on the floor.

Independent monitors at the center found similar chaotic conditions. Montague said Noyes presents special challenges because the high cost of living in Montgomery County makes it hard to pay and retain good staff members. In response to staff and teacher shortages there, salaries were recently raised.

Problems persist at the new Baltimore facility, as well, according to the Justice Department.

"We find that children confined at the Justice Center suffer significant harm and risk of harm from the facility's failure to: (i) adequately protect children from youth violence; (ii) adequately safeguard youths against suicide; and (iii) adequately provide behavioral youth services," the department said in an August report.

Montague said he disagrees with the findings. "There were no systemic constitutional violations there" last year, he said, "and there are none now."

After the Lower Shore DRILL Academy opened in Salisbury in late 2003, under the management of the Wicomico County Sheriff's Department, the state began referring young offenders there, including Phil Sisler of Elkton, then 16, who had gotten into trouble for fighting.

His mother, Monica Sisler, hoped the place would give her son positive male role models and a sense of discipline. Then allegations of abuse started to circulate. Phil said boys were regularly forced to drink until they vomited and were lined up to vomit upon one another. His mother became alarmed and fought to bring him home.

After five months there, the department removed him and other students. The academy was closed down and has not reopened.

Montague said the state acted swiftly once the problems came to light. "As soon as we knew what was happening, we took our kids out."

Battle For The ACLU (USAT)

By Nat Hentoff

This powerful civil liberties organization is in crisis, and impassioned supporters of its mission want change now. It's up to the national leadership to listen — and to resign.

The most serious crisis in the history of the American Civil Liberties Union was caused by the decision of its leadership in 1977 to defend the First Amendment right of an American Nazi organization to march in Skokie, Ill., where many Jews, including Holocaust survivors, lived. Adhering to its basic principle cost the ACLU about 30,000 members. The Illinois Supreme Court eventually upheld the ACLU's action, and the U.S. Supreme Court refused to review that ruling.

In the direct line of fire for months was David Goldberger, then legal and legislative director of the ACLU of Illinois. I was covering the case, and whenever I or others called him, Goldberger didn't acknowledge his identity until the caller identified himself or herself.

“I got thousands of angry calls,” Goldberger, a professor of constitutional and First Amendment law at Ohio State University's law school, recently told me. “I had to screen those calls.”

Goldberger still litigates cases for the ACLU as a volunteer lawyer, but he has become involved in another crisis of the organization involving its fundamental principles: He has joined ACLU members, donors, former staffers and board members, as well as civil liberties activists, supporting a website called SavetheACLU.org. The board of the South Carolina ACLU has also signed on. All are opponents of the present leadership — Executive Director Anthony Romero and President Nadine Strossen.

The signers' Mission Statement for SavetheACLU.org emphasizes: "We believe … the ACLU is especially important now during a time of grave and systematic attacks on civil liberties by the national government. But an ACLU compromised by its repeated failures to practice what it preaches will be unable to resist these attacks for long."

Since its founding in 1920, the ACLU has been resisting and litigating against overreaching government, but never before has there been an administration so convinced that national security overrides individual liberties — while armed with an unprecedented range of surveillance technology. If this widening internal battle over its principles continues to grow, the ACLU's credibility among the citizenry at large will diminish as the war on terrorism continues indefinitely. The greatest cost will be to all of us, not only civil libertarians, in successive administrations controlled by either political party.

Particularly providing momentum to this rebellion was the decision of Romero's longtime predecessor as executive director, Ira Glasser, to become a leader of the opposition after initially remaining silent. In "Why I Join," on the website, Glasser speaks of the ACLU leadership's "loss of … candor and its commitment to honesty and its growing intolerance for dissent and free speech within its own ranks. Such intolerance cannot be contained … (and can change) the instincts and reflexes that drive the ACLU's mission." As Save the ACLU's Mission Statement says, "These breaches of principle include the ACLU's approval of grant agreements that restrict speech and associational rights; efforts by management to impose gag rules on staff and to subject staff to e-mail surveillance; a proposal to bar ACLU board members from publicly criticizing the ACLU; and informal campaigns to purge ACLU of its internal critics."

These incursions on ACLU employees' civil liberties have silenced public dissent by them, as documented in an e-mail last Dec. 20 to the ACLU national board by an "employee rights" group in the national office, including lawyers and projects staff, protesting these management practices. It was sent anonymously, the group wrote, because "the fear of reprisal for speaking out … is heavy, palpable and widespread."

Meanwhile, a counter website, VoicesfortheACLU.org, has been launched in support of the ACLU leadership and is backed by the executive directors of 18 state affiliates and six senior ACLU staff members. Yet this site does not erase any of the specific charges against the leadership.

Among the increasing number of other internal critics dedicated to the principles of the ACLU is Rosemary Armington. She and her husband, David, have for decades been major donors to the organization. In a statement on the website addressed to Strossen, she writes, "The ACLU needs to lead by example. Regrettably, over the past several years the examples have reflected breaches of fundamental ACLU principles, followed by withdrawals after public disclosures and superficial admissions of 'mistakes' — but without anyone held accountable."

In the website's "Current Controversies" category, David Kennison, of the national board as well as the South Carolina board, presents a resolution adopted by that state's board in June, which he amplifies: "The ACLU (National) Board is considering a policy proposal that would deprive board members of the long-standing rights to obtain tapes of board meetings and could require that all meeting tapes be erased after approval of minutes. … Why is the ACLU leadership anxious to deny board members their traditional access to meeting tapes? Why does the leadership want to erase our history?"

Public expressions of this resolve to save the ACLU from its leadership, including a largely complicit national board of directors, are simultaneously an inspirational and poignant embodiment of the very spirit of the ACLU.

The executive director and president of the ACLU could make a lasting contribution to saving the Constitution by resigning their posts. As Goldberger told The New York Times, "It's clear that the organization's leadership has let it drift away from its core principles, and without those principles, it has no value."

Nat Hentoff is a former member of the ACLU's national board and, before that, the New York board. He is an authority on free speech issues.

ANTITRUST:

U.S. Justice Dept. Probing Sony Unit (AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0088939

AP, October 31, 2006

TOKYO (AP) -- Sony Corp. said Tuesday that the U.S. Department of Justice is probing its electronics unit.

The company received a subpoena from the Justice Department's antitrust division seeking information about Sony's static random access memory, or SRAM, business, company spokesman Atsuo Omagari said.

Sony intends to cooperate with the investigation, which it described as an industrywide probe without elaborating. Omagari declined to provide other details about the probe.

SRAM is a kind of computer memory that is faster and more reliable that DRAM, or dynamic random access memory. It does not need to be refreshed like DRAM, and it is also more expensive.

SRAM is found in relatively small quantities in personal computers. It's also used in disk drives, communications equipment and networking gear.

In 2005, Sony produced 3.3 billion yen ($27.7 million) worth of SRAM. The product is made by outside manufactures for Sony, which in turn sells the memory chips to other electronics makers, Omagari said.

He would not say who manufactures the chips for Sony or who Sony's customers were.

Earlier this month, U.S.-based chipmaker Cypress Semiconductor Corp. said its SRAM operations were also under investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice.

A separate U.S. Justice investigation into price-fixing among DRAM companies has so far resulted in more than a dozen charges against individuals and more than $731 million in fines against Samsung Electronics Co., Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc.

High Court Denies Appeal By Chemicals Shipper (WSJ)

By MARK H. ANDERSON

Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday rejected Stolt-Nielsen S.A.'s last-ditch appeal to derail a federal indictment against it for price-fixing and other illegal cartel activities in the market for deep-sea chemicals shipping.

The decision by the justices, announced with a brief order, clears the way for federal prosecution of the company on an indictment issued by a Philadelphia grand jury in September. Justice Samuel Alito, who worked on the case as an appeals court judge, recused himself.

Stolt-Nielsen in 2004 became the first company to have amnesty revoked under the Justice Department's 13-year-old program. The company has waged an intense campaign to thwart Justice Department prosecution, arguing federal authorities wrongly canceled the amnesty agreement they had struck with the company that prevented its prosecution. Justice Department prosecutors, however, have argued in federal court that Stolt-Nielsen violated the terms of that agreement.

The Supreme Court in July and August twice turned away emergency appeals from the London-based shipping company before the indictments were announced. Stolt-Nielsen had asked the Supreme Court to review the ability of Justice antitrust officials to nullify the agreement without interference from federal courts.

The so-called parcel-tanker shipping industry moves liquids such as chemicals and oils across oceans. The Justice Department alleges the company and two competitors agreed to not compete and illegally discussed pricing and other matters with the goal of eliminating competition in the industry.

Last March, a panel of the Third U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia ruled that federal courts didn't have the power to block government prosecutors from pursuing the company and its officers because of the earlier existence of an amnesty deal.

"The division received the benefit of its bargain under the amnesty agreement and has no basis to breach it by prosecuting Stolt-Nielsen or its executives," Stolt-Nielsen said in an appeal brief.

The federal indictment against the company cites activity between August 1998 and November 2002. Conviction could result in as many as three years of imprisonment and as much as $350,000 in individual fines and $10 million in corporate fines. Indictments were also brought against two former executives of the company: Samuel Cooperman, a former chief executive, and Rick Wingfield, a former executive vice president.

US Rejects Business Amnesty Test Case (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

The US Supreme Court yesterday refused to put new limits on the power of prosecutors to indict American and foreign companies. The justices refused to hear a case involving Stolt-Nielsen, the Norwegian shipping company, which would have tested the right of federal prosecutors to rescind an amnesty agreement in an antitrust case.

Stolt-Nielsen volunteered information about antitrust violations in the parcel tanker market, in exchange for amnesty from the Justice Department.

But federal prosecutors later withdrew the amnesty and indicted the company, saying it breached its duty to co-operate.

"These kinds of government [amnesty] programmes are not going to be worth anything if companies continue to be treated like this company was in this case," says Robin Conrad of the National Chamber Litigation Center, legal arm of the US Chamber of Commerce, which argued that courts should have more power to enforce leniency deals.

Merck Agrees to $1.1B Deal for Sirna Therapeutics, a Developer of RNA-Interference Based

WHITEHOUSE SATTION, N.J. (AP) -- Pharmaceutical company Merck & Co. said Monday it agreed to buy Sirna Therapeutics Inc., which is creating a new way to develop therapies based on RNA interference, for $1.1 billion in cash.

Merck's $13-per-share bid offers almost a 102 percent premium over Sirna's closing price of $6.45, down 5 cents, on the Nasdaq. Sirna shares surged $6.10, or 94.5 percent, to $12.55 in aftermarket electronic exchange trading. The stock's 52-week high is $8.52, set in April.

Sirna's RNA interference technology offers a new way to develop medicines and shows great promise in cancer research, Merck said. Sirna's operations would complement RNA work Merck has been doing since its 2001 acquisition of Rosetta Inpharmatics Inc., the company said.

Sirna's leading clinical development candidate is for the treatment of the wet-form of age-related macular degeneration, part of a broad collaboration with Allergan Inc. in ophthalmic diseases.

Merck said stockholders holding 36 percent of Sirna's outstanding shares have already committed to support the deal, which still needs antitrust clearance to close. The two companies hope to complete the deal in the first quarter of 2007.

Merck shares fell 45 cents to close at $45.64 on the New York Stock Exchange, then gained 16 cents in aftermarket trading.

Merck & Co. increased its bet on a hot research field known as RNA interference by acquiring San Francisco-based Sirna Therapeutics Inc. for $1.1 billion.

Sirna focuses on developing drugs based on RNAi technology, which can silence the activity of some genes and creates the potential for new medicines that target specific disease-related genes. The field is thought to hold promise both for locating zones in a cell that cause illness and for creating medicines that attack them. Earlier this month, two U.S. scientists won the Nobel Prize in medicine for their late 1990s discovery of the gene-silencing mechanism.

The deal moves Merck into a leading position in the field, coming on the heels of its 2001 purchase of Rosetta Inpharmatics. That acquisition gave the Whitehouse Station, N.J., drug maker the tools to look closely at the genes in a genome. With Sirna, Merck will have the ability to target -- instead of just locate -- certain parts of a cell for destruction, said Mervyn Turner, Merck's senior vice president of world-wide licensing and external research.

Merck believes RNAi technology holds particular potential in cancer research because it could home in on genes that control cancerous cells, destroying them without harming surrounding normal cells.

Sirna only has a handful of drugs in development. Its most advanced treatment, which is in the second of three phases of human testing, is targeted at the wet form of age-related macular degeneration, a leading cause of blindness in the elderly.

Under the terms of the deal, which is expected to close in the first quarter of next year, Merck agreed to pay $13 a share in cash, or about $1.1 billion, for Sirna. That is double Sirna's 4 p.m. stock price on the Nasdaq Stock Market yesterday of $6.45. In after-hours trading, Sirna soared 97% to $12.68.

John Maraganore, president and chief executive of Alnylam Pharmaceuticals Inc., a Cambridge, Mass., competitor of Sirna, said the deal underscores the pharmaceutical industry's level of interest in RNAi. "We view it as an enormously positive endorsement for RNAi therapeutics as an important new class of drugs," he said.

It is unclear how the Sirna acquisition will affect a separate development deal Merck has with Alnylam. Mr. Maraganore said his company would continue to work with Merck as a partner on several potential therapies.

Google Inc. said Monday that it wants Microsoft Corp. to make sure users can easily choose Internet search engines in future products — but Google refused to say if changes Microsoft has already made to its upcoming operating system, Vista, have gone far enough.

David C. Drummond, Google's senior vice president of corporate development, spoke to reporters after meeting with European Union antitrust regulators but refused to give details on those talks, beyond saying there had been no particular agenda.

"It's been our view that any new version of Microsoft products that include search, that that be done in a way that preserves user choice for search and other applications," Drummond said. He said that Google would monitor the situation but that it was "too early to tell" if there were would be any antitrust allegations arising from Vista.

Vista is Microsoft's first major update to the company's flagship operating system since Windows XP was released in late 2001.

Microsoft said this month it had changed Vista in several key sectors — including its search service — in an attempt to soothe European antitrust worries. Regulators had said they were concerned that computer manufacturers or consumers might be prevented from having a proper choice between different software packages.

EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes wrote to Microsoft CEO Steve Ballmer in March, pointing out possible issues with Vista's integrated Internet search, digital rights management tools used to protect copyrights and software that would create fixed-document formats comparable to Adobe Systems Inc.'s Portable Document Format, or PDF.

Security vendors Symantec Corp. and McAfee Inc. also complained that Microsoft had been slow to hand over technical details needed for their antivirus software to work smoothly with Vista.

There is no formal investigation into Vista, but Microsoft is still embroiled in a long-running legal challenge to the EU's 2004 antitrust order that found the company broke competition law. Microsoft was fined $613 million.

Microsoft Leaves Group Asking BellSouth Limits (BLOOM)

By Molly Peterson, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, October 31, 2006

Microsoft Corp. distanced itself from a group lobbying for restrictions on AT&T Inc.'s proposed acquisition of BellSouth Corp., saying it won't seek to influence regulators weighing the purchase.

The company, a founder of the It's Our Net Coalition, pulled its name from the member list after deciding not to weigh in on the $82 billion deal, spokeswoman Ginny Terzano said Monday. The group wants net neutrality rules to bar telephone and cable providers from charging new priority-access fees.

The 172-member coalition last week urged the Federal Communications Commission to impose "meaningful and effective net neutrality safeguards" on the BellSouth deal. The group wants the FCC to bar AT&T, the biggest U.S. phone company, from favoring some companies over others that offer the same type of Web content or services, depending on how much they pay.

"Microsoft has withdrawn its name from the It's Our Net Web site" while the FCC considers the deal, Terzano said in an e-mailed statement. "However, we continue to support and will pursue other opportunities to obtain meaningful network neutrality policies."

Terzano declined to comment on whether Microsoft will restore its name to the site after the FCC rules on the BellSouth purchase or say if the company has quit the group. The commission is scheduled to vote on the deal Friday.

Jim McGann, a spokesman for the It's Our Net Coalition, declined to comment on Microsoft's withdrawal. The coalition's other founding members are Google Inc., Amazon.com Inc., eBay Inc., Yahoo Inc. and IAC/InterActive Corp.

The five-member FCC is the last regulatory hurdle for San Antonio-based AT&T to complete the BellSouth transaction. The Justice Department and 18 states cleared the deal without conditions. The likely recusal of one FCC member has forced Republican Chairman Kevin Martin to negotiate with Democrats who are seeking conditions on the deal.

The coalition also is urging Congress to approve net neutrality rules that would apply to all broadband providers as part of an overhaul of the 1996 Telecommunications Act.

Google, Amazon and other Internet companies say they should be able to send video and other data at high speeds without paying a premium. They say allowing such fees could destroy the open nature of the Internet by giving broadband providers too much control over content.

Phone companies including AT&T and cable companies such as Comcast Corp. oppose efforts to bar them from levying fees to recoup billions of dollars spent on high-capacity networks. They have pledged not to block subscriber access to legal content or services, and say neutrality rules would stifle investment.

Schneider Swoops In On US Group (FT)

By Delphine Strauss and Doug Cameron

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

Schneider Electric, the French electrical equipment group, on Monday agreed to pay $6.1bn cash for American Power Conversion of the US to boost its capacity in back-up supply systems for the IT sector.

Marking a bold start for Jean-Pascal Tricoire in his first year as chief executive, the deal will be Schneider's first big acquisition since the failed merger in 2001 with Legrand, a domestic rival, which the European Commission overturned on antitrust grounds.

Mr Tricoire said the APC deal was "a significant strategic move" that would strengthen Schneider's position in the electrical distribution sector, the fastest-growing segment of its core business.

Schneider's shares, suspended until noon, fell 6.2 per cent to €82.9 by early afternoon on concerns over the price of the deal, which the group will finance though a €4.5bn syndicated loan, a share capital increase of around €1.2bn and bond issues.

American Power would add annual revenues of about $2.2bn. Mr Tricoire said the deal was "a significant strategic move that would strengthen Schneider "in the fastest-growing segment of our core business: electrical distribution".

However, analysts questioned the timing and price, given the uncertain outlook for IT spending in the US market, which accounts for close to half of APC's sales.

Patrick Marshall, an analyst at Credit Suisse, said the deal was "unlikely to be well received, given the price paid, the stage we are at in the global cycle...and the scale of the integration task ahead".

The price of $31 a share represents a 30 per cent premium to APC's previous closing price and is 36 times its expected earnings per share in 2007. Shares in APC were 25 per cent higher at $29.81 in early New York trading.

Schneider said the acquisition, expected to close early next year, would be earnings enhancing from 2007 and would create value of $3.3bn, including annual synergies of $160m by 2009 and $220m by 2011.

However, the gains may depend on turning around APC's large systems business, where margins have suffered recently from a delay in passing on raw material cost increases, and on extracting major savings in its supply chain.

APC last month annnounced a second round of cost cuts, which will reduce its workforce by 7 per cent, but continues to invest in expanding its large systems business.

"Schneider has little track record in turnarounds, and may be pursuing growth at too rapid a pace," said Olivier Esnou, analyst at Exane BNP Paribas.

APC Deal Reflects Demand For Data Protection (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

French manufacturer Schneider Electric SA's agreement to buy American Power Conversion Corp. for $6.1 billion reflects a bet on growth in corporate demand for protection from power outages.

Both companies specialize in the critical-power market, making gear that helps firms withstand blips and outages. APC's bread and butter is smaller power systems, while Schneider's domain is with bigger entities. APC, however, has been migrating into the larger market.

Schneider's offer of $31 a share is a 30% premium to APC's Friday's close of $23.76 a share. Monday's announcement propelled APC's share price up 26%, or $6.26, to $30.02 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

The French company is trying to quickly eliminate "one of its key competitors" and break into the North American small-company critical-power market dominated by APC, says Boston analyst John Quealy, of Canaccord Adams, adding that "my guess is that they struck first with a knock-out-punch type take-out price."

Schneider and APC, of West Kingston, R.I., have benefited from a trend of corporate spending to protect computerized data from the effects of even small interruptions. The trend is being driven by several factors. New York's 2003 blackouts caused many firms to realize they couldn't afford to be out of commission for several hours, while new federal health-care privacy laws have prompted medical centers to add to data capabilities, creating more need for protection.

Once only businesses like brokerage houses or airline reservation departments worried about keeping the corporate data center running all the time, but today backup power for computer systems has become common in many industries that "can't have downtime," Mr. Quealy says.

The transaction, which is expected to close in the first quarter of next year, is subject to approval by regulators and APC shareholders.

APC, launched in 1981, makes auxiliary items ranging from surge protectors for personal computers to machines that essentially provide air conditioning to keep large data centers from running too hot. The company, which has 7,600 employees, is cashing out at a time of weak earnings. For the six months ended June 25, APC reported net income of $24.7 million, down 41% from a year earlier. Sales increased 17% to $560 million. Cash and short-term investments totaled $539 million as of June 25.

APC's earnings have been lackluster in the past two years as the company spent heavily on a sales force and support to sell its cooling systems and products for bigger companies and factories, analysts say. In a slide show on its Web site, Schneider says it's "very confident it can rapidly improve APC's profitability."

For APC shareholders, the transaction offers an "immediate and substantial cash premium for their investment in the company," Rob Johnson, president and chief executive of APC, says in a prepared statement.

Qualcomm To Be Probed By EU On Royalties, People Say (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, October 31, 2006

Oct. 30 (Bloomberg) -- Qualcomm Inc., the world's second- largest maker of mobile phone chips, will be investigated by the European Union over allegations it overcharges Nokia Oyj, Ericsson AB and other handset manufacturers, people with knowledge of the situation said.

The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust authority, has told Qualcomm and phonemakers that it will open a formal probe of complaints over royalty rates in the next few weeks, said two people who declined to be identified because the decision isn't public. An EU probe could lead to Qualcomm being forced to lower its rates or fined as much as 10 percent of sales.

``The impact on royalties would be significant and the impact on finances would be catastrophic," said Richard Windsor, a mobile phone analyst at Nomura Securities in London. If the EU forces the company to cut the rate in half, Qualcomm's pretax profit in 2007 would drop by a third to $3.3 billion, he said.

The case focuses on how rewards are shared in the $200 billion industry to supply equipment for third-generation mobile phones, which allow users to access the Internet and play videos. Qualcomm contends it's owed royalties on all of the newest 3G handsets because it holds essential patents. Rivals say Qualcomm has fewer patents on 3G phones than on earlier generations and should lower its rates.

Without Merit

Paul Jacobs, Qualcomm's chief executive officer, told the Financial Times in a June 12 interview that he ``won't be surprised" if the EU launches an investigation and such a probe wouldn't have a ``big effect" on the company.

Qualcomm, which is based in San Diego, said in a statement Oct. 27 that the allegations are ``factually inaccurate and legally meritless."

EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said the regulator ``continues to look into the complaints" from phonemakers about Qualcomm.

Qualcomm is expected to generate 36 percent of its revenue and 64 percent of its profit from licensing its mobile-phone technology in 2006, according to Ehud Gelblum, an analyst with JPMorgan Chase & Co. in New York who rates the shares ``neutral."

The EU probe will come a year after Nokia and Ericsson, along with U.S. firms Broadcom Corp. and Texas Instruments Inc. and Japan's NEC Corp. and a Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. unit, said Qualcomm reneged on an agreement to provide its technology under fair and reasonable terms. Ericsson and NEC also accused Qualcomm of abusing its dominant position and charging ``excessive" royalties on patents used for WCDMA, or Wideband Code-Division Multiple Access.

Broadcom

Broadcom filed a similar complaint against Qualcomm last year in the U.S. A federal court in New Jersey dismissed the complaint last month, saying ``Qualcomm's conduct may engender ill-will, but it must have threatened injury to competition -- not just competitors -- to give rise to antitrust liability." Broadcom has said it will appeal.

``We care about Qualcomm trying to squeeze us out of the chipset market by leveraging their royalties on technology rather than competing on a level playing field based on price and quality," Mark Nelson, a Washington-based partner at Cleary Gottlieb Steen & Hamilton LLP who is representing Broadcom.

Ericsson said in an e-mailed statement that it filed its complaint ``because the commission's intervention is critical to the continued integrity of open standards."

Texas Instruments urged a commission probe, saying in an e- mailed statement that ``intellectual property abuse in a standards context cannot be tolerated."

``It is essential that companies whose patented technology is adopted into a standard uphold their commitments to license these patents on fair, reasonable, and non-discriminatory terms," Nokia said in an e-mailed statement.

Standards War

The dispute is rooted in the fight between Europe's GSM, or the Global System for Mobile Communications, and the U.S. approach, which allowed companies to develop competing technologies. GSM controls about 80 percent of the worldwide cell phone market, according to Ovum, a London-based research company.

Nokia has become the dominant supplier of GSM phones in Europe, though it also licenses Qualcomm's CDMA technology, which is used in networks operated by Verizon Wireless and Sprint Nextel Corp., two of the three largest U.S. wireless carriers.

Nokia and Ericsson sought a GSM-based solution for the next generation of mobile technology in the 1990s, in an effort to avoid being too dependent on Qualcomm's CDMA. Nokia and Qualcomm have also challenged each other's patents for CDMA and GSM.

Qualcomm's CDMA technology is used by 13.5 percent of the world's 2.5 billion cell phone users, according to Ovum.

Negotiation Ploy

The battle moved to the International Telecommunication Union, the Geneva-based United Nations agency that establishes and regulates standards. Qualcomm and other U.S. wireless equipment makers pushed for a single 3G standard based on CDMA.

In 2000, the ITU approved five incompatible standards for 3G, including WCDMA and CDMA2000, the successor for networks using CDMA.

Qualcomm and several analysts, including Nomura's Windsor, said the complaints were filed to apply leverage on Qualcomm in royalty negotiations. Nokia's agreement with Qualcomm expires in April 2007.

``It's about making Qualcomm sit down at the table and get a gentlemen's agreement," said Alan Brown, an analyst at research firm Gartner Dataquest in Egham, England.

Pay To Obey (NYT)

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

The broken American patent system has a knack for sanctioning the ridiculous. In the latest example, businesses are receiving patents for devising ways to obey the law — the tax code, to be more specific. What's next, a patented murder defense?

As Floyd Norris reported recently in The Times, the broad category known as business-method patents (like patenting the idea of pizza delivery rather than the pizza itself) has expanded once again. Now it includes the legal ways that accountants and lawyers help their clients pay less tax.

Once the Patent and Trademark Office has granted one of these patents, everyone who uses the same legal shelter — even if they draw the conclusion based on their own interpretation of the tax code — will be subject to lawsuits and even injunctions against using the method at all.

Defenders of these tax-strategy patents argue that they won't affect the average person's struggle with the 1040 form each April. The easy stuff should be rejected under the usual standard that requires patents to be novel and not obvious. Tax-strategy patents, they argue, are more geared toward the complicated tax returns of rich people.

While we don't normally rush to make it easier for the rich to pay less tax, the precedent is a bad one. People should be treated the same under the law, and shouldn't have to pay a licensing fee for the privilege. Congress needs to make spurious patents easier to challenge across the board, and should consider clarifying what may be patented. Recent technological advances raise questions about how patents apply to genes and life forms, or what standard should cover old business models on the Internet.

Patents are supposed to encourage innovation, rewarding the individual for the greater good of society. But excessive or overly broad patents can slow business activity to the pace of cold molasses. And we sure don't need something else to worry about on tax day.

2 'People Of Interest' Questioned In Esperanza Fire (LAT)

By Jonathan Abrams And Maeve Reston

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

Arson investigators questioned two "people of interest" Monday as firefighters contained the wind-fed wildfire in Riverside County that killed four federal firefighters and destroyed 34 homes, authorities said.

The two men live in Cabazon, where the fire began, and were released after they were interviewed by investigators Monday afternoon, authorities said.

"We have two people we have questioned that are people of interest," said Tom Freeman, executive officer of the Riverside County Sheriff's Department. "Sheriff's personnel have not placed them under arrest … we continue to work the case aggressively."

"At times, we are going to have persons of interest.... We are conducting those interviews, and we have no one in custody," Quinata said. "However, we are asking the public to please keep calling the tip line if they have heard or they feel they have information on this arson-homicide investigation."

The Riverside County district attorney's office has already appointed a prosecutor to assist in the case and prepare for a potential trial. "It is potentially a death-penalty case," said Sara Danville, chief deputy district attorney for Riverside County.

"If it is ultimately proven that this was an arson fire and the murder was committed in the course of arson, then that would qualify as a special circumstance," which could lead to the death penalty, she said. She noted that her office prosecuted two arson-murder cases in 1999 in which the defendants were sentenced to death.

The Esperanza fire has blackened more than 40,000 acres and destroyed 34 homes in the mountain communities west of Palm Springs, with the tab for fire operations topping $8.3 million, not including the damage to personal property. The blaze was classified as fully contained Monday at 6 p.m.

"To have it contained in a matter of five days is a tribute to the hard work these guys on the front line have done," said Randy Scales, spokesman for the California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection.

All evacuations have been lifted, and Highway 243, one of the main roads to Idyllwild, was fully reopened for the first time since the blaze began Thursday, fire officials said.

"We took a hell of a hit," said Phil Reddish, 55, of Twin Pines, as he sifted through his belongings. "I'm just trying to salvage the keepsakes as mementos you keep from a fire that you survive."

He and his son, Ty, tried to keep their mood light as they rummaged through the remains of their home. "You have to be able to joke about this, because if you don't, the reality of it will eat you alive," Ty Reddish said.

The home of Rudy Luna, 61, was spared, but less than a hundred yards away, his neighbors' house had burned to the ground.

"It's a whole community up here," said Luna, who spent the day trying to help neighbors. "People out here know what to expect, and we prepare for it, but you can't prepare for a fire that comes that fast."

The Esperanza fire was set about 1 a.m. Thursday in the foothills near Esperanza Avenue in Cabazon, authorities said. Fanned by Santa Ana wind gusts up to 60 mph, the wildfire quickly grew out of control.

Later that morning, the windblown flames swept across the mountains and overwhelmed a U.S. Forest Service crew of Engine 57 from the Alandale Station in the San Bernardino National Forest.

Fellow firefighters watched helplessly as the fire took the lives of Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, the team's captain; Jason McKay, 27, of Phelan; Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; and Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto.

John Clays, McLean's brother in law, read a brief statement on behalf of the family at the fire command center in Beaumont.

"Jess McLean is and will always be a great man," Clay said. "He is a man that was dedicated to his work and devoted to his family."

The crew's sole survivor was Pablo Cerda, 23, of Fountain Valley, who suffered burns over most of his body. He remained in critical condition Monday at Arrowhead Regional Medical Center in Colton.

Cerda had surgery Monday to insert a feeding tube and remove additional damaged skin, said Kathy Peterson, a spokeswoman for the Forest Service.

More than 50 investigators from the Riverside County Sheriff's Department, California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection, U.S. Forest Service and Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco Firearms and Explosives are working on the case.

Freeman did not say what led investigators to the two unidentified men questioned Monday. He said law enforcement and fire officials were investigating more than 250 leads that had been called into the arson tip line.

About 1 p.m., sheriff's deputies searched a residence in Cabazon about a quarter-mile from where the fire started.

"Two deputies were in there for a good while early in the afternoon and came out with a couple of bags," said Bob Dunham, 70, who lives three houses away.

Susan Raichel, spokeswoman for the ATF, confirmed that two people from Cabazon were brought in for questioning about the fire. She said she didn't know if those people lived in the house that was searched.

The ATF and FBI are each contributing $25,000 to bring the total reward for information leading to the arrest and prosecution of the arsonists to $550,000, Rachel said. Anyone with information about the blaze is asked to call the arson tip line, at (951) 922-7116.

Firefighters Gain On Calif. Wildfire (AP)

By Allison Hoffman

AP, October 31, 2006

CABAZON, Calif. - Authorities investigating an arson wildfire that killed four firefighters questioned two people Monday as crews remained confident that the blaze would soon be fully contained.

Sheriff's deputies took two men and three bags of material from a house in Cabazon, said neighbor Robert Dunham, 70, who lives three doors down from the residence a quarter-mile from where the fire started.

Authorities released little information about the two people who were interviewed at a sheriff's station and later released. No arrests had been made.

"We're trying to work through the leads that we have, and going through the process," Riverside County Sheriff Bob Doyle said in a telephone interview.

Authorities said the fire was deliberately set at the base of a slope in Cabazon, west of Palm Springs. Cabazon residents have said they saw two young men leaving the area where the fire began.

Since it started around 1 a.m. Thursday, the fire has burned 63 square miles, or 40,200 acres, as fierce Santa Ana winds swept through the region and fanned the flames. It was about 90 percent contained, and authorities expected full containment Monday night. It has destroyed 54 structures - 34 homes and 20 other buildings.

Last week, a shift in the winds turned deadly when a gust pushed a wall of flames around five firefighters trying to protect a house. Four of the firefighters died, while another was hospitalized with serious burns over most of his body.

"They want everyone to know that Pablo's dream was to help people, and on Thursday morning, that's just what he was doing - protecting and serving," said Eddie Cortez, a family spokesman.

Meanwhile, the FBI and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives donated $25,000 each to the reward pool, bringing the total to $550,000, ATF spokeswoman Susan Raichel said.

Vigils were held at several Southern California churches and fire stations for Cerda and to pray for the families of the fallen firefighters. Killed were Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, of Idyllwild; Jason McKay, 27, of Phelan; Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; and Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto.

U.S. Cites Cost Cuts' Role In BP Refinery Blast Safety Board Lays Blame With Top-Level Decisions, Raising Firm's Legal Risks By CHIP CUMMINS (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

Cost-cutting efforts by senior management at BP PLC contributed to a deadly explosion at a refinery in Texas last year, federal investigators said, a finding that ratchets up the legal stakes for the London-based oil giant.

In a summary of its preliminary findings yesterday, the Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board didn't name specific senior managers or members of BP's executive suite in London. But the federal agency alleged for the first time that high-level decisions to defer overhauls, cut staff and rein in costs at the Texas City, Texas, plant helped cause the accident, which killed 15 people and injured 180.

BP already faces a criminal probe into the accident as well as civil claims from victims and survivors' families. Though the board hasn't any regulatory role or prosecutorial powers, its findings could be taken up by civil litigants or by other agencies probing the disaster.

The development further sullies BP's corporate image after a spate of operational, compliance and environmental problems in the U.S. Federal authorities separately are investigating BP's energy-trading activities and federal and state officials are probing corrosion problems at BP's big Prudhoe Bay oil field in Alaska.

BP has issued its own findings that painted a picture of widespread maintenance and safety shortcomings at the Texas City refinery. But it laid the lion's share of the blame on the actions of a handful of lower-level workers and supervisors.

Ronnie Chappell, a BP spokesman, yesterday said the company stood by its findings. BP investigators "didn't find evidence of budgetary decisions which were an immediate cause or critical factor in this terrible tragedy," he said.

BP's chief executive, John Browne, set off an industry-changing wave of consolidation in the late 1990s, when oil prices were low. Big oil companies gobbled up competitors and cut costs to stay profitable. Lord Browne and his management team won kudos for the effort, especially as oil prices recovered later, leading to currently flush industry profits. BP took over the Texas City refinery when it purchased Amoco Corp. in 1998.

In July 2005, The Wall Street Journal detailed in a page-one article how cost cuts and staffing reductions preceded the blast. Current and former workers interviewed blamed the cuts for reducing safety and causing equipment problems at the refinery. BP denied those claims.

In an interview, Don Holmstrom, the safety board's top investigator in the BP inquiry, said BP executives had been sent company documents months or years before the accident that indicated cost-cutting had undermined safety at the plant. The agency said it wouldn't release those documents at the present time.

"The documents themselves that we have reviewed identify the impact of the cost-cutting on the integrity of the refinery," Mr. Holmstrom said.

The board also said internal BP documents indicated managers were aware of safety problems at 34 other unnamed BP businesses world-wide. "Every successful corporation must contain its costs," the board's chairwoman, Carolyn Merritt, said in the statement. "But at an aging facility like Texas City, it is not responsible to cut budgets related to safety and maintenance without thoroughly examining the impact on the risk of catastrophic accident." Ms. Merritt linked BP's cost-cutting and the accident in an interview broadcast Sunday on the CBS television network's "60 Minutes" program.

Mr. Chappell, the BP spokesman, said BP agrees "that the explosion and fire was preventable, but we don't understand the basis for some of the comments made by the [safety board]" in its statement. He said BP won't comment publicly on specific statements made by the safety board until the agency issues its final report, expected in March.

The board listed BP financial decisions that the agency determined played a role in the accident. For instance, in order to save money, BP decided in 2002 not to replace a venting system that failed during the accident with a safer system, the agency said.

It also found that BP cut the size of the training staff at the refinery to eight people in 2004 from about 30 in 1997. The training department's budget was reduced by half from 1998 to 2004, it found.

The board also said that it determined BP cut fixed costs at the refinery about 25% from 1998 to 2000 and that those cuts "adversely impacted maintenance expenditures and infrastructure at the refinery."

BP 'knew Of Safety Problems' At Refineries (FT)

By Sheila McNulty In Houston

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

BP's global management was aware of "significant safety problems" at the Texas City refinery and 34 other locations around the world well before last year's deadly explosion at the US plant, investigators said on Monday.

The US Chemical Safety Board, an independent federal agency charged with investigating industrial chemical accidents, said internal BP documents prepared between 2002 and 2005 revealed knowledge of those problems before the March 2005 explosion killed 15 and injured 500 people in and around BP's biggest refinery. The Texas blast was the worst US industrial accident in more than a decade.

The CSB report comes a week before BP's first civil trial arising from the explosion and is likely to lead the UK company to step up negotiations to settle the case, as it has most of the 1,000 or so others arising from the blast. The report will also likely be used by the federal grand jury investigating whether to bring criminal charges against BP and its executives for the Texas explosion.

BP has been under scrutiny by regulators, Congress and the US Department of Justice following the explosion and closure of half of BP's Alaskan oilfield for severe corrosion. The CSB has led the investigation of the Texas City explosion.

"The CSB's investigation shows that BP's global management was aware of problems with maintenance, spending and infrastructure well before March 2005," said Carolyn Merritt, CSB chairwoman. She said BP did make some safety improvements, though the focus was on improving procedural compliance and reducing occupational injury rates, "while catastrophic safety risks remained".

"Unsafe and antiquated equipment designs were left in place, and unacceptable deficiencies in preventative maintenance were tolerated," Ms Merritt said.

Ms Merritt said budget cuts throughout the BP system caused a progressive deterioration of safety at the Texas City refinery, referring to the 25 per cent cut on fixed costs from 1998 to 2000.

Ronnie Chappell, BP spokesman, said: "BP agrees with CSB that the March 23, 2005 explosion and fire was a preventable tragedy. However, we do not understand the basis for some of the comments made by the CSB."

Mr Chappell said the BP Texas City fatal accident investigation team did not identify previous budget decisions or lack of expenditure as a critical factor, or immediate cause of the accident. Indeed, he said, maintenance spending had increased 40 per cent over the previous five years and was higher than the industry average per barrel of throughput.

Cost-Cutting Led To Blast At BP Plant, Probe Finds (WP)

By Steven Mufson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

BP PLC's cost-cutting efforts contributed to a Texas refinery explosion that killed 15 workers and injured 180 others in March 2005, a federal agency said yesterday.

Carolyn W. Merritt, chairman of the Chemical Safety Board, also said that BP senior management knew of "significant safety problems" at the Texas plant and 34 other BP facilities months or years before the explosion but that "unsafe and antiquated equipment designs were left in place, and unacceptable deficiencies in preventative maintenance were tolerated."

The conclusions, contained in a preliminary report by the board, may raise additional legal problems for the London oil company, which has already set aside $1.6 billion to resolve claims from the accident.

The company said it has settled with the families of all but one of the workers killed in the Texas City, Tex., incident and with hundreds injured. But Brent Coon, the lead plaintiffs' lawyer in the refinery case scheduled to start next week, said that the Justice Department had been asking for documents for its own investigation. "It's a good report," Coon said. "It says many of the things we've said all along."

Merritt said that "BP implemented a 25 percent cut on fixed costs from 1998 to 2000 that adversely impacted maintenance expenditures and infrastructure at the refinery." She said maintenance spending had declined throughout the 1990s, when the refinery belonged to Amoco Corp. Once Amoco merged with BP, she said, further cuts were imposed.

"Every successful corporation must contain its costs," Merritt said. "But at an aging facility like Texas City, it is not responsible to cut budgets related to safety and maintenance without thoroughly examining the impact on the risk of a catastrophic accident."

In the 30 years before the explosion, a worker had died in an accident at the Texas City refinery on average of once every 16 months.

BP, while conceding responsibility, disputed Merritt's conclusions. Company spokesman Ronnie W. Chappell said that BP had boosted maintenance spending by 40 percent in the five years before the accident and that an internal investigation "did not identify previous budget decisions or lack of expenditure as a critical factor or immediate cause of the accident."

He also said the number of injuries at Texas City had fallen 70 percent. "The significant reduction in workplace injury rates led the company to believe that conditions at the refinery were improving," Chappell said.

Don Holmstrom, the CSB's supervisory investigator, said that BP's safety initiatives had "focused largely on improving personnel safety -- such as slips, trips and falls -- rather than management systems, equipment design, and preventative maintenance programs to help prevent the growing risk of major process accidents."

The CSB also said that the training staff at the refinery was cut to eight in 2004 from 30 in 1997 and that the training budget was cut in half, that a 2003 BP audit called the Texas City infrastructure "poor" and cited a "checkbook mentality," that pre-explosion internal reports cited workers who said safety complaints were not heeded, and that a 2002 plan to eliminate a unit (known as a blowdown drum) was never implemented and that the unit exploded in 2005.

BP says it will eliminate blowdown drum units such as the one in Texas City from all its refineries by 2008. It has also moved more than 200 trailers that are used to house workers away from refinery processing equipment. It will spend more than $1 billion to refurbish the Texas City refinery over the next five years.

Coon wants to depose BP chief executive John Browne, but Chappell said Browne has "no unique knowledge" about the explosion. A Texas judge has ruled that Browne must submit to a deposition, but BP has appealed. BP's John Manzoni, head of global refining and marketing, and Mike Hoffman, a global refining executive, have already been deposed in the case.

"We are deeply sorry for what occurred and for the suffering caused by our mistakes," Chappell said.

Ex-FBI Agent Is Sentenced In Plea Agreement (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

Denise K. Woo is put on probation and fined for passing information to a suspected Chinese spy.

Seven years after she was suspended for allegedly disclosing classified material to a suspected Chinese spy, former FBI agent Denise K. Woo was sentenced Monday to probation and a $1,000 fine for improperly sharing confidential information, a misdemeanor.

Woo, 47, of Redondo Beach was transferred from white-collar investigations to a counterintelligence squad pursuing Chinese intelligence agents after her bosses learned in 1999 that she was friends with Jeffrey Wang, a Torrance engineer suspected by the FBI of committing espionage for China. Wang was never charged with a crime.

After her transfer, interviews show, she became convinced that Wang was innocent of wrongdoing and had been falsely accused of espionage by an FBI informant.

Though no charges were filed against Wang, Woo was accused by the FBI of inappropriately disclosing information about the probe to Wang. Suspended and later fired, Woo was then indicted two years ago for allegedly disclosing the existence of a national security wiretap on Wang's home telephone, revealing to Wang the identity of the FBI's confidential informant and lying to FBI agents.

Those felony charges, which carried a minimum 10-year prison sentence, were subsequently dismissed when Woo acknowledged in June that she had improperly passed along information about the FBI's confidential operative to Wang in October 1999.

Though authorities had no comment about the plea agreement, Woo said she had been unjustly accused at great personal expense to her and her family.

"This is kind of a bittersweet ending to a long and continuing tragic injustice," Woo said minutes after U.S. District Judge Gary Klausner imposed the sentence. "I am relieved that after years of false allegations, my family and I can finally get on with our lives."

Woo's attorney, Carolyn J. Kubota, was biting in her criticism of the FBI for firing Woo and the Justice Department for prosecuting her.

"Denise was made a scapegoat for the government's absolutely bungled investigation of Mr. Wang," Kubota said outside court, where Woo was surrounded by family and friends.

Wang, who continues to work for a Defense Department contractor, sharply criticized the government's investigation of him and its prosecution of Woo.

"Denise Woo is the only person who was courageous and principled enough to stand up for me when the government made me a target of a completely false accusation of espionage," Wang said.

"The government should be ashamed for its reprehensible treatment of me in their unwarranted investigation and for prosecuting and ruining the life of Denise Woo, a person of great integrity, who stood up for an innocent man. Tragically, justice was not served in either of our cases."

The Chinese counterintelligence squad to which Woo was assigned was later riven by controversy associated with FBI veteran James J. Smith, a longtime supervisor who retired a year after Woo arrived.

Several years later, Smith was charged with gross mishandling of sensitive documents. He later pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of lying about an affair with longtime informant Katrina Leung.

SACRAMENTO - California authorities seized a record number of marijuana plants this harvest season, uprooting nearly 1.7 million plants they valued at more than $6.7 billion, the state Department of Justice said Monday.

The 1,675,681 plants seized under the Campaign Against Marijuana Planting program beat last year's record of 1.1 million plants.

The state Justice Department's Bureau of Narcotic Enforcement, which leads the program, said the increase is largely due to more eradication teams, better aerial surveillance and air transport of law enforcement officers to the illegal plots. Gardens also are getting bigger, it said.

The program includes local, state and federal agencies that conducted 477 raids in 34 counties between late July and early October. Authorities said they made 27 arrests and seized 29 weapons.

Lake County had the most plants seized, with 314,603. It was followed by Shasta County (227,488), Mendocino (135,736) and Fresno (102,814).

About 80 percent of the marijuana was found on public land such as parks and national forests, with the rest on remote private land, the department said.

The program is aimed at large outdoor marijuana farms, and the figures do not include the thousands of plants seized from suburban homes in the Sacramento and Stockton areas in recent weeks.

COP KID'S LOOSE COLLAR (NYPOST)

By Lukas I. Alpert

The New York Post, October 30, 2006

A nationally known law-enforcement official's son, who pleaded guilty nearly a year ago to trying to buy 400 pounds of pot from an undercover agent, is still free, while his co-defendant languishes in federal prison, The Post has learned.

Sean Timoney, 26, pleaded guilty on Dec. 21, 2005, to conspiring to possess with intent to distribute marijuana. Since then, his sentencing date has been postponed twice, allowing him to work and undergo drug counseling, his lawyer said.

The fact that his father, John Timoney, is currently the police chief in Miami, was the chief of the Philadelphia police, and was once second in command at the NYPD has raised questions as to whether his son is getting preferential treatment.

"I think when someone has pleaded guilty and he has not been incarcerated nearly a year after the fact, you can draw your own conclusions from that," said a source close to the case. "Does this mean he's getting special treatment because of who his dad is? I don't know."

The younger Timoney was busted Nov. 1, 2005, along with Jae Seu, 23, after they handed over a duffel bag stuffed with nearly $450,000 cash to a undercover Drug Enforcement Administration agent in a Rockland County motel room as a down payment for the marijuana.

But the whole episode was a sting captured on tape, and Timoney and Seu were arrested as they left the motel. Timoney was released after his father and mother, Noreen, put up their Miami condo as collateral for his $100,000 bond. Seu, of Glenside, Pa., was also released on $100,000 bond.

Since pleading guilty, Timoney has been allowed to remain free - restricted to the states of New York and Pennsylvania - while awaiting sentencing.

Seu, on the other hand, pleaded guilty on Feb. 28 and was incarcerated immediately, said his lawyer, Lee Ginsberg. Seu was sentenced in August to 37 months in prison.

Timoney has had two sentencing dates - April 10 and Aug. 14 - postponed. His next date is set for Nov. 13.

Both his lawyer and the federal prosecutor handling the case insist there is nothing unusual about him being free for so long.

"It's not uncommon," said his lawyer, Ed Hayes. "He had no record. He went into a drug-treatment program and went to work in the construction trades.

"What we said to the probation department is give him a chance to turn his life around, and they agreed to be flexible. He was not the organizer or the mastermind of a drug ring, he was just a driver."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard Hartunian agreed.

"There's no holdup. It may have been adjourned once or twice; this happens in federal court from time to time," he said.

San Antonio Express, October 30, 2006

Editor's note: In late September and early October, San Antonian Henry Catto traveled to Venezuela, Colombia and Nicaragua with a group of seven former U.S. ambassadors. In Nicaragua and Venezuela, they witnessed threats to democracy. In contrast, Colombia is presided over by a pro-U.S. president who makes democracy work in the most difficult of situations.

If geography is destiny, as some say, Colombia is a fine example.

As Milton Drucker, deputy U.S. ambassador to the South American nation, told our group, Colombia is "a vast unoccupied space on the Amazon basin; 200 inches of rain a year on the Pacific Coast. And in the east, desert." A cordillera splits the country. Bogota is at 8,000 feet, and the Amazon jungles are almost impenetrable. In short, the place is hard to govern.

But among these extremes are amazingly fertile lands that produce coffee, tobacco, rice, flowers, cattle and bananas. It has oil, natural gas, coal and emeralds of the finest quality. Its 46 million people make it the third-largest in South America, while its land area makes it No. 4. It has a stable political system, its three branches of government being similar to those in the United States. Literacy is 92 percent, and life expectancy is 70 for men and 76 for woman.

Lest the reader think it is a new Garden of Eden, however, there is indeed a serpent, a deadly one. Among its crops, coca and poppies flourish.

Coca cultivation has a 4,000-year history in the Andean region, and the arrival of the Europeans and later the Americans simply made the market bigger. Modern trends in agriculture and communications and an insatiable desire among North Americans and Europeans for cocaine and heroine led to the growth of today's criminal narcogangs, which are prepared to do whatever it takes to supply these deadly habits. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration estimates that 90 percent of the cocaine powder smuggled into the United States comes from Colombia.

Three armed groups, known by their initials, predominate: FARC, ELN and AUC. The first two grew from the teachings of Karl Marx and sought a Soviet-style republic. The AUC was formed by rural interests frustrated by the inability of governments to protect their property from the other two.

Time and the collapse of the Soviet Union changed the scene. Money and power, not political action, became the engine of growth for the drug trade. For the FARC, drugs and terror became the means; the ELN added kidnapping to the mix. The AUC took up the drug trade as well.

Democracy seems to have provided some hope of solving these problems. Two good presidents in a row, Andres Pastrana and Alvaro Uribe, have made a difference. Uribe was elected to a second term this year, and while he is a liberal, he has not hesitated to use the military against the drug lords. Military budgets have grown dramatically. The growth has not, however, been at the expense of social programs. Colombian tax rates, as a result, are among the highest in Latin America.

The president has negotiated with drug barons, but when negotiation fails, he goes to war. In the case of the AUC, negotiation has worked well. Some 30,000 members and 7,000 guerillas have turned in their arms and been accepted back into society.

Colombian officials are proud of the improved situation. We were told it is now safe to drive from Bogota to remote areas and there is, for the first time in recent history, a government presence in all 1,098 municipalities.

Uribe has been willing to talk about prisoner swaps, but the FARC wants lopsided deals, such as 500 guerrillas for 63 kidnapped civilians. The hostages are noncombatants, and among them are three American contractors, held for years. Ten of the 50 Americans kidnapped since 1992 have been murdered. Polls show public support for FARC at 1 percent.

Is this situation without hope? No. Some six years ago, the Colombian government, with U.S. support, started Plan Colombia, which pays small coca growers in remote areas to change crops. The plan also involves massive spraying of coca growth with insecticide and promotes human rights, alternative development and judicial reform.

Has it been a success? That is hard to judge. "Notes from Putumayo," a running commentary on the Center for International Policy's Web site by a visitor to that remote border state, left one thinking the "troubles" are better, though there is a long way to go. One problem is that the lack of roads makes getting any new crops to market difficult.

A personal observation: The trip left me feeling good about our ally in South America. One has to wish for the equal of President Uribe throughout the continent.

Henry Catto is a San Antonian who served as deputy ambassador to the Organization of American States and as ambassador to El Salvador, the European Offices of the United Nations and Great Britain. He is author of "Ambassadors at Sea: The High and Low Adventures of a Diplomat."

DEA (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, October 30, 2006

A Greensburg man is in the Westmoreland County Prison after allegedly impersonating a federal Drug Enforcement Administration agent and choking a man at a Donegal Township bar.

State police at Greensburg said the incident occurred about 10:30 p.m. Friday at the Fireside Inn on Route 31. Police said Richard McCormick allegedly grabbed Michael Cordell, of Somerset, around the neck, without provocation, and began to choke him.

According to police, McCormick told police he was a DEA agent and was attempting to get Cordell to comply with his instructions. McCormick allegedly pulled out a gun, again stating he was a DEA agent before leaving the bar.

Police caught up with McCormick in the bar's parking lot. First, he told police he was the complainant in the case. McCormick eventually had to be physically restrained and handcuffed before he was taken to prison, police said.

McCormick was found to be in possession of a Davis Derringer pistol, according to police.

The Immoral Majority (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

As usual, Republicans are hoping that righteous voters will come through for them on Election Day. But this year looks like the revenge of the sinners.

DOJ_NMG_0088954

The sinners aren't easy to count, since they don't spend a lot of time doing grass-roots politicking. There is no Washington lobby for the Coalition of the Damned. They don't like to confess their urges to pollsters. But there are enough of them, particularly in places where Republicans are struggling, to cast doubt on the party's long-standing strategy.

Why did Republicans assume there was a Moral Majority? Where in the Bible does it say that the virtuous outnumber the wicked? When you define wickedness the way Republicans do, the numbers are daunting.

One of the G.O.P. Congress's few achievements this year was a law to crack down on Internet gambling, an industry that counted eight million American customers last year — about four times the membership of the Christian Coalition. The new law hasn't stopped the online gamblers from betting, but it will give them second thoughts about voting Republican.

The Republican war on marijuana — the chief priority of the current drug czar — isn't playing any better in the heartland. More than 40 percent of people over the age of 12 have tried marijuana, and more than three-quarters of Americans support legalizing it for medical purposes. The White House and the Justice Department have had little luck in their attempts to stop states from legalizing medical marijuana, but they have succeeded in alienating voters.

These federal intrusions are especially scorned by independent voters in the Western states where Republicans have been losing ground, like Colorado, Nevada, Arizona and Montana. Western Democrats have been siphoning off libertarian voters by moderating their liberal views on issues like gun control, but Republicans have been driving libertarians away with their wars on vice and their jeremiads against gay marriage (and their attempt to regulate that from Washington, too).

Libertarian voters tend to get ignored by political strategists because they're not easy to categorize or organize. They don't congregate in churches or union halls; they don't unite to push political agendas. Many don't even call themselves libertarians, although they qualify because of their social liberalism and economic conservatism: they want the government out of their bedrooms as well as their wallets.

They distrust moral busybodies of both parties, and they may well be the most important bloc of swing voters this election, as David Boaz and David Kirby conclude in a new study for the Cato Institute. Analyzing a variety of voter surveys, they estimate that libertarians make up about 15 percent of voters — a bloc roughly comparable in size to liberals and to conservative Christians, and far bigger than blocs like Nascar dads or soccer moms.

They're especially prevalent in the West, where half a dozen states have legalized medical marijuana. When Californians approved one of the first medical marijuana laws, in 1996, drug warriors were so convinced it would lead to a catastrophic spike in illegal use by teenagers that they sponsored a study to document the damage. But there was no catastrophe: after the law, marijuana use by teenagers actually declined in California.

In the decade since, as the Marijuana Policy Project documented in a recent study, popular support for legalized medical marijuana has increased in California and in virtually every other state with a similar law. Last year it was favored by 78 percent of respondents in a Gallup poll.

Yet these realities still haven't registered with Republicans in Washington. This year the White House drug czar, John Walters, and his minions have been out campaigning in Nevada, Colorado and South Dakota, which have marijuana initiatives on the ballot. The drug warriors are still sounding the discredited alarms about youths turning into potheads. Their fervor's not surprising — they may even believe their own hype.

What's surprising is the political stupidity of the meddling. Westerners, no matter what they think of marijuana, don't appreciate sermons from federal officials on how to vote. In 2002, when the White House campaigned against another marijuana ballot initiative in Nevada, the state's attorney general said it was "disturbing" to see the federal interference in a state election.

This year, with Republicans in so much trouble in the West, the missionaries from Washington aren't doing them any favors. They need every sinner's vote they can get.

Richmond Graduate Fuels Colorado Pot Movement (WT)

By Valerie Richardson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

DENVER -- If Coloradans vote to legalize marijuana statewide next week, it will be almost entirely because of the efforts of a pudgy, clean-shaven 24-year-old University of Richmond graduate.

DOJ_NMG_0088955

Mason Tvert, campaign manager for Safer Alternatives for Enjoyable Recreation, has pushed Colorado to the forefront of the marijuana movement, first with his successful 2004 Denver campaign and now with the statewide Amendment 44.

The amendment would allow people 21 and older to possess up to 1 ounce of marijuana for personal use. If approved, it would make Colorado the first state to decriminalize marijuana.

It's a lofty goal for a campaign that, as Mr. Tvert describes it, consists of "two guys in a rental car." Mr. Tvert is running the effort from his cell phone and laptop, but that doesn't mean his opponents aren't taking him seriously.

Federal drug czar John P. Walters visited Colorado three times this year to denounce the effort, which almost every state lawmaker opposes. What Mr. Tvert brings to the table are energy, imagination, a knack for attracting free press and relentless tactics.

A case in point was an anti-Amendment 44 press conference Friday at the state capitol. Gov. Bill Owens, a Republican, and other state officials were expecting to address reporters on the dangers of pot, but instead were bombarded by more than 100 marijuana advocates, led by Mr. Tvert, chanting slogans and waving green campaign signs.

The protesters tried to drown out Mr. Owens and other speakers with jeers such as "Lie louder, Bill." A frustrated Mr. Owens finally responded, "Ladies and gentlemen, this is a sad day for Colorado."

Attorney General John Suthers chided Mr. Tvert for interrupting the governor's message. "I thought his behavior was reprehensible," he said.

Whether such tactics will Mr. Tvert him any votes is debatable. A Denver Post poll showed Amendment 44 trailing 57 percent to 34 percent, with 9 percent undecided.

Mr. Tvert, who is counting on a big turnout from students after his campus voter-registration drives, said his supporters aren't easily reached on land lines. What is clear is that Mr. Tvert has hit a chord with his primary message: Alcohol is more dangerous than marijuana, and therefore, marijuana should be legalized.

His message is backed by personal experience. He said that the summer before entering the University of Richmond, he drank himself unconscious during a concert and woke up in the emergency room.

He wasn't cited or punished, even though he was underage. He was subpoenaed later to testify against a fellow student who had been arrested for marijuana possession.

"What it shows is that our government's priorities on drug education are so skewed," Mr. Tvert said. "Have you ever seen a government committee warning that you could die of drinking? No. But I've seen plenty of commercials telling people they could ruin their lives smoking pot."

Riverside County Cannot Join Medical Marijuana Suit (DS)

Desert Sun, October 30, 2006

Riverside County will not join a legal challenge to California's medical marijuana law, scheduled to be heard in San Diego Superior Court Nov. 16.

The county Board of Supervisors voted earlier this month to join the suit originally filed by San Diego, San Bernardino and Merced counties, but the court ruled Friday that Riverside would not be allowed to join the case.

“The court felt it was too late to intervene in the pending action in San Diego,” said Pam Walls, assistant county counsel. “There was a briefing schedule and allowing (the county) to intervene, that would delay or alter the briefing schedule.”

The suit seeks to overturn state requirements that counties issue medical marijuana identification cards to patients with a doctor's recommendation to use the drug.

Americans for Safe Access, and the California Chapter of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, both medical marijuana advocacy groups, and the American Civil Liberties Union are arguing against the counties’ suit.

Both sides are looking to the court to resolve the conflict between federal law banning any use or cultivation of marijuana and California law allowing medical use.

Merriman Is Expected To Drop His Appeal (NYT)

By Michael S. Schmidt

DOJ_NMG_0088956

San Diego Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman plans to drop his appeal of the four-game suspension he has received for testing positive for a performance-enhancing substance.

A deal between Merriman's lawyer and officials from the National Football League over when the suspension would take effect was being worked out last night.

Merriman's lawyer, David Cornwell, and Adolpho A. Birch III, the N.F.L. official who oversees testing, were trying to figure out a way for Merriman to drop the appeal and still make an appearance at the team's practice facility tomorrow to speak with his teammates before the suspension begins, according to a person briefed on the discussions between Cornwell and the league. A suspended player is barred from his team's headquarters.

The Chargers do not practice today, so Merriman would have to wait until tomorrow to address the team.

If Merriman does not drop the appeal by noon today, he must proceed with the appeal hearing that is scheduled for Nov. 7 in New York.

The N.F.L., which has not commented directly on Merriman's case, is expected to announce the suspension as soon as Merriman drops the appeal.

Word of Merriman's positive test was leaked to the news media before his appeal was resolved, creating an unusual situation in which he continued to play after the public had learned of his situation.

Typically, when a player tests positive, the league does not disclose details of the case until after the appeals process.

Cornwell said the steroid nandrolone was discovered in Merriman's system after he took a tainted over-the-counter dietary supplement. But under the N.F.L.'s rules, players are responsible for positive tests regardless of the supplements they take.

Merriman would miss the Chargers' next four games, against the Cleveland Browns, the Cincinnati Bengals, the Denver Broncos and the Oakland Raiders. He would return against the Buffalo Bills on Dec. 3.

The Chargers (5-2) are tied with the Broncos for first place in the American Football Conference West, and San Diego plays Denver on Dec. 10.

On Sunday, Merriman tied a career high with three sacks as the Chargers defeated the St. Louis Rams, 38-24, in San Diego. Throughout the game, fans loudly cheered him. Merriman has eight and a half sacks and is tied with Aaron Kampman of Green Bay for the league lead.

The use of largely unregulated over-the-counter supplements is so widespread that the N.F.L. certifies five products that are viewed to be clean of banned substances. Merriman said yesterday that the product he took was not one the league had certified. It is illegal to sell nandrolone, or any of its precursors, over the counter in the United States.

When reporters asked him if his heel injury would affect his decision to drop the appeal, giving him four weeks to recover, Merriman winked.

"Yeah, my heel is hurt so bad I think I will probably be out three to four weeks," he said, according to The Associated Press. He added: "No, my heel is fine. I'm just trying to stay off it a little bit today."

Merriman May Drop Suspension Appeal (SDUT)

By Kevin Acee, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 30, 2006

After his three-sack day against the St. Louis Rams, Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman planned to speak with his advisers last night and discuss the possibility of dropping the appeal of his four-game suspension.

Merriman, who tested positive for the banned steroid Nandrolone earlier this month, maintains he was the victim of a tainted supplement. But he also knows he is unlikely to win his appeal based on the NFL's clearly stated policy that players are responsible for what they put in their body.

Merriman's appeal is to be heard Nov. 7, two days after the Chargers' next game. Dropping the appeal, which could happen as early as today, would mean Merriman would miss Sunday's game against the Browns and the three that follow it. If

Merriman saw the appeal through to the Nov. 7 hearing, and the NFL took its time ruling on the appeal, there would be the possibility the suspension would not start until Nov. 19 and would encompass two games against AFC West rival Denver.

"I want to do what's best for the team," Merriman said. "I don't know what is going to happen yet."

Merriman yesterday dropped St. Louis quarterback Marc Bulger three times to move into a tie for first in the league with 8½ sacks for the season. He also hurried Bulger three times and tackled running back Steven Jackson at the line of scrimmage.

"(Playing) is always the outlet for everything," Merriman said. "I always had that growing up, just to be on the field and playing with these guys I love. And to come out with a win definitely helps everything.

"I love to go out and have as many sacks as I can every week. Even before this, I was looking to go out and prove a point – that I am one of the best linebackers."

Merriman's introduction on the video board in the first quarter was met with a loud cheer, and the chorus only grew with every big play.

"To see all those 56 jerseys out there, you couldn't ask for anything more than that," he said. "Walking into the stadium and people telling me how much of a role model I still am, that's what I look at my job to be. I'm just going to keep going out and doing the things, being myself and just playing football."

Ranked No. 1 all season, the Chargers allowed a season-high 412 yards yesterday and are allowing an average of 265.5 compared with the Bears' 245.9.

The Chargers' tackling was better yesterday than the previous Sunday at Kansas City, but it remained an elusive discipline at times.

"We still had some tackles we missed," coach Marty Schottenheimer said. "We are on a mission, and we are going to continue to work on that every day."

The Rams also threw for 311 yards, the highest total against the Chargers (by 90) this season. The Rams completed four passes of 20 yards or more. Their 29 such completions rank second in the league, and they entered and left the game with the league's fourth-ranked passing offense.

"They pass the ball 40-plus times, they're going to get yards," cornerback Drayton Florence said. "But our main thing was to go out and stop (Torry Holt) and (Isaac Bruce), two Pro Bowl receivers. We did pretty good. They got some cheap yards on us. But that's going to happen when a team's behind."

Tough homecoming The Rams opted not to play linebacker Pisa Tinoisamoa, the Vista High alum who broke a bone in his left hand last week during practice. Rams coach Scott Linehan said Tinoisamoa "would have basically been playing with one arm" because of swelling in the hand.

"It was very uncomfortable," Linehan said. "We felt that if he played, we would really be taking a step back for next week and even the week after. If something happened to (Dexter) Coakley, he might have been able to play, but we just felt it was too much of a risk."

Cromartie impressive Facing an offense that often had three receivers in the game, rookie cornerback Antonio Cromartie played more yesterday.

His role has increased almost every game, but yesterday was the most demanding, as he was assigned to Holt much of the time. Holt caught five passes for 48 yards, his third-lowest total this season.

"I was with an All-Pro," Cromartie said.

Nuts 'n' Bolts Safety Bhawoh Jue was active for the first time since the season's second game. He did not start but played in certain packages.

Keenan McCardell's streak of games without a touchdown reached nine, the longest stretch since a 10-game drought in 1996.

Schottenheimer's 191st regular-season victory moved him into sole possession of fifth place all-time.

L.T. Goes Bananas; Merriman Uncertain About Drug Test Appeal (AP)

By Bernie Wilson

AP, October 30, 2006

LaDainian Tomlinson wore a gorilla mask to his weekly news conference a day after he reminded everyone how good he is by gaining 240 yards from scrimmage and scoring three touchdowns.

Shawne Merriman didn't wear a mask, but the star outside linebacker was disguising his intentions regarding the appeal of his positive drug test.

After he had three sacks in Sunday's 38-24 win over the St. Louis Rams, Merriman said he'd speak with his attorney to discuss the possibility that he'd drop his appeal and begin serving a four-game suspension for testing positive for the steroid nandrolone.

But nothing had changed by Monday, except that Merriman was wearing a boot on his right foot to protect the heel he injured against the Rams.

"I don't know what is going to happen yet and someone has already said I'm thinking about dropping the appeal and what not, but I still have to find out what is going on myself," Merriman said. "I haven't decided anything yet. I'll find out sometime today or tomorrow what I am going to do, if I am going to do anything at all. It's just all part of the process.

Since his appeal is set for Nov. 7, Merriman was able to play against the Rams and would get to play in Sunday's home game against the Cleveland Browns, unless he decides to drop it.

Merriman said the positive drug test stems from a tainted supplement, and not many people give him a chance of avoiding a four-game suspension.

If the appeal process drags out and he loses, he could miss both of the Chargers' games against AFC West rival Denver, on the road Nov. 19 and at home on Dec. 10. The Chargers and Broncos are tied for the division lead at 5-2.

Asked if his heel injury would affect his decision, he said with a wink: "Yeah, my heel is hurt so bad I think I will probably be out three-to-four weeks."

Then he added: "No, my heel is fine. I'm just trying to stay off it a little bit today."

"I just want to stay on the field. That is all I'm considering right now," said Merriman, the 2005 Defensive Rookie of the Year who has a team-high 8 1/2 sacks. "Obviously I want to be back as soon as possible if anything is going to happen at all. But assuming that something might happen, I have to do what's best to get back on the field as soon as possible."

Merriman said he'd feel cheated if he didn't get to state his case. "But at the same time its not about me proving a point or proving anything anymore. It's about me playing football."

Tomlinson, meanwhile, had some fun a day after going bananas with 240 yards from scrimmage, the third-highest total in his six-year career.

His 183 yards rushing were his eighth-highest total, and he added 57 yards on three catches. He's the NFL's second-leading rusher with 656 yards, and is second with 959 yards from scrimmage.

Tomlinson quieted critics who thought he's lost a step.

"As a gorilla, I don't think he's lost a step. I don't think I could catch him," said the guy in the gorilla mask who sounded an awful lot like L.T.

Armed Man Shot By Police Has Previous Gun Conviction (PPG)

By Torsten Ove,

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 30, 2006

The man shot by a Pittsburgh police sergeant in Beltzhoover yesterday after police said he pointed a gun at them is a felon who wasn't allowed to have a weapon and had already spent time in prison for carrying an illegal gun.

Court records indicate Jamaar A. Blakey, 22, was on probation following a gun conviction in U.S. District Court in 2004.

Mr. Blakey, who is in serious condition at Mercy Hospital with a wound to his chest, was indicted in June 2004 under Project Safe Neighborhoods, a U.S. Justice Department initiative to combat gun violence that has sent many Pittsburgh-area felons to federal prison in recent years. Under federal law, felons can't have guns or ammunition.

Mr. Blakey, who also has several drug convictions, was sentenced in November 2004 to 30 months in federal prison for possession of a handgun and ammunition on Feb. 28 of that year. He was released on Aug. 24 of this year and was serving three years of supervised release, the federal version of probation.

Pittsburgh police shot Mr. Blakey after they said he pointed a gun at an officer following a brief car chase.

Feds Make Arrest In SLC Library Bombing (SLT)

By Jason Bergreen, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, October 31, 2006

Federal authorities have arrested a former Utah resident with possession of an unregistered destructive device stemming from a bomb explosion in September that caused the evacuation of the Salt Lake City Main Library.

The single federal charge againstThomas James Zajac, formerly of Salt Lake City and Provo, was filed Friday and unsealed Monday after a joint investigation by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the Salt Lake City Police Department and the FBI.

Investigators believe that Zajac, age unavailable, entered the library, 210 E. 400 South, on Sept. 15 carrying a 1 3/4 inch by 1/2 inch pipe bomb concealed in a white paper bag from Arby's restaurant, court documents state.

The bomb also consisted of a rocket igniter believed to have been purchased at an out-of state hobby store that was apparently mounted on a piece of cardboard that had an unknown handwritten message on it.

The bomb, which had been in the library for up to 60 minutes, exploded on the third floor, destroying a large, double-paned window, but it caused no injuries.

A witness told authorities he was on the third floor and heard a hissing noise before the explosion, but didn't recognize anyone in the area leaving, court documents state.

But another witness told a Salt Lake City police detective that he saw a heavy-set man wearing a green polo shirt and Khaki pants sit down in a chair next to the first witness and near a column where the bomb exploded. He described the man as being about 5 feet 10 inches tall, with dark hair and between 30 and 50 years old.

The witness told the detective that the man avoided making eye contact with him and kept looking down at the floor. He was not close enough to see what, if anything, was in the man's hands, court documents state.

Surveillance video from the library captured a man with the same description entering the east side of the library carrying a paper bag. The man entered restrooms on the second and third floors.

IMMIGRATION:

Government Says Border Arrests Decline (AP)

By Hope Yen

U.S. Customs and Border Patrol agents made fewer arrests of illegal immigrants trying to enter the country last year, the government said Monday in a report that credits stronger enforcement.

Arrests fell 8.4 percent from 1.2 million in fiscal year 2005 to 1.1 million last year. It was the first decrease since 2003, the Homeland Security Department said in releasing its annual statistics on illegal immigration.

"What we ideally would like to do is stop them from coming in the first place. The extent that we see fewer crossing the border, that suggests that line of defense is working," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said in a news briefing.

He noted that the department added more than 1,900 border patrol agents in the last year and installed fencing and other security measures such as electronic sensors and cameras.

"These kinds of successes underscore the importance of viewing what we do to protect our borders as part of a comprehensive solution, one that allows us to target the worst of the worst," Chertoff said.

Statistics released Monday also show the government:

_Removed a record 186,600 illegal immigrants from the United States in the past year. That's a 10 percent increase from 2005.

_Seized more than 1.3 million pounds of marijuana, a 13 percent increase from the previous year.

_Nearly tripled the number of fugitive operations teams, from 18 to 50, as part of efforts to locate, apprehend and remove criminal aliens.

The figures, which were complete a month ago, were released a week after President Bush signed a bill authorizing 700 miles of new fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

The new law, which didn't come up with new funding beyond the $1.2 billion previously approved by Congress, gives Republican candidates a pre-election platform for asserting they're tough on illegal immigration. Congressional elections are Nov. 7.

On Monday, Chertoff said improved border security will not be enough. The centerpiece of Bush's immigration policy, a guest worker program, remains stalled in Congress.

"Without a temporary worker program, getting control of the border by the end of 2008 would be very, very difficult," Chertoff said.

Immigration Arrests Down 8% For Year (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

The U.S. Border Patrol apprehended 8 percent fewer illegal immigrants last fiscal year than the year before, reversing a two-year increase in the historically volatile benchmark, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced yesterday.

Chertoff credited the drop of nearly 100,000 apprehensions largely to the Bush administration's strategy of deporting virtually all non-Mexican border crossers as fast as they are caught, deterring them and others in what had been the fastest-growing group of illegal immigrants. After quadrupling the previous four years, apprehensions of "other than Mexican" border crossers fell 57,144, or 35 percent, to 108,026 last year.

The total number of apprehensions in the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30 was nearly 1.1 million.

"We have begun to see, for the first time, a significant turnaround in terms of the number of illegals that we are finding crossing the border," Chertoff said. "The message here is not 'Time to celebrate, we've done the job.' But rather, we ought to be encouraged, but even more determined to get the job completed."

Analysts immediately disputed Chertoff's claim of an unprecedented decline in arrests. Border Patrol apprehensions have risen and fallen like a roller coaster over the years, peaking at almost 1.7 million in 2000 before bottoming out at 932,000 in 2003. Causes include earlier threats of congressional crackdowns; the security climate after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks; and changes in Border Patrol funding and strategies.

Experts instead called yesterday's announcement the administration's latest effort to walk a political tightrope in its handling of illegal immigration heading into the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

They said President Bush's aides are trying to placate conservative and other critics by citing progress in enforcement at the border. At the same time, the White House is continuing to push for a broader overhaul of immigration policy, including a temporary-worker program and a chance for 12 million illegal immigrants to earn citizenship, that is stalled in Congress.

Chertoff backed away yesterday from the Bush administration's pledge to control the nation's borders by 2008, saying it would be "very, very difficult" without a guest-worker program, which the House has resisted. Proponents in Congress say it would take 18 months to six years to set up such a program, after paying for a long-needed computerized worker-verification system to manage it.

"Certainly, I don't think an 8 percent drop in apprehensions is something that we should even be paying attention to," said Demetrios Papademetriou, president of the Migration Policy Institute, which recently called for a comprehensive overhaul of immigration policy. "We don't see a trend line in apprehensions, and apprehensions are not the right yardstick," Papademetriou said.

The arrest total does not measure the number of illegal immigrants who evade capture, experts said, and is affected by fluctuations in law enforcement efforts to catch border crossers.

Steven A. Camarota, research director for the Center for Immigration Studies, which backs stronger enforcement and decreased immigration, congratulated the administration for making significant gains, albeit "very late in the game . . . from a very low starting point." Citing public polling on Americans' attitude toward immigration, he said, "The administration finally understands" that enforcement "is the prerequisite, the starting point, the key to any discussion."

Chertoff denied any political motivation for the early release of the Border Patrol statistics, which are usually reported in January. He said he "owed the public kind of a year-end closeout," since he made similar reports every few months.

Chertoff cited "a very, very significant increase" and "dramatic" shift in U.S. targeting of employers whose business models are based on the use of illegal labor. The United States brought 716 criminal worksite enforcement arrests and charges in 2006, up from 24 in 1999 and 25 in 2002, Chertoff said.

"Although people will squawk about it, the answer to those squawks is to go ahead and finish the job of a comprehensive strategy," Chertoff said. "The answer to the complaints is not to simply turn our backs on violations of the law."

Under the old catch-and-release policy in the summer of 2005, 80 percent of non-Mexicans apprehended at the border were let go inside the United States, pending their hearings, because of a shortage of detention space. But for the past three months, all non-Mexicans have been held pending expedited deportation. Word has filtered back to potential border crossers, who are less likely to try to enter the United States illegally, Chertoff said, and Border Patrol agents have more time to work on other cases.

Chertoff declined to say whether or when DHS would complete 700 miles of a double-layered fence on the U.S.-Mexico border recently approved by Congress and the president. Instead, he cited plans over the next three to six years to build a "virtual fence" that includes physical barriers, electronic remote sensing and vehicle barriers, or other measures where fencing is impractical or ineffective.

"I think our ultimate view is that we want to have a virtual fence across the entire border," Chertoff said. "My disposition is to let the professionals decide what is the best lay-down of all of this."

Since the United States began building a 14-mile barrier south of San Diego in 1990, illegal immigration has shifted to more remote areas. But at 1.1 million, the annual number of apprehensions is about the same as it was in 1991.

Drop In Border Arrests Tied To Enhanced Security (WT)

By Jerry Seper

An 8 percent drop in the number of apprehensions of illegal aliens on U.S. borders in fiscal 2006 was hailed yesterday by the Department of Homeland Security as the result of enhanced border enforcement, but both immigration advocates and proponents questioned the claim.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said that the challenge of controlling the borders "has been with us for 30 years," and that the problem will not be solved in 30 minutes or in 30 days.

"But what is important is to put into place a strategy that, if consistently followed, will put us on a course that will get us security at the border," he said at a press conference at the Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center in Washington. "That's what the public has a right to expect."

Mr. Chertoff also said a guest-worker program was needed to slow the flow of illegals into the United States, although conservative House Republicans have blocked efforts by the Bush administration to pass a temporary-worker bill. He said getting control of the border without such a program would be "very, very difficult."

Frank Sherry, executive director of the National Immigration Forum, said enhanced border security measures by the administration and Congress may have had an effect on the number of illegal entries, but the government's interpretation had the sound of "an infamous general who once said there was a light at the end of the tunnel."

"The problem of illegal immigration didn't start at the border, and it's not going to end at the border," said Mr. Sherry, whose organization builds support for public policies that welcome immigrants and refugees. He said the government has to deal with the 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens now in the United States and their employers.

Mr. Sherry said the drop in the number of border apprehensions may be the result of "smugglers and migrants trying to figure out where the border is most vulnerable."

Steven A. Camarota, research director at the Center for Immigration Studies, which seeks to limit immigration, said it was difficult to determine what the decline meant because there is "no solid body of information" on how many undetected people cross daily into the United States.

Mr. Camarota also said migrants looking to come to this country may simply have opted for other methods, including readily available border-crossing cards and temporary visas, which often result in overstays.

"This well may be a sign that the modest steps taken by the Bush administration to deal with illegal immigration have been effective," he said. "But we just don't know. With a number that falls into the margin of error, it's very hard to tell if this is a trend or just a dip."

In fiscal 2006, apprehensions dropped to 1.1 million from 1.2 million in fiscal 2005, which Homeland Security officials attributed to additional U.S. Border Patrol agents, enhanced technology and the presence of 6,000 National Guard troops.

But it is not known how many people enter the country illegally each year, with estimates on undetected aliens ranging from two to 10 for every one who is caught.

Homeland Secretary Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers, who heads U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said ICE set records for enforcement activity, ending the long-standing practice of "catch and release" on the nation's borders.

She said that ICE removed 186,600 illegal aliens from the country in fiscal 2006, a 10 percent increase over fiscal 2005, and that there were more than seven times as many worksite enforcement cases as in 2002.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Treasury May Trim Note Offerings Borrowing Estimate Is Cut Amid Lower Deficit, Surge In Corporate-Tax Receipts By CAMPION WALSH And BENTON IVES-HALPERIN (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

NEW YORK -- The Treasury is expected to pare its three-year note offerings in this quarter's refunding, a move analysts say is a minor adjustment after the drop in the budget deficit.

The Treasury is likely to announce tomorrow the sale of $33 billion in debt securities, comprising $20 billion in three-year notes and $13 billion in 10-year notes, according to the median estimate of eight dealers surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires. That amount of three-year notes would be $1 billion less than last quarter's sale. "I really see no reason to change the [refunding] offering amounts substantially," said Citigroup Inc. economist Christopher Wiegand. "Treasury borrowing needs are running smaller than even optimists on the budget deficit thought they would be at this point."

The Treasury yesterday reduced its estimate of the quarter's borrowing needs by 39% to $63 billion, citing a surge in corporate-tax receipts that left it with more cash than expected. But it also said borrowing needs would rise to a quarterly record of $175 billion in the January-March period. A Treasury official said government-debt managers would have to re-examine issuance plans if deficits continue to narrow.

The budget deficit fell 22% in the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30 to $247.7 billion, as an expanding economy lifted tax revenues. Government-debt managers will make most of their adjustments for the deficit in issues of short-term bills, preferring to keep stable supplies of longer-maturity debt, analysts said.

Primary dealers are divided over how long the narrowing of the deficit will continue, with several projecting increased red ink this fiscal year as economic growth slows. The budget outlook could hinge on whether Democrats take control of Congress after next week's midterm elections, said William O'Donnell, head of interest-rate strategy and research for UBS AG.

Separately, Treasury bonds ended little changed yesterday. At 4 p.m., the benchmark 10-year note rose 3/32 point, or 93.75 cents per $1,000 face value, at 101 19/32. Its yield fell to 4.671% from 4.681% Friday, as yields move inversely to prices. The 30-year bond was up 7/32 point at 95 17/32 to yield 4.785%.

Hybrids Aim at Retail Investors

A string of new hybrid offerings, which carry features of both debt and equity, hit the investment-grade corporate-bond market, with two borrowers selling securities in small denominations to woo individual investors. Countrywide Financial Corp. will sell $300 million of 60-year notes that will be noncallable for five years. The deal, which is rated Baa3 by Moody's Investors Service and BBB-plus by Standard & Poor's Ratings Service, will consist of 12 million shares to be sold at $25 each.

Countrywide, which has earmarked about $1.8 billion for hybrid issuance, will use the proceeds from the sale to repurchase common stock. The company said last week that it plans to buy back up to $2 billion of stock in the fourth quarter. Bank of America Corp. was in the market with a benchmark-size perpetual offering that also will price at a face value of $25.

Such deals aimed at individuals, who typically invest between $25,000 and $50,000 per transaction, have become popular with borrowers as buyers have lined up to include hybrids in their portfolios. The smaller denominations make it easier for this type of investor to digest, as the $1,000 denomination more typically sold to institutional investors is too big.

Merc Taps Credit Derivatives

The Chicago Mercantile Exchange is taking its first steps to tap into the $26 trillion credit-derivatives market by seeking regulatory approval to list credit-event futures on three companies.

The largest U.S. futures exchange filed documents earlier this month with the Commodity Futures Trading Commission seeking approval to list credit-event futures for Centex Corp., Tribune Co. and Jones Apparel Group Inc.

The futures are five-year contracts that allow participants to hedge their risk against such events as bankruptcy, default, nonpayment and debt restructuring. All three companies have credit ratings near or below the investment grade-junk barrier. The Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. unit chose the companies based, in part, on their credit ratings and their level of liquidity in five-year credit-default swaps, said Merc spokeswoman Pamela Plehn. She also said the Merc wanted to pick firms from different industries. Credit-default swaps also allow investors to protect their debt holdings against default.

Ms. Plehn said the exchange plans to add other companies to its credit-event product line. The exchange hopes to begin trading credit-event futures on its Globex electronic platform in the first quarter, she said.

IGs' Increasing Influence (FEDTIMES)

By Daniel Friedman

Federal Times, October 31, 2006

Outsourcing, terrorism drive more work to investigators

Under a cover that includes an image of a woman's midriff, a report released last month by the Interior Department's inspector general sums up thousands of employee visits to pornographic and gambling Web sites on office computers.

An Oct. 11 report by the Justice Department IG details a former Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives Bureau director's request for a lavish office with features like remote-controlled doors.

And at the Education Department, a September IG report describes officials' efforts to steer purchases away from disfavored textbook makers. The report quotes an e-mail in which a program director wrote, "They are trying to crash our party and we need to beat the [expletive] out of them."

The spate of headline-grabbing revelations underscores a trend. With the explosion of government procurement and more contracts to audit, and with an expanded law enforcement role in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks, inspectors general have more work and responsibilities, observers of the oversight community say.

"The mission of the inspector general has broadened very substantially over the years," said former Transportation Department IG Kenneth Mead.

And more responsibility may mean more clout. The Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction got expanded budgetary purview through legislation signed Oct. 17 by the president. Earlier this month, the Justice Department announced the formation of a task force, composed mostly of IGs, to investigate procurement fraud. A House bill, currently before the Government Reform Committee, would make IGs harder to fire and allow them to submit budgets straight to Congress and the Office of Management and Budget, instead of agency heads. The legislation could include steps to increase coordination among IGs and other oversight organizations. The measures are intended to increase IGs' independence, which some think is lacking at agencies where IG budgets are controlled by management.

"Audit demands and the scope of demands [are] growing, because of some real and some perceived problems in the process over the last few years," said Stan Soloway, president of the Professional Services Council, an association of government contractors. Soloway said the result is unnecessary and wasteful audits.

Many IGs, meanwhile, said they are struggling to meet the growing demands despite flat budgets and staff levels. And with no authority to enforce recommendations, they must develop strategies to effect change.

Growth areas

Much of the added demand on IGs comes from the growth of government procurement. Federal contracting increased 83 percent from 2000 to 2005, according to data on Fedspending.org, a Web site maintained by the nonprofit group OMB Watch.

While General Services Administration Administrator Lurita Doan recently announced plans to use private firms for pre-award audits of contracts, work currently done by the agency's IG, that appears to be an exception. Across government, IG auditors say they are reviewing more and bigger contracts.

"Procurement is one of the major challenges in almost every agency," said Energy Department IG Gregory Friedman, who is vice chairman of the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency, a group that includes the 29 presidentially appointed IGs.

But Soloway said IGs have increased contract audits at a pace unjustified by rising outsourcing. He said, for example, that IGs are wasting money auditing fixed-price contracts, which are intended to alleviate the need for extensive reviews.

"I think you see some overreach in some cases," he said.

The FBI's 2001 decision to focus more on preventing terrorism also contributes to the increase in the IGs' workload. The decision required the FBI to cut back on some criminal investigations, and IG investigators have helped pick up the slack in areas like public corruption and contract fraud.

The Patriot Act gave many IGs expanded law enforcement capabilities. And IGs' broad subpoena power and ability to investigate both criminal and civil matters already gives them power that many law enforcement agencies lack.

IGs in 2005 doubled over the previous year the number of companies and individuals barred from doing business with the government, helped convict more criminals and convinced managers to cut more costs in programs they audited, according to an annual report summarizing IG work across government. The number of federal employees, local officials and contractors who faced adverse action, such as termination, due to IG investigations jumped 40 percent from the prior year, according to the report.

Hurricane Katrina and the completion of an unusual number of investigations may have inflated those numbers, Friedman said. But he said IGs have certainly become more active than in past years.

Some observers say IGs are addressing a role left vacant by Congress' abandonment of assertive oversight. "That stuff isn't going on on the Hill anymore," said Linda Gustitus, a former chief of staff to Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich. "This Congress has absolutely been pathetic in terms of oversight," Gustitus added, citing, for example, a lack of hearings on Iraqi contracting problems.

IGs are also responding to a growth in information technology spending and increased demand for data security. In their annual management challenge lists, about three-quarters of IGs called IT and cybersecurity major challenges at their agencies, Friedman said.

Of the 600 employees at Homeland Security's IG office, 40 now work full time on IT audits, up from 25 in 2003, according to James Taylor, the deputy IG.

With the number of employees in the 57 federal IG offices up just 600, to about 11,600, since 2001, new demands force tough choices about how to deploy staff, IGs said.

"We are forced to do a form of triage and deal with the most pressing issues," Friedman said.

The Homeland Security IG got extra funds to review programs created after Hurricane Katrina, but it still had to reduce attention to areas like intelligence and science and technology to meet new demands, Taylor said.

Mead said that during his tenure, other priorities forced him to devote less attention to aviation and highway programs than he would have liked.

"In effect, you have to make choices about where you're going to get the bigger bang for your buck," he said.

Leading reform

IGs are required to produce regular reports, but they have no formal power to implement recommendations. They use varying tactics to exert influence. Their relationship with management helps determine their approach.

Interior's IG, Earl Devaney, in congressional testimony last month, said he grew frustrated over the years by former Secretary Gale Norton's failure to address ethics violations by top officials. As a result, he began blasting Interior in a manner designed to generate media attention. And despite what he calls a better relationship with the current secretary, Dirk Kempthorne, Devaney's office has stayed vocal.

"If you don't get a certain amount of publicity for the reports, you're not going to be able to have as much clout to change the system as you'd want," said Kris Kolesnik, a Devaney spokesman. "The purpose is to get it out in the public domain, so there's more of an incentive for the people in the department to get it right."

At Homeland Security, where officials struggle with the challenges of a hastily assembled organization, Taylor, a former chief financial officer, described a different dynamic.

Homeland Security officials regularly ask for IG opinions on management challenges, and under Inspector General Richard Skinner, the office works to provide timely and actionable reports, Taylor said. The office has also hired people with experience doing the work they are evaluating.

"We want to make sure our goals and objectives are matching up with [management's]," Taylor said.

"We don't play gotcha," he noted. "We don't do interviews. . . . It really discourages risk-taking when you've got so many people waiting to find something wrong."

Many IGs say they balance their partnership with management and their independence. They seek a level of closeness with management that does not compromise their independence, and a degree of separation that does not render them impotent.

"It's a fine line to walk," said Justice Department IG Glenn Fine. "You have got to be independent, but on the other hand, you have got to communicate because the goals are similiar."

Many managers advocate sustained and meaningful communication with IGs. While management and auditors may not agree, they should share certain expectations, officials said.

"We need to have consistency and agreement around . . . the rules of the game," Soloway said.

At a panel this month on IGs' effect on IT, Labor Department CFO Samuel Mok said he works to keep his IG in the loop. Mok said he appoints staff to liaison with OIG.

"If something happens and you can't pick up the phone and get some informal feedback, you're not doing your job," he said, though he admits his approach can backfire.

Doug Glenn, GSA's deputy CFO speaking at the same event, said IG reports can be an alternative way to get "the powers that be" to address problems.

"A lot of times we need an IG report or an auditor report that says, 'Hey, this is an issue,'" he said.

Fights Brew Over House Posts (WP)

By Lois Romano And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

As Democrats enter the final days of their push to take back control of the House in next week's election, two divisive backroom leadership fights are brewing within the party, raising fears that Democratic unity could be fraying even before the first votes are cast.

For some Democrats, the battle between Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), the minority whip, who had been expected to ascend to majority leader without opposition, and Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) threatens the party's efforts to appear ready to govern.

In what could be another high-profile showdown, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the ambitious former White House aide who runs the Democratic campaign arm of the House, may seek the third-ranking post of majority whip, pitting him against Democratic Caucus Chairman James E. Clyburn (S.C.), the only African American in a leadership position.

This could exacerbate racial strains in the House, since both the Congressional Black Caucus and the Congressional Hispanic Caucus have complained that Emanuel is insensitive to minority concerns. Members of the black caucus accused him of using strong-arm tactics to collect dues for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, and the Hispanic caucus withheld its dues last year until Emanuel hired a Hispanic staffer at the DCCC.

On one point there is no disagreement: If the Democrats win, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) will be elected speaker. While she has not taken a public position in the Hoyer-Murtha battle, she is politically and personally much closer to Murtha and has a long-standing rivalry with Hoyer.

But members, aides and outside consultants who are closely watching the contest said Murtha has an uphill battle because Hoyer has worked for a decade to rebuild the majority, raising millions of dollars for his colleagues and recruiting Democrats to run.

And Pelosi may be irked that Murtha publicly picked this fight, according to some Democrats.

"I suspect that she feels like most other members, that we'd rather not have this divisive contest," Clyburn said of the majority leader's race. "We've spent a lot of the last two years getting the caucus together. We're more cohesive than we've been in a long time, and most people appreciate the climate we're currently operating in."

Murtha is seen by many in the House as an old-school political insider whose power is derived from his position as ranking member of the Appropriations subcommittee on defense and from the money he can direct to members' districts. A former Marine who has always been pro-military, the 16-term congressman was embraced by his liberal colleagues last year when he called for the immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. But Murtha's stand on the war has not automatically gained him support from the left in his quest to become majority leader.

Hoyer, a moderate, actively solicited support from a number of liberals who are not comfortable with Murtha's conservative positions opposing abortion and gun control. Rep. Maxine Waters (Calif.), chairman of the Out of Iraq Caucus, announced her support for Hoyer, although she praised Murtha's plan for troop withdrawal. Other liberals supporting Hoyer include Reps. Barney Frank (Mass.), John Lewis (Ga.) and Jerrold Nadler (N.Y.).

"Steny has done a tireless job to get back the House for us for more than a decade," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (Calif.), a strong Pelosi ally who is in line to become chairman of the Government Reform Committee if the Democrats win. "Given the leadership he has shown and his ability to unite Democrats, he's the logical choice."

Other Hoyer supporters question why Murtha has chosen to pick a fight now when the Democrats are the most unified they have been in 50 years and are on the verge of taking control of the House.

"I have a lot of respect for Jack Murtha, but I remain shocked that he is talking about making a run for majority leader," said Rep. Ellen Tauscher (Calif.), a Hoyer supporter and a leading Democratic moderate. "I don't understand it. I'm not supportive of it, and it's having a deleterious effect on what I think and hope will be a huge win on November 7."

Murtha's supporters are quick to dismiss charges that the veteran lawmaker is sowing discord. They say Hoyer's supporters are acting as if he has a right to the majority leader's post, when in fact such leadership contests are routine.

"This decision is going to get made the week we get back," said Rep. Michael E. Capuano (Mass.), a Murtha supporter. "There's not going to be a lot of time for it to fester. The minute it's over, we will all be pushing in the same direction."

Hoyer and Murtha have long had a rocky relationship, according to Democratic sources, and Hoyer's allies say he is not happy that he has had to spend valuable time before an important election shoring up his support. "There isn't going to be a majority leader's race if we don't win this election," Hoyer said in a brief interview last weekend.

Murtha said recently that he is running because he believes that Hoyer has been disloyal to Pelosi, an accusation that Hoyer has denied. "The guy has been trying to undercut her ever since she was elected minority leader," Murtha said. "Damn right it's true."

Some Democrats predicted that Murtha will not stay in the race if he is not fairly certain he can win, for fear of diluting his power. But Murtha supporters say he will stick it out because it is difficult to predict what members will do in secret balloting. "Look, both have duplicate names on their list," said Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (Va.), a Murtha supporter. "No one wants to get on the wrong side of either of them."

The Murtha-Hoyer competition could be eclipsed in bitterness if Emanuel presses ahead with a campaign for the whip's post. Kathleen Connery, a spokeswoman for Emanuel, said the lawmaker "morally feels obligated to the contributors, candidates and the caucus to focus like a laser on November 7, and anyone not doing that is not delivering for the caucus."

That said, aides close to Emanuel said he has not ruled out a challenge.

"That would be a hotly contested race," said Rep. Melvin Watt (N.C.), the chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus.

Staff researcher Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

If Dems Take Over The House ... (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Democratic takeover of the U.S. House would put more women and minorities in positions of power, as well as more senior citizens. That much is certain.

Democrats say it will mean longer workweeks in the House of Representatives to pass tax cuts for the middle class and to devise a strategy to get U.S. troops out of Iraq. They promise more time in the hot seat for members of the Bush administration. "We have a broad agenda," says Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., a co-chairman of his party's House campaign.

President Bush and other Republicans say Democrats in charge will be bad for the economy and the war on terrorism. "The Democrats want to raise your taxes," Bush said Monday in Georgia. "However they put it, the Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses."

Bush stressed that "this election is far from over." Polls give Democrats their best chance in 12 years of gaining control of the House. They need to pick up 15 seats. Democrats need six seats for a Senate takeover. Though less likely, it's not out of the question.

Except for 20 months during his first two years in office, when Democrats held a one-vote Senate majority, Bush has worked with a GOP-led Congress. Even with a Democratic one, the president will still be able to block bills he doesn't like with a veto.

Changing priorities

Even so, a Democratic House would radically alter the balance of power in Washington. That's because House rules — unlike those in the Senate — give the majority sweeping authority to set the legislative agenda.

Some possible changes:

•New power brokers. The most dramatic difference would come at the top. House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi is poised to become the first woman to serve as speaker of the House. Under the Constitution, the San Franciscan would be behind Vice President Cheney to succeed Bush.

Pelosi already has signaled that she will name committee chairpersons based on seniority. Republican Speakers Newt Gingrich and Dennis Hastert sometimes did not do so. The gavel would go to at least four African-Americans, including John Conyers of Michigan at the Judiciary Committee helm and three women, including California's Juanita Millender-McDonald and

New York's Nydia Velázquez, who would be the only Hispanic committee leader. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, who is openly gay, would lead a committee.

Currently, all of the House GOP committee chairmen are white and male.

It would also increase the age of House chairpersons. In January 2005, 11 Republican committee leaders were younger than 60. Seven prospective Democratic chairpersons will be over 70 when the 110th Congress convenes in January. "Just because they are old doesn't mean they aren't good," says Matt Angle, a former congressional aide and Democratic political consultant.

Republicans see it differently. "The House will have chairmen who come from the old order," says House Republicans' former No. 2 leader Tom DeLay, suggesting they will be heavy-handed and unyielding to anything but Democratic Party orthodoxy.

One committee chairmanship appears uncertain. Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., is at the end of her term on the Intelligence Committee. Pelosi has not said she would renew Harman's term.

•New issues. Pelosi wants to raise the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour. She wants to halve the interest rate on student loans and enact the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission to fight terrorism.

On health care, Democrats want to give the federal government the authority to negotiate lower prescription-drug prices for seniors and expand research using embryonic stem cells.

And Pelosi wants to do all of that in her first 100 hours as speaker.

Pelosi also has promised a bill that would ban lobbyists from underwriting lawmakers' trips and prohibit corporations from providing discount travel on private jets. That goes beyond legislation that is currently stalled.

On Iraq, Democrats are likely to press for withdrawal of U.S. troops, but Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a leading critic of the Iraq war, says any policy changes must be made "in conjunction with the White House."

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., says the House Energy and Commerce Committee under his leadership would explore universal health care and debate ways to diversify the nation's energy supplies.

Prospects for a sweeping immigration overhaul could improve if Democrats controlled the House. A bipartisan bill that passed the Senate and won Bush's support has been blocked by Hastert and other GOP leaders who oppose provisions that would offer a chance at citizenship to estimated 12 million people now living in the USA illegally.

Taxes and compromise

Rep. Charles Rangel of New York, who would head the Ways and Means Committee, wants tax cuts for child care and tuition assistance, but has called for rolling back those he says benefit wealthier Americans such as estate tax.

DeLay predicts that Americans who don't consider themselves wealthy will find their tax bills going up: "They think if you make $100,000, you're rich."

•A new atmosphere? Murtha, a Pelosi confidant, says Democrats won't try to impeach, even though that's the hope of some people he calls "rabid" Democrats. Pelosi says she wants probes of Bush's first-term energy task force and the intelligence leading to the Iraq war.

Even so, Murtha says, Democrats will try to reduce partisan tensions. One plan: extending the amount of time House members spend in Washington, which shrunk to three days or less per week under the GOP. "You spend time together, you get to know each other," Murtha says.

Some of the Democratic candidates now running, such as North Carolina's Heath Shuler, are centrists from swing districts who will want to reach out to Republicans, says Tim Roemer, a former Indiana congressman. "They want to be re-elected," Roemer says.

They could find a willing partner in Bush, says Martin Frost, a former Democratic congressman from Texas. When Bush was governor there, he was known for his ability to get along with the Democrats who led the state House. "It made him seek middle ground," Frost says.

Others predict there won't be much appetite for compromise after a bitter campaign that's likely to thin the GOP of its moderates. "The president's veto record will go sky-high," says DeLay.

Some bills, such as one to expand federal funding of embryonic stem cell research that Bush vetoed, are likely to be offered even if Bush or Republicans don't support them. Democrats "will want to lay down markers for the 2008 campaign," Frost says.

Dingell counsels his fellow Democrats to focus first on Election Day: "Before you sell the bear's hide, you first have to shoot the bear."

NASA Invests In Its Future With Venture Capital Firm (WP)

By Marc Kaufman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

'Red Planet' Nonprofit to Fund Aerospace Innovation

Hoping to tap the innovation and daring of small aerospace and biomedical companies, NASA has created and funded a nonprofit venture capital firm that will invest government money in promising but underfinanced companies.

The fund, called Red Planet Capital, is the government's third experiment with venture capitalism, after similar efforts sponsored by the CIA and the Army.

Red Planet marks the first time that the federal government has started a venture capital fund for civilian purposes, but it is hardly a stretch. That is because a former president of the CIA-sponsored venture fund is Michael D. Griffin -- now the administrator of NASA.

"NASA could see that a lot of technical innovation is coming out of companies that don't traditionally do business with the government, and we wanted better and faster access to that creativity," said Lisa L. Lockyer, NASA program manager for the project. "The administrator has been very supportive of the idea."

She said the fund will not only invest on its own in cutting-edge companies but will also join private venture capital firms to form investment syndicates. Together, she said, those partnerships will be able to invest far more money in selected companies than the government could.

The NASA fund, which will be managed by three venture fund veterans selected by the agency through a competitive process, will receive $75 million in taxpayer funds over five years. The money is to be invested only in emerging technologies that might someday be useful to NASA.

"We will invest with others in companies making products that aren't being made elsewhere and that NASA might be able to use," said Peter Banks, one of the organizers and managers of Red Planet. "We don't really expect the companies to be making products that can be used as is on the moon, or in other low-gravity environments. NASA would do the adapting once the technology is developed."

The focus of the initiative is captured in the fund's name. Under President Bush's 2004 space initiative, NASA will be returning astronauts to the moon by 2020 and potentially sending them later to Mars.

"Our focus is not on today or the near tomorrows, since nothing from these new companies can be used before at least the three-to-five-year time frame," Banks said. "What this fund does is set a trajectory towards Mars, and human exploration of Mars."

Banks said that Griffin, an advocate of the moon-Mars initiative, played a major role in selecting the name for the fund.

Griffin, a longtime NASA aerospace engineer and manager, with stints as an academic and business executive, was president of the CIA-sponsored venture capital fund In-Q-Tel for two years. Founded in 1999, In-Q-Tel has a mission parallel to that of Red Planet -- to invest in small companies working on cutting-edge technologies that could be adapted for the agency's use.

The CIA fund reports investments in more than 90 companies that delivered more than 130 technologies to the agency -- sometimes from companies that never knew why the CIA had invested in them. The effort was considered enough of a success that some other intelligence agencies now work through In-Q-Tel.

In-Q-Tel, however, had a number of policies that caused some public controversy -- including generous compensation for its executives, and a system that allows employees to share in profits when stakes in fund-owned companies are sold at prices above the initial investment. Documents filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission showed, for instance, that 45 In-Q-

Tel employees profited from the sale of the fund's holdings in fledgling laser weapons maker Ionatron in 2005, and that 17 of them earned more than $50,000 each from the sale.

Lockyer said that Red Planet will have a similar policy of distributing some profits -- sales above the cost of the initial fund investment -- with company managers. She said that the annual salaries of the three partners have not been determined, but that they will be competitive with other venture capital operations, which are far higher than salaries of government employees.

While NASA is very interested in the newest thinking in rocket and space technology, the agency is also looking for strategies and products related to keeping astronauts safe and healthy in space for long periods of time, Lockyer said. The kind of cosmic radiation astronauts will face if they go to Mars or remain on the moon for long periods is known to cause significant bone loss and can lead to central-nervous-system injury and increased risk of cancer. If innovators and researchers cannot find ways to protect the astronauts, then long-term space travel will be impossible.

"This kind of biomedical work is definitely something we're interested in," Lockyer said. "It could be very useful to NASA and could also come up with discoveries that will be useful to people on Earth and so could be commercially profitable."

The Red Planet managers and staff will have an advantage that most other venture capital funds do not have: They will have constant input from NASA officials about what kinds of technologies and services the agency is looking for. As a result, they will be able to invest in companies that may have a better-than-usual chance of someday selling a product to NASA.

"Given our special circumstances," Banks said, "we're hoping that other private venture capital firms will be interested in joining us in our investments.

Daring Hubble Repair Plan Awaits 'go' (USAT)

By Traci Watson, Usa Today

For 2½ years, top NASA officials have fretted over whether to send astronauts to revive the critically ill Hubble Space Telescope.

The answer comes today, when NASA Administrator Michael Griffin announces whether the space shuttle will pay a service call to Hubble. If Griffin says yes, a flight to install two new scientific instruments, fix a third and upgrade telescope systems could launch as early as next winter.

Despite the uncertainty, NASA engineers and astronauts have been quietly toiling on a plan to rescue the telescope.

Space agency personnel have created new Hubble repair tools. They have outlined a rough mission schedule. And they have developed new repair techniques in hopes of fixing one of America's most cherished scientific instruments.

The 2002 shuttle flight to Hubble, the most recent of four, was tough enough, says astronaut John Grunsfeld, who made spacewalks to fix the telescope in 1999 and 2002. "If that was heart surgery, this time we're planning to do brain surgery — that next level of delicacy," he says.

Some of the tasks on the flight, such as opening a door fastened with more than 100 tiny screws, "would seem to be impossible," says astronaut Michael Massimino, who also did a spacewalk in 2002 to repair the telescope. "This one, I think, is about as challenging as you can get," Massimino says.

A bit of Velcro falling into the telescope's guts could spoil its vision. One misplaced nudge of a spacewalking astronaut's foot could derail a telescope that, while wounded, is still snapping pictures of the cosmos.

"You want to be very, very careful," says Massimino, yet "you want to get as much done as you possibly can, because you're up there for a finite time." He notes that the astronauts who live on the space station can polish off chores that weren't finished during spacewalks. Hubble has no such backup.

NASA has added new safety precautions to every shuttle flight since shuttle Columbia disintegrated in 2003. Now every shuttle crew must spend an entire day in orbit inspecting the ship's thermal shield, a procedure that demands precious time and fuel.

"The biggest challenge … (is) how do we pack everything we need to do to assure a safe vehicle into a typical Hubble mission?" says astronaut Joseph Tanner, whose four shuttle flights included one to Hubble in 1997. "It's not business like it used to be."

It was safety that led then-NASA administrator Sean O'Keefe in 2004 to cancel the fifth shuttle mission to Hubble. Since the Columbia accident, NASA has made sure that in an emergency, every shuttle crew could hole up on the International Space Station and wait for rescue by another shuttle. But a shuttle visiting Hubble couldn't reach the station, which follows a path around the Earth more than 100 miles away from the Hubble's orbit.

When Griffin took over the space agency in early 2005, he changed course. NASA, he said, would send a shuttle to save Hubble if the first flights after the Columbia accident went well. The three flights since the accident — one in 2005, another in July, and one in September — all returned safely to Earth.

The long to-do list for the next Hubble mission means that the crew would probably make five spacewalks in five days. Missions to the station usually include only three spacewalks, with a day of rest between them.

The punishing work schedule on a Hubble mission, combined with the extra task of inspecting the shuttle, adds up to a "crew workload (that) is going to be outrageous," Grunsfeld says. "There's going to be no sleeping on this mission." That can lead to risky fatigue.

By far the most difficult task on a fifth Hubble flight would be fixing the Space Telescope Imaging Spectrograph, which analyzes the light from distant objects in the cosmos. The spectrograph, dead since 2004 because of a faulty electronics board, gives information on temperature and density. It was not designed to be fixed in orbit, posing these challenges:

•The door to the compartment containing the faulty part is held down by 111 tiny screws, which an astronaut in a spacesuit would find nearly impossible to remove. Once freed, the screws could easily float away and vanish into the workings of the telescope.

Engineers at the Goddard Space Flight Center devised a special miniature screwdriver and a device that will improve the astronauts' aim as they work on the screws and clamp onto them once they're loose.

•The edges of the electronics board are sharp — a peril to the astronauts, whose spacesuits are inflated with air. That means the spacewalkers can't touch the board for fear of puncturing their suits.

The board is held in place by locks akin to "Chinese finger handcuffs," says Hubble program manager Preston Burch. "As you pull on them, they get tighter and tighter." On Earth, it may take an hour to coax one out. A "card-puller" has been devised for the astronauts to use to yank the board free.

•The spectrograph lies so deep inside Hubble that the astronauts can't work as usual. On a normal Hubble task, two astronauts stand on the shuttle's robotic arm, one doing the work, and the second handing tools to the first.

The Hubble team now thinks the repair astronaut can stand on a portable scaffold attached to the telescope. The shuttle's robot arm might hover nearby and act as a tool caddy.

Because of the time pressure the astronauts face, the planning team has also worked on how to make the routine Hubble chores easier.

Engineers have cooked up an alignment device that will help the spacewalkers load Hubble with new scientific instruments, which have to be slid into their slots just so. They're building exact replicas of parts of the telescope so the astronauts can practice their moves. They're rethinking how to load items on the shuttle, to cut the time spent hunting for supplies.

"We don't leave anything to chance," Burch says. "We work real hard to make sure that we can't get fooled."

FEDERAL DIARY: Transition To Pay For Performance Makes Some Anxious (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Many federal employees fear that as many tricks as treats lie ahead with their new pay systems.

Perhaps that's a bit of an exaggeration, but it is fair to say that transitions to new pay and management systems involve hard work, especially for federal managers asked to more rigorously rate job performance and link that rating to a pay raise. Bush administration officials acknowledge that changes planned for two large departments, Defense and Homeland Security, have created a fair share of anxious employees.

Some of that anxiety appears based on concerns that the new pay-for-performance systems could be manipulated to lower the government's payroll (about $456 million per day in the executive branch) and pension costs. That should not happen, according to the Office of Personnel Management, which had a hand in designing the new systems for the Defense and Homeland Security departments.

"These systems' assumptions, principles and requirements all point to ensuring no reduction in the overall amount spent on basic pay increases. Consequently, we would not expect any reduction in pension obligations," the OPM said in a briefing paper.

Congress approved the new pay systems following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks for the Defense and Homeland Security departments after the Bush administration contended it needed more leeway in how civil-service employees are paid and managed.

Under the new approach, the decades-old General Schedule, which provided predictable pay raises, will be replaced with the National Security Personnel System, which is being phased in at Defense, and with MaxHR, which is still on the drawing board at Homeland Security.

The two systems emphasize the importance of an employee's job performance and seek to change the government's traditional compensation practice. Instead of providing an across-the-board raise to all employees, as the General Schedule permits, the two departments will provide higher raises to their best workers and smaller or no raises to their low-rated employees.

Over time, performance pay may affect a worker's pension. Part of the formula used to set federal pensions involves multiplying years of service by a percentage applied to the "high-3" -- the average of the three highest-paid years of consecutive service. Under the pay-for-performance systems, the employee with high ratings should have an enhanced high-3, while employees with lower job ratings will see a smaller high-3.

"That's fundamental to a pay design that makes performance distinctions, but overall the government would not achieve savings," the OPM said.

The new pay systems also introduced another variable for employees -- bonuses. Lump-sum awards and bonuses do not count toward retirement. Under the NSPS, managers can determine what portion of an employee's annual raise should be given as a base pay increase or as a bonus. In certain circumstances, employees may find that their pay has been capped and that they can receive only bonuses.

Administration officials have promised to Congress that managers will receive extensive training on how to administer the new systems to ensure that employees are treated fairly.

According to the OPM, federal managers, in addition to job performance ratings, will have several other factors to take into account when setting pay every year, such as recent promotions, local labor-market conditions, turnover rates and how much money has been made available by Congress for salaries.

That's about as many ingredients as you would find in a witch's cauldron. Don't be surprised if this pay transition continues to next Halloween.Award Winner

The International Public Management Association for Human Resources has honored John Palguta , vice president for policy at the Partnership for Public Service.

Palguta was named this year's winner of the Warner W. Stockberger Achievement Award, named after the first director of personnel for the Agriculture Department. The award goes to a person in public or private life who has made an outstanding contribution toward the improvement of public personnel management at any level of government.Retirement

Gwendolyn Aughtry , staff assistant in the Justice Department's commercial litigation branch, retires today after 34 years of federal service.

Federal Agencies' Outward Migration Irks Area Officials (WP)

By Alec Macgillis

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Relocations Undermine Efforts To Limit Sprawl, Planners Say

As they battle sprawl, Washington area leaders say they face a stubborn foe, and it's not greedy developers or the tyranny of the automobile or the desire for big houses. It is the United States government.

In scattering employees to the region's outer edges, local officials and planners say, the federal government has undermined efforts to concentrate growth near public transit and the area's urban core -- the strategy local officials see as key to reducing traffic and conserving resources in a booming region.

The U.S. government, they say, has become a kind of master planner, making decisions, with little local input, that will shape Washington's commuting and development patterns for years.

"I continue to be amazed by the shortsightedness of the federal government," said Fairfax County Supervisor T. Dana Kauffman (D-Lee). "Whatever they do is 'here and now.' They seem to have no interest in trying to plan for the rational development of a sustainable community. I suppose if they had the chance to relocate to the moon, they would."

Sparking the most recent round of complaints were reports last week that the FBI is moving its Northern Virginia field office from Tysons Corner to Prince William County. The FBI says it needs more space and that the site near Manassas is less expensive and more secure than locations closer in. But some FBI employees note that it will result in higher commuting costs for many of the office's 300 workers and encourage some of them to move farther out. Agents will have to make long trips on overloaded Interstate 66 for their cases and for meetings with prosecutors in Alexandria, they say.

The move is reminiscent of another, far bigger dispersal: the Pentagon's transfer of 30,000 military and civilian employees from Arlington County, the District and other close-in locations to installations farther out, mostly to Fort Belvoir in southern Fairfax. Rather than being near Metro, the jobs, which will be followed by thousands of related contractors, will be in an area with crowded roads and little transit. Also getting thousands more workers are two other posts on the region's fringe, Fort Meade in Anne Arundel County and Quantico Marine Base in Prince William.

Local officials see a similar lack of federal foresight in the rejection of a proposal to build a Metrorail extension to Dulles International Airport underground through Tysons Corner instead of on an elevated track. Tunnel proponents said it would help achieve a key goal of Fairfax leaders to transform the county's downtown into a walkable urban center, but federal transit officials discouraged Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) against the tunnel, saying the delays and higher costs it would bring would imperil federal funding.

Critics also point to the consolidation of the Food and Drug Administration outside the Capital Beltway in White Oak and the transfer in the 1990s of the headquarters of the Naval Air Systems Command from Arlington to Southern Maryland. But not all agencies are moving outside the Beltway. The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms recently built new headquarters near the New York Avenue Metro station.

Other regions also must contend with the consequences of military relocations and other federal actions, but the dominance of the federal government in Washington makes the area uniquely dependent on it. Ideally, officials say, this could be a plus, if the government used its sway to drive unified planning across a region divided among three jurisdictions.

That happened to some extent in the 1990s, planners and officials say, when President Bill Clinton issued an executive order that federal agencies try to locate within downtowns. By dispersing agencies outward, critics say, the federal government is effectively undermining its $10 billion investment in Metro.

"Six or eight years ago, [the federal government] was moving in the right direction . . . but now you have a couple major decisions that undo" past successes, Arlington County Board member Jay Fisette (D) said.

At the heart of the federal government's justification for the recent decisions are cost savings and security. The Pentagon says the moves chosen by the Base Realignment and Closure Commission will save $49 billion nationwide, partly by moving employees out of leased space such as in Crystal City. Moving out of such close-in locations as Arlington and Alexandria to such closed posts as Belvoir also complies with new military requirements for 82-foot setbacks to guard against truck bombs.

Asked about local complaints, a Pentagon spokesman pointed to the commission's final report, which acknowledged local concerns that "quality of life could be reduced because of transportation problems such as increased traffic, lack of public transportation and increased commuting times, with the attendant issues of air pollution and increased fuel consumption." The report went on to say that "these concerns were carefully weighed and considered, but in the final analysis the commission found they did not collectively rise to the level of a substantial deviation" from other priorities.

The General Services Administration, which oversees the siting of federal facilities, mentions in its regulations the need to consider transportation access, environmental impact and a "community's economy, sense of place and social fabric." But security concerns apply even to agencies unrelated to the military or law enforcement -- all new federal buildings are supposed to have a minimum setback of 50 feet, though exemptions are possible in urban areas, depending on the agency's function.

Critics say that although security concerns are understandable in the wake of the 2001 terrorist attacks and the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, the recent moves go too far. They point out that other countries have found ways, from traffic restrictions to building design, to keep government buildings downtown in their capital cities.

"There seems to be a perception that federal agencies, no matter what they do, need to be protected," said Ronald F. Kirby, a transportation planner with the Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments. "Rather than mix in and have your offices spread around with other activities, it's, 'Let's all get together and build a fortress someplace, and no one can get near us.' "

Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.) said many of agencies being moved to Belvoir are obscure entities and hardly obvious targets. "The terrorists don't know who's in what office building, and even if they knew, they couldn't locate them because of all those acronyms," he said. "The security thing is overblown. It's not tempered by any measure of common sense."

George Vradenburg, a former America Online executive who is organizing a major regional planning exercise, said that the head of the GSA's buildings department had remarked at a recent conference that the agency would be willing to include local officials on the panel that makes siting decisions. But Vradenburg said nothing has come of that so far.

Some say the concerns over the federal dispersal are exaggerated. Other than the military relocations, there is little sign of a general outward move by other federal agencies, said Matthew J. Klein, president of the Akridge development company, which has federal tenants in several of its buildings. "Washington is the center of government operations, and my sense is that people still want to be closer to that center," he said. "Last I checked, no one was moving from the White House or Capitol Hill."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) disputed the inclusion of the Tysons tunnel decision as an example of federal narrow-mindedness. Fairfax officials were initially in support of an aboveground route for the Metro through Tysons, he said, and when local officials recently decided a tunnel was better, federal officials simply told them that it would be difficult to change plans. He agreed, however, with criticisms of the military relocation, which he called a "horrendous land-use decision."

Particularly aggravating to some about the transfers to Belvoir is that the Army has so far ruled out putting any of the elements at a huge, underused GSA warehouse in Springfield, a couple of miles from the post and adjacent to a Metro station. The Army says it is too complicated for it to get control of the site.

Other local officials hold out the hope that the relocations to Belvoir, which are supposed to be done by 2011, won't be carried out fully. It's possible, they say, that the road upgrades needed for the move will be found to be too costly or that a new defense secretary will soon replace Donald H. Rumsfeld, a top proponent of consolidating employees on posts.

But Pentagon spokesman Chris Isleib said it was unrealistic to expect a pullback on transfers. The relocation "is a matter of law, and we remain committed to it," he said.

Incomes Rose Last Month; Spending Was Restrained (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

Americans' incomes rose last month at the quickest pace since June, but consumers did not respond by rushing out to splurge as gasoline prices fell from their summer peak.

Instead, they spent at about the same pace and put more money aside. As a result, the nationwide personal savings rate came the closest it has in a year and a half to climbing out of the red.

The Commerce Department reported yesterday that personal income in September increased at a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 0.5 percent, compared with 0.4 percent in August. Personal consumption spending, meanwhile, rose 0.1 percent in September after a 0.2 percent increase in August.

The net personal savings figure improved in September to a seasonally adjusted annual pace of minus $15 billion, compared with minus $49 billion in August. And while Americans are still living richer lives than their paychecks can sustain, savings have not been healthier since May 2005. They have been in the red since the month before, in April 2005.

With Americans earning more and spending more, economists expect that the gross domestic product will expand faster than it did in the third quarter. On Friday, the Commerce Department reported growth of 1.6 percent from July through September — by far the slowest quarter this year.

A number of factors, including falling gas prices and growing disposable income, are likely to lift consumer spending modestly in the months ahead.

"The current environment of declining energy prices and healthy wage growth is a pretty potent combination going forward," said Drew Matus, senior economist with Lehman Brothers. "It would not be surprising if you saw consumption continue to increase to some degree."

Most experts agree that any increase in consumer spending in the remainder of the year will not be a striking one. "This isn't going to unlock a spending frenzy," said Brian A. Bethune, an economist with the research firm Global Insight. "It's going to be moderate, but it's not going to be explosive."

When last month's spending figures are adjusted for inflation, they indicate more growth. Spending increased 0.4 percent in September when inflation was factored in, as distinct from 0.1 percent growth excluding price increases. The rise reflected an increase last month in purchases of durable goods — big-ticket items like vehicles and home appliances. Real disposable income grew 0.8 percent in September when adjusted for inflation, or 0.5 percent unadjusted.

Aggregate measures of income, like the one in yesterday's report, have had healthy gains over the last year. But government reports have consistently found that the pay of most Americans has not kept up with inflation, suggesting to economists that the overall gains are largely a result of big increases among households in the very top income brackets.

Yesterday's report also showed that inflation tempered somewhat in September. That is consistent with the Federal Reserve's view that the slowing economy will moderate rising prices. Still, a measure of inflation remains above what the Fed chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, has said is healthy.

In remarks yesterday in Baltimore, an inflation hawk, Jeffrey M. Lacker, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, Va., repeated his concern that inflation remained uncomfortably high. At the last three Fed meetings, Mr. Lacker has been the only member of the Fed's rate-setting committee to vote for an increase in the benchmark overnight lending rate. Since August, the Fed has voted three times to hold the rate steady at 5.25 percent.

The Fed prefers that the "core rate" of growth in personal consumption spending, which excludes the volatile prices of food and energy, not exceed 1 percent a year, and it regards anything over 2 percent as too high.

In September, the core measure was up 2.4 percent compared with September 2005. Still, that was a little better than August, when the core rate was up 2.5 percent, an 11-year high.

Gasoline Prices Inching Up Again (USAT)

By James R. Healey

1-cent increase to $2.218 is first since Aug. 7

Gasoline prices are creeping back up after declining steadily for about three months. But there's disagreement about where prices go now.

The U.S. average for a gallon of regular is $2.218, the U.S. Energy Information Administration said Monday, up 1 cent from last week.

That's the first time the weekly number has risen since Aug. 7, when the average peaked at a near-record $3.038.

Prices this week generally were down in the West, up in the Midwest and East, the EIA reported.

Fred Rozell, gasoline price analyst at consulting firm Oil Price Information Service, says the increase is just a blip on the way to lower prices at the pump. The average "may yet drop to about $2.10 per gallon nationally before the year is out," Rozell says.

Unless something extraordinary happens, "I don't think we'll see any major increases until at least late February or early March," Rozell says. "Numbers will hold steady or bounce between a fairly narrow range for a few weeks."

EIA's latest fuel price outlook, published Oct. 10, isn't as optimistic. It forecasts an average of $2.29 for the current quarter. That means prices would drift back up about a nickel from the average $2.245 so far this quarter. Its next outlook is due out next Tuesday.

A USA TODAY poll conducted in mid-September found that 42% of Americans believe the price of gasoline is being manipulated by the White House to help Republicans win the Nov. 7 elections. Lower prices benefit the party in power, the thinking goes.

Instead, prices vary with demand — up in spring and summer, when Americans drive a lot, and down other times — according to petroleum experts.

Iraj Ershaghi, director of the petroleum engineering program at the University of Southern California, has studied fuel price fluctuations. He says gasoline prices follow predictable patterns.

"Seasonal variations can be modeled very nicely and explain (prices) very nicely," he says. "The message is: Consumers can control the price if they cut consumption."

Cutting consumption 10% would lower the price of oil to $30 a barrel, he says. That's about half Monday's price of $58.36 a barrel, down $2.39. The price of oil accounts for about 55% of the price of gasoline. Refining costs and taxes make up most of the rest.

Economists Sharply Divided On Where Economy Goes From Here (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

WASHINGTON — November marks the five-year anniversary of the end of the last recession and the beginning of the latest U.S. economic expansion.

But whether the USA will have another five years of economic growth without sliding into recession — at least matching the record 10-year expansion that ended in 2001 — is an issue that sharply divides economists.

In a USA TODAY survey of economists conducted Oct. 13-18, 24 said the economy will continue to expand for at least another five years. But another 24 said the expansion will likely be truncated by a recession sometime before November 2011.

"Not a chance," says Tucker Hart Adams, owner of the Adams Group, an economic consulting firm in Colorado Springs, about the chances of the expansion hitting the 10-year mark. "Consumers can't continue to spend for another five years. They have too much debt."

But others are more optimistic.

"This is another one of those long expansions," says David Wyss, chief economist for Standard & Poor's in New York. He says with inflation relatively benign, the Federal Reserve will be able to keep interest rates at historically low levels. That will help support the economy, he says.

The previous expansion lasted from March 1991 to March 2001 and was followed by one of the mildest recessions in history. An expansion of 120 months was not just the longest ever, it far exceeded the average duration of expansions since World War II. The average length of expansions in the postwar period is 57 months, according to the National Bureau of Economic Research, a private group that is the nation's arbiter of business cycles.

"Very rarely are we in recession nowadays," says Scott Anderson, senior economist at Wells Fargo in Minneapolis.

He attributes that to the switch from a manufacturing-based economy to a service-based economy. Manufacturing is subject to more volatility, Anderson argues.

"We can remain in this expansion for another five or six years," Anderson says.

Merrit Baker, president of staffing firms MedX and 21st Century Staffing in Conshohocken, Pa., says companies are in a "hiring mode" and staffing is picking up in some areas, particularly for engineers and people in medical fields. That suggests the expansion is healthy.

"We are economy-sensitive," Baker says of his industry. "If the economy is not doing well, companies aren't hiring."

National Association of Manufacturers chief economist David Huether says strong productivity growth, a healthy global economy and firms' successful inventory management are all factors that could help the expansion hit the 10-year mark.

"The foundations for a long-lasting expansion are there," he says.

S&P's Wyss says expansions follow a typical pattern. At the beginning, the economy grows at a healthy clip. Somewhere around the midpoint, there is a slowdown and a "soft landing," in which the economy avoids recession. The economy then picks up speed again.

Wyss says the economy is currently in the soft-landing period, marked by below-average economic growth. The government reported last week that the economy grew at a tepid annual rate of 1.6% in the third quarter, slowed by a slumping housing sector. Such a period of slower growth reduces inflation and thus "buys you another expansion phase."

But the economy is not recession-proof. A number of issues, including a renewed surge in energy prices, a deeper-than-expected drop in the housing market or a sudden decline in foreign investment in the USA, could cause the expansion to end, Wyss says.

Economist Adams sees consumers as the biggest risk. Consumers' saving rates have been negative for a year, meaning they are spending more than they are earning. That means they are ill-prepared for a change, such as a job loss or increase in debt payments.

Adams notes many homeowners have adjustable-rate mortgages and their payments are rising as their fixed-rate periods are ending. The Federal Reserve estimates that 20% of outstanding mortgages have variable rates. Half of those are set to change interest rates this year, Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke told lawmakers earlier this year.

The change in mortgage payments, combined with a lack of saving, will make it too hard for consumers to keep up their spending habits, Adams says. Consumer spending accounts for more than two-thirds of all U.S. economic activity.

"The last recession was a business-led recession because of the over-investment in technology in the '90s and getting ready for Y2K. … With that exception, recessions are caused when consumers cut back on spending," says Adams, who says colleagues are calling her the Duchess of Doom.

Consumers are showing little optimism about the economy. In a USA TODAY/Gallup survey of 1,002 adults conducted Oct. 20-22, 44% rated the economy as "good" or "excellent," while 33% said the economy was "fair," and 22% said it was "poor." One percent did not register an opinion.

"I am not very positive about the economy. I think it's average at best," says Joel Libava, president of Franchise Selection Specialists in Cleveland. He doubts the economy will make it another five years without recession, particularly given his Midwestern vantage point, where companies are closing factories and laying off workers.

Some economists simply say the odds just aren't in the economy's favor. "Ten years is unusual, so for that reason alone, I say no," says Mike Englund, chief economist for Action Economics in Boulder, Colo.

Core Inflation Measure Eases But Leaves Questions For Fed (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And Campion Walsh

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A closely watched measure of consumer prices eased somewhat last month, but inflation remains a big question for Federal Reserve policy makers and the economy.

The Fed's preferred inflation measure -- the price index for personal consumption expenditures excluding food and energy -- rose 0.2% in September after an upwardly revised 0.3% gain in August, the Commerce Department said. Compared with a year earlier, this measure of "core" inflation was up 2.4% last month, less than the 2.5% pace in August.

Despite the slight downtick last month, the annual increase in the measure of core inflation remains well above the informal range of 1% to 2% that Fed policy makers would prefer. At the same time, the economy's growth rate in the third quarter was considerably below normal.

That combination, economists said, will continue to keep the Fed from raising or lowering interest rates until it becomes clear which is a more serious threat. "As long as there are no large changes on either side of this equation, a somewhat uneasy standstill is probably the most likely outcome for monetary policy," wrote Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at MFR Inc., in a research note.

The overall index of personal consumption expenditure prices fell 0.3% last month after a 0.3% rise in August, driven down by lower gasoline prices. Consumer spending rose a modest 0.1% in September, a bit lower than the 0.2% gain in August, the report showed. Given the overall drop in consumer prices last month, inflation-adjusted spending rose 0.4% last month.

Economists took these figures as a sign that lower gasoline prices are raising consumer spending. "We're seeing pretty good, respectable advances in real spending despite the fact that the housing market is weak," said Brian Bethune, an economist at Global Insight. "It looks like the drop in gasoline prices is having the bigger impact."

Personal income jumped 0.5% last month after a 0.4% gain in August, suggesting that solid gains in wages and other forms of compensation also are buoying spending growth. With income growth outpacing spending growth last month, the savings rate -- personal savings as a percentage of after-tax income -- improved to negative 0.2% in September from negative 0.5% the previous month.

Economists are also concerned that significant wage growth could put upward pressure on prices by raising business costs when productivity growth is slowing. The Labor Department will release its latest estimates on employee compensation and productivity trends, starting today with the release of third-quarter employment costs.

Meanwhile, the Fed's quarterly survey of senior loan officers found that "demand for most loan types declined somewhat" in August through October. U.S. banks reported weaker demand for commercial-real-estate and residential-mortgage loans amid the housing market's downturn. Lending standards for residential-mortgage loans tightened.

Demand for commercial and industrial loans was essentially flat from the previous survey, although U.S. banks reported easing lending standards for these loans.

We Support Simplicity (USAT)

By Ed Yingling

With credit cards practically a necessity in today's marketplace, it's critical that consumers know how to use them. That's why the credit card industry is engaged in an effort, spearheaded by the Federal Reserve, to simplify and humanize the language we use. More important, this effort won't consist of lawyers and regulators imagining how consumers might react. The new disclosures will be tested with real, live consumers.

Simpler won't be easy. As a recent study by the Government Accountability Office (GAO) points out, the legalese in credit card disclosures results from issuers' need to meet statutory requirements and their desire to avoid being sued.

So, there's work to be done on the disclosures — and we're doing it. Credit card lenders fully support the Federal Reserve's effort to make disclosures easier to read and understand so that consumers can make informed decisions.

The GAO report also reveals many positive credit card trends.

Up until 1990, credit cards charged a higher, fixed interest rate, often came with an annual fee and were available to only the most credit-worthy consumers.

Today, technology and competition have helped make cards available to many more people, at a price consistent with the risk each person presents.

The result is that the majority of cardholders — 80%, according to the GAO study — enjoy interest rates below what they would have paid 15 years ago. And interest rates are effectively zero for about half of all account-holders, who pay their balances off each month.

Furthermore, the GAO found that cardholders paid 66% less in annual fees in 2004 than they did in 1990. It also concluded that most cardholders don't appear to be paying penalties, such as late or over-the-limit fees, which are avoidable.

Credit card customers have never had more choices or lower interest rates than they do today.

Broader access to credit for more people at lower rates — we think that's progress.

Bush: Democrats Lack Plan To Win Iraq War (AFP)

By Laurent Lozano

AFP, October 31, 2006

US President George W. Bush charged that "terrorists win and America loses" if opposition Democrats win November 7 legislative elections dominated by the unpopular Iraq war.

"If you listen carefully for a Democrat plan for success, they don't have one. Iraq is the central front in the war on terror, yet they don't have a plan for victory," he told cheering Republican faithful at a rally here.

The bloody war in Iraq has claimed the lives of more than 2,800 US troops, depressed Bush's poll numbers, and raised the prospect of a Democratic victory in looming mid-term elections that will shape Bush's last two years in office.

The president, kicking off an aggressive final week of campaigning, defiantly defended the March 2003 US-led invasion of Iraq and painted the opposition party as eager to leave "before the job is done" there.

"The Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses. That's what's at stake in this election. The Democrat goal is to get out of Iraq. The Republican goal is to win in Iraq," he said.

At a campaign stop in Georgia, Bush unapologetically stood by his decision to go to war in Iraq and urged Republican activists not to lose hope, declaring: "This election is far from over."

Bush acknowledged "tough" fighting in Iraq, where US forces have been locked in some of the bloodiest battles since the March 2003 US-led invasion to oust Saddam Hussein on grounds he possessed weapons of mass destruction.

While no such weapons were found, Bush said the world agreed with him that the Iraqi leader posed a threat, and declared: "Getting rid of Saddam Hussein was the right decision, and the world is better off."

As he spoke, the number of US soldiers and civilian contractors killed in October in Iraq reached 102 even as US national security adviser Stephen Hadley held unannounced talks with his Iraqi counterpart in Baghdad.

The White House said that Hadley's talks were "long-planned" and dismissed any link to "overblown" strains between Washington and the fledgling government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

Hadley and Iraq's national security adviser, Mowaffaq al-Rubaie, discussed "accelerating the training of the Iraqi armed forces" and giving them a broader role in Iraq, according to a statement from Iraq's government.

Maliki and US officials have sparred verbally over setting what the White House calls "benchmarks" for progress on the security and political fronts in Iraq, where 101 Americans have been killed in October.

Hadley's visit came after Bush and Maliki held a videophone summit on Saturday to iron out disagreements on how to improve security in Iraq and agreed to form a new US-Iraq security committee.

"I think that the press reports about the relationship being sensitive are overblown," Bush spokeswoman Dana Perino said aboard the president's Air Force One airplane as he kicked off a frenzied final week of campaigning.

Democrats, heartened by polls giving them an edge nationwide and in a handful of key races, need 15 seats to take control of the 435-seat House of Representatives and six seats to capture the 100-seat Senate.

Bush's Republicans, significant numbers of them publicly distancing themselves from the president and the party, hoped that their powerful get-out-the-vote machine would make the difference on election day.

"The point of the president going is to maximize turnout," said Perino. "A lot of these races are starting to close and there's some really highly competitive ones, and that's probably where you're going to see the president."

America Loses If Democrats Win, President Says (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

SUGAR LAND, Texas — Using the backdrop of the Iraq war to launch some of his toughest campaign attacks this political season, President Bush on Monday accused Democrats of being more concerned with pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq than with winning the war.

Kicking off the final week of a campaign that will determine whether his party will retain its House and Senate majorities, Bush went to the heart of issues that helped Republicans come out on top in 2002 and 2004: terrorism, taxes and a conservative social agenda.

Bush listed several key anti-terrorism measures opposed by Democrats, noting that when it came to eavesdropping on suspected terrorists, detaining them or trying them, members of that party "just say no."

"So when the Democrats ask for your vote, what's your answer?" he asked his audiences here in Texas and earlier in Statesboro, Ga., where more than 5,000 supporters gathered at Georgia Southern University.

In the campaign's final week, Bush is barnstorming across the country, appearing at what the White House calls "2006 victory rallies" and serving up red-meat Republican issues to the party faithful to get these core GOP voters to the polls.

To reach that constituency, Bush also took to the airwaves Monday, as did Vice President Dick Cheney, with each giving an interview to programs on Fox News Channel.

Cheney told "Your World With Neil Cavuto" that insurgents in Iraq had timed the increase in violence — October has been the fourth-deadliest month for U.S. troops, with more than 100 killed — to the U.S. political calendar.

FOR THE RECORD:

An earlier version of this article incorrectly stated that there had been a steady decline in in the U.S.'s gross domestic product over the past three years. It's the GDP's rate of growth that has declined.—

"It's my belief that they're very sensitive to the fact that we've got an election scheduled," he said.

In an two-part interview that began Monday on "Hannity & Colmes," Bush said that some Democratic leaders "are becoming isolationists. And that's dangerous."

"Protecting this country and keeping this economy growing are the two most important issues," he said. "And you can't protect the country if you retreat from overseas, and you can't keep the economy growing if you raise taxes. And that's exactly what the Democrats in the House would like to do."

In Georgia, Bush drew sharp partisan distinctions as he belittled the opposition to the war, which is proving a powerful pro-Democrat issue: "The Democrat approach on Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win, and America loses," he said.

"The Democrat goal is to get out of Iraq. The Republican goal is to win in Iraq," he said. "You cannot win a war unless you are willing to fight the war."

On the economy, Bush linked the growth of jobs — 6.6 million added since August 2003, he said — and a 2.2% increase in average wages over the last year with the tax cuts championed by his administration.

Adopting one of his signature campaign lines for the current week, he said, "If you want to keep that money in your pocket instead of sending it to Washington, D.C., you vote for Republicans on election day."

And he returned again to an issue important to evangelicals and other social conservatives, attacking last week's New Jersey state Supreme Court ruling that "raises doubt about the institution of marriage" to bolster his case for Republican candidates who would oppose judges who "legislate from the bench."

The president's opposition to same-sex marriage brought the audience to its feet: He could not have asked for a better response in motivating supporters to get to the polls.

"You can bet one thing — we're going to sprint to the finish line," Bush said, presaging a full-bore week of campaigning not only by him, but also by Cheney, who is traveling to Montana on Wednesday, and First Lady Laura Bush, who was in Pennsylvania and New Hampshire on Monday and will end up Thursday evening at a rally in Rocklin, Calif.

"When our voters show up at the polls," the president predicted, "we will keep control of the House and Senate."

Sugar Land is the hometown of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, who has come to symbolize ethical lapses in Congress. His indictment by a state grand jury on campaign finance charges and the attention paid to his association with lobbyist Jack Abramoff, convicted in an influence-peddling scandal, led him to abandon his reelection race in April and resign from the House in June.

Under Texas election laws, the candidate eventually endorsed by the Republican Party, Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, faces a complicated task: Because DeLay dropped out of the race after the Texas primary in March, her supporters will need to vote for her twice: once on the regular ballot as the candidate in a special election to finish out DeLay's current term, and again as a write-in candidate for the two-year term starting in January.

So, as dusk fell, there was Bush, in an airport hangar, delivering a message of Republican conservatism to Texans whose fervor would not normally need stoking.

Bush Rallies G.O.P. Faithful In Georgia And Texas (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

SUGAR LAND, Tex. Oct. 30 — President Bush zigzagged from Georgia to his home state of Texas today, stumping for Republicans in Bush-friendly districts while looking ever more like the candidate himself.

Here in the Houston suburb once represented by Tom DeLay, Mr. Bush was greeted at a campaign rally like a man whose public approval ratings are 73 percent, not 37 percent. Campaign volunteers who had jammed into an airplane hangar climbed atop one another's shoulders to catch a glimpse of him. Little children sported buttons with his likeness and waved tiny Texas flags. One supporter raised a handmade "Dubya" sign.

Mr. Bush, his shirt collar open, his sleeves rolled up, soaked it all in before delivering a speech that laid into Democrats for, among other things, opposing tax cuts and lacking a strategy in Iraq. It was a reprise of a fiery talk he gave hours earlier at a college gymnasium in Statesboro, Ga.

"It's a serious political party in the midst of a war, and they have no plan for success," Mr. Bush said in Sugar Land, after proclaiming, "We will not run from thugs and assassins." It was a moment when the president could defend his record in Iraq to thunderous applause.

The back-to-back rallies created just the image White House strategists are seeking for the president in the waning days of the campaign: that of a confident leader, surrounded by adoring supporters.

The intent is to fire up the party faithful and push them to the polls to vote, but at times it seemed as if Mr. Bush was the one getting fired up. The president seemed to relish playing the game of political expectations, as he tweaked Democrats for measuring for new curtains in Washington too soon.

"You might remember that around this time in 2004, some of them were picking out their new offices in the West Wing," Mr. Bush said in Georgia. He paused to absorb the laughter and applause, then added dryly, "The movers never got the call."

After weeks of focusing on the economy and the war on terror, Mr. Bush has also tweaked his standard stump speech. It has been refashioned to include a broad defense of his record in a range of areas: education, energy policy, border security, immigration, Medicare prescription drug benefits and the appointment of two conservative justices to the Supreme Court.

One of his biggest applause lines in Georgia was a reiteration of his position that "marriage is a union between a man and a woman.'' The line brought the crowd to its feet.

"The most important issues to Republican voters are tax cuts to the economic conservatives, and judges and marriage, pro-life issues to the social conservatives," said Charlie Black, a Republican strategist with close ties to the White House. "So he's reminding them that he's got a good record on those things."

Mr. Bush, of course, is not on the ballot. But with analysts predicting Republicans could lose control of one or both chambers of Congress, White House strategists are sending the president to those districts where he might just drag a Republican candidate across the finish line.

One such district is Sugar Land, whose political landscape looks something like a Shakespeare play. The name of Mr. DeLay, who resigned from Congress after being indicted on charges of conspiring to violate Texas election laws, remains on the ballot, though he is not running. That left Mr. Bush to implore Republicans to write in the name of a candidate whose name is not easily written: Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, a dermatologist who serves on the Houston City Council.

She is running against Nick Lampson, a Democrat who lost his seat in a redistricting engineered by Mr. DeLay. Polls show the two running neck and neck, but Bruce Buchanan, a political science professor at the University of Texas at Austin, said Mr. Bush is still popular enough here to help Ms. Sekula-Gibbs.

"He's still got legs," Mr. Buchanan said.

Mr. Bush certainly showed his legs in Statesboro, Ga., where an estimated 6,000 people packed into the gymnasium at Georgia Southern University to see him campaign for Max Burns, a former congressman who two years ago lost his seat to Representative John Barrow, a Democrat. Hundreds more were lined up outside, apparently holding tickets but unable to get in.

In the crowd was Darin Van Tassell, a political scientist who said that if Mr. Bush could motivate Republicans anywhere in Mr. Barrow's district, it would be at Georgia Southern, where Mr. Burns was a professor of business administration before going into politics.

"Barrow has a chance to be the only incumbent Democrat who might lose," Mr. Van Tassell, who counts himself a Democrat, said. "I think this particular race has a chance to run completely counter to the rest of the country, which is probably why the president is here."

Bush Hits Hard At Gay Marriage (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 31, 2006

President Bush has for months cast the midterm elections as a choice about just two issues: taxes and terrorism. Now, with polls predicting bleak results for Republicans, he is trying to fire up his party by decrying gay marriage.

"For decades, activist judges have tried to redefine America by court order," Bush said Monday. "Just this last week in New Jersey, another activist court issued a ruling that raises doubt about the institution of marriage. We believe marriage is a union between a man and a woman, and should be defended."

The line earned Bush by far his most sustained applause at a rally of 5,000 people aimed at boosting former GOP Rep. Max Burns' effort to unseat a Democratic incumbent. In this conservative rural corner of eastern Georgia, even children jumped to their feet alongside their parents to cheer and clap for nearly 30 seconds — a near-eternity in political speechmaking.

The New Jersey Supreme Court ruled that same-sex couples must be given all the benefits of married couples, leaving it up to the state Legislature to decide whether to extend those rights under the structure of marriage or something else.

One alternative, civil unions, is an idea Bush supports. But he ignored that on the way to portraying the New Jersey decision as the kind of thing America should do without.

"I believe I should continue to appoint judges who strictly interpret the law and not legislate from the bench," the president said, earning more applause in the sweltering basketball arena at Georgia Southern University. He pointed to his nominations to the Supreme Court of Chief Justice John Roberts and Samuel Alito.

The gay-marriage theme became a staple in Bush's political remarks last Thursday, the day after the New Jersey ruling on a touchstone issue for religious conservatives who are crucial to Republican electoral calculations. White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino said it was added merely to respond to the ruling — not because his other messages were failing to connect.

But the lines, repeated to great enthusiasm at a second rally later Monday in Texas, mark one of the only substantive changes in the president's stump speech as he turns from raising money for Republican candidates to encouraging the GOP faithful to vote Nov. 7.

To that end, he was focusing on the South.

After campaigning for Burns, trying to win back the seat conservative Democrat John Barrow took from him in 2004, Bush flew to the district vacated by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas. DeLay resigned in June amid a series of investigations of his fundraising activities.

Organizers said Bush's appearance in a partially filled airport hangar in Sugar Land, Texas, drew over 6,000 to support Republican Shelley Sekula-Gibbs' write-in campaign to replace DeLay. The former Republican party star and Bush ally on Capitol Hill was nowhere to be seen, and the president never mentioned DeLay's name.

The election in the reliably conservative district outside Houston is complicated. Republicans were legally barred from replacing DeLay's name on the ballot. So supporters must choose Sekula-Gibbs twice — once for the special election filling out DeLay's term and again for the general election for the next Congress.

She faces former congressman Nick Lampson, who has outraised and outspent her, giving Democrats a chance at a seat long in the GOP's hands. A Lampson victory would also be sweet revenge for an opposition party that DeLay fought at every turn while in office.

On Tuesday, Bush is heading back to Georgia, a state he twice won comfortably. Tuesday's rally, about 130 miles west of Statesboro, is aimed at helping another former GOP congressman, Mac Collins, oust Democratic Rep. Jim Marshall.

After Thursday, the president's schedule remains fluid, as his political advisers balance the need for help in tight races against the president's unpopularity.

"You might remember that about this time in 2004, some of them were picking out their new offices in the West Wing," he said. "The movers never got the call."

Democrats ridiculed him back, for an itinerary that took him to once-solid Republican areas.

"Clearly President Bush is more of a liability than an asset as he's forced to stump for candidates in districts that were once considered safe for Republicans," said Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Stacie Paxton.

The president played down the idea that next Tuesday's vote is a referendum on his embattled presidency. "This is different from a presidential campaign because it's not necessarily a national election, in that each congressional race really depends upon the candidates and how they carry the message," he said in an interview on Fox News Channel's "Hannity & Colmes."

Bush also rejected the idea he'll become a lame duck after the elections. "I promise you I'm going to be president up until the very last day, and I've got a lot to do," he said.

Bush Campaigns In GOP-friendly Georgia (AJC)

By Tom Baxter

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 31, 2006

Statesboro – With Republicans invoking Halloween images of what could happen if Democrats take over the House, President Bush on Monday focused on a section of the country that could help stave off a GOP nightmare Nov. 7: Georgia.

"It's great to realize that we are just as important as the rest of the country," said Edwin Brantley, who came with wife Brenda from Vidalia to rally with the President at Georgia Southern University in support of 12th District congressional candidate Max Burns.

GOP Staples Restored To Bush Campaigning (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

SUGAR LAND, Texas -- President Bush has started campaigning on conservative staples such as judicial nominees, border security and defining marriage as between a man and a woman -- themes that have been absent for most of the election season, but which he is now using to energize the party's base.

DOJ_NMG_0088984

At rallies drawing a combined 12,000 people in Georgia and Texas yesterday, Mr. Bush said Republicans have delivered on those issues and drew gigantic applause for both his defense of marriage and his promise to secure the borders.

"We will win this election because Republicans understand the values and priorities of the American people," the president said as he visited two critical congressional districts.

The new themes are additions to tax cuts and the war in Iraq -- the standards Mr. Bush has focused on for the past two months, and on which he said last week that the election will be a referendum.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said themes were added because Mr. Bush is speaking to different audiences at the rallies and said this stump speech will carry Mr. Bush through Election Day.

Until now, Mr. Bush had filled his schedule with fundraisers. He only went to his first rally of this election season, in Indiana, on Saturday, and then held two rallies yesterday -- the second one, in Texas, complete with a fireworks send-off for Marine One, the president's helicopter.

In that district, he was trying to help Republicans thread the needle by electing a write-in candidate to save the seat being vacated by former House Republican leader Tom DeLay. Earlier, in Georgia, the president rallied with Max Burns, a former congressman who lost re-election in 2004, but is in a tight race to reclaim his seat.

The Democratic National Committee said Mr. Bush's late arrival on the rally circuit is a sign of his unpopularity.

"Clearly, President Bush is more of a liability than an asset as he's forced to stump for candidates in districts that were once considered safe for Republicans," DNC spokeswoman Stacie Paxton said.

Mrs. Perino said Mr. Bush's appearance at get-out-the-vote rallies can help conservative turnout in races that could be swung by several thousand ballots.

Mr. Bush had not mentioned immigration on the campaign trail until these rallies.

"For decades, we haven't had complete control over our southern border, and illegal immigration has been on the rise. So I acted," he said, touting increases in the U.S. Border Patrol and his deployment of National Guard troops to support them. "We will reform our immigration system, and we will uphold the immigration laws."

Mr. Bush also returned to judges -- a theme that Republican senators say was worth several percentage points in seats across the country in the 2002 and 2004 congressional races, but which had been absent on the stump.

"I believe I should continue to appoint judges who strictly interpret the law and not legislate from the bench," he said. "America is better off because John Roberts and Sam Alito are serving on the Supreme Court of the United States."

Only a handful of write-in candidates have won election to Congress, and the challenge is steep, even in this conservative district. Mr. DeLay's name remains on the ballot, so Republicans are asking their voters to write in Houston City Council member Shelley Sekula-Gibbs.

Republicans have made several maneuvers, including scheduling a special election to fill the empty seat for the final two months of this Congress, which means voters will see Mrs. Sekula-Gibbs' name on at least one ballot.

Mr. Bush's visit, following an earlier one by Vice President Dick Cheney, is designed to boost her name recognition so voters will remember to write her in.

One indication of the challenge is Mrs. Sekula-Gibbs' name. She hyphenates it, but the most common electronic voting machine used in this district doesn't allow a hyphen for a write-in, so she's changed her Web site and campaign signs to drop the hyphen. Still, the legacy is tough to change -- some of those at yesterday's rally wore stickers with the name still hyphenated.

Bush Stumps For Sekula-Gibbs In Sugar Land (HC)

By Kristen Mack And Eric Hanson

Houston Chronicle, October 31, 2006

President Bush, his collar open and his sleeves rolled up, told 2,000 cheering Republicans in Sugar Land today that they should "bring your pencil" to the polls and write-in the name of Shelley Sekula-Gibbs to succeed Tom DeLay in the U.S. House.

"I always feel better when I'm in Texas," Bush said to the crowd packed into a hangar at the Sugar Land airport, before urging them to take the extra steps necessary to vote for Sekula-Gibbs.

Most voters won't really need a pencil to cast write-in votes because they'll use electronic voting machines. If they write in the councilwoman's name, they'll turn a dial selecting the 18-letter name a character at a time.

"I know I could have given you an easier name and next time I'll think about that," Sekula-Gibbs told the crowd as they waited for the president. Bush was expected to deliver a 45-minute speech before heading by helicopter back to Ellington Field and departing on Air Force One.

Sekula-Gibbs is the party-backed write-in candidate to succeed DeLay, R-Sugar Land, who resigned from Congress after winning the Republican nomination for a 12th term.

A new Chronicle-11 News poll indicates that the race is close, even though Democratic nominee Nick Lampson and Libertarian Bob Smither are on the ballot for the term that begins in January and Sekula-Gibbs isn't.

"It's not every day the president of the United States comes to help a girl from Floresville campaign," Sekula-Gibbs said, referring to her south central Texas birthplace.

A handful of protesters walked along Texas 6 near the airport carrying signs against the war in Iraq , but they never were close to the president or the rally.

Lampson kept a low profile as Republicans awaited the president today, meeting privately with donors. He planned to attend a small event tonight at a cousin's house in Pearland.

Lampson campaign manager Mike Malaise issued a statement saying Bush came to town "to try and stir up the base for one of our opponents because she is such a hard sell to that base."

White House Talk Heats Up As Polls Show Tight Races

SUGAR LAND, Tex., Oct. 30 -- President Bush said terrorists will win if Democrats win and impose their policies on Iraq, as he and Vice President Cheney escalated their rhetoric Monday in an effort to turn out Republican voters in next week's midterm elections.

Democratic operatives continued to broaden the field of races they believe are competitive enough to merit last-minute investments, as the party's House election committee launched ads in typically conservative districts of Kentucky, Nebraska and Nevada. In the Senate battle, new public and private polls yesterday indicated very tight races in Tennessee, Virginia and Missouri, the last of which is shaping up as possibly the country's tightest contest.

Faced with potential GOP defeat in both chambers, Bush and Cheney aimed to avert that by convincing voters that they cannot risk giving the opposition party any power in Washington.

"However they put it, the Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses," Bush told a raucous crowd of about 5,000 GOP partisans packed in an arena at Georgia Southern University in Statesboro, one of his stops Monday. "That's what's at stake in this election. The Democrat goal is to get out of Iraq. The Republican goal is to win in Iraq."

Democrats reacted sharply to the latest White House attacks. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) said Bush "resorted to the same tired old partisan attacks in a desperate attempt to hold on to power." House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) said Bush is looking to retain a "rubber-stamp Republican Congress that has done nothing to change our failed Iraq policy."

Cheney, meanwhile, said in an interview with Fox News that he thinks insurgents in Iraq are timing their attacks to influence the U.S. elections.

"It's my belief that they're very sensitive of the fact that we've got an election scheduled," he said. Cheney said the insurgents believe "they can break the will of the American people," and "that's what they're trying to do."

The increasingly combative tone from the White House signaled a coordinated GOP effort to use every channel to remind conservatives why they should turn out to vote, despite what many say is their disenchantment with the Mark Foley page scandal, anger over escalating federal spending and anxiety over the course of the Iraq war. Bush held a telephone conference call with about 3,000 Republican local officials on Saturday to fire them up for a final get-out-the-vote push. On Monday, Bush invited Fox News talk show host Sean Hannity for a ride on Air Force One and an interview later; the presence of the conservative celebrity stirred its own buzz among the standing-room-only crowd at Georgia Southern. Bush is barnstorming this week before friendly Republicans after months of just raising money for GOP candidates.

But the president's travel schedule in the final week of the campaign is also a stark reminder of his political weakness in many parts of the country -- and in many swing districts -- where it is too dangerous for GOP candidates to be seen with Bush. After his rally in Georgia on Monday, Bush flew here to stump for the GOP candidate trying to succeed former House majority leader Tom DeLay (Tex.), who won his seat by 14 points two years ago before resigning amid the Jack Abramoff scandal. There was no sign of the man who once relished his Capitol Hill reputation as "The Hammer" on Monday's visit, which drew several thousand to an aircraft hangar festooned with a giant Texas flag.

The White House has been leaving it to surrogates to appear in swing areas, with first lady Laura Bush campaigning Saturday for Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (R-Conn.) and press secretary Tony Snow appearing on behalf of Sen. James M. Talent (R-Mo.) among others on Monday.

"The fact that Republicans are working hard to hold on to one of the most Republican districts in the country -- that tells you the depth of the Republican struggles around the country," said Amy Walter, who tracks House races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

White House aides disputed this characterization, saying the Sugar Land race is a special case since DeLay resigned too late for the courts to allow the GOP to replace him on the ballot. Instead, Republicans are promoting Shelley Sekula Gibbs, a Houston City Council member and dermatologist, as a write-in candidate.

Sekula Gibbs is badly trailing former Democratic Rep. Nick Lampson in fundraising, though Cheney recently came here to raise money, and the National Republican Congressional Committee is spending more than $1 million on her behalf. But a poll published Monday by the Houston Chronicle showed the race statistically tied, even though Republicans acknowledge the difficulty of getting voters to write Sekula Gibbs's name on their ballots.

Sara Taylor, the White House political director, said the purpose of Bush's trip Monday was "to shine a spotlight" on the steps Republicans must take to give their candidate a chance to win. "We're going to focus the president's time on places where he can maximize Republican turnout," she added.

Democrats, meanwhile, believe they have the luxury of competing outside their usual strongholds. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is now funding ads in Kentucky's 3rd District, where challenger John Yarmuth is running against Rep. Anne M. Northup (R); in Nevada's 3rd District, where Tessa Hafen is running against Rep. Jon Porter (R); and in Nebraska's 3rd District, featuring rancher Scott Kleeb (D) against state legislator Adrian Smith (R) for an open seat.

In Georgia, Bush is trying to play a little bit of offense this week, appearing on behalf of GOP candidates in two of the few Democratic districts where Republicans have an opportunity to pick up a seat. The vast majority of competitive races around the country are in districts now held by Republicans, which is one reason Democrats are optimistic they can win the 15 seats necessary to gain a majority in the House.

Bush's rally Monday was on behalf of former Republican congressman Max Burns, who is in a close race to regain his seat from freshman Rep. John Barrow (D). On Tuesday, the president is slated to come back to the state for former representative Mac Collins, who is trying to unseat Democratic Rep. Jim Marshall. Both districts were redrawn by the Georgia legislature in 2005 and are now seen as more favorable to Republicans.

Unlike other Democrats, Barrow and Marshall have not sought to distance themselves far from the president. "I agree with George Bush on this one," Barrow said in a recent ad about tax reform.

Ferrel Guillory, who directs the program on southern politics at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, said Bush's popularity has not "tanked" as badly in the South as in the rest of the country. "Having the president in your district in the South is still probably a risk worth taking," he said.

The crowd at Georgia Southern seemed to respond most enthusiastically to Bush's most conservative lines, roaring for about 10 seconds after he criticized last week's ruling from the New Jersey Supreme Court that gay couples are entitled to the same rights as heterosexual couples. Bush said the ruling "raises doubt about the institution of marriage."

"We believe that marriage is a union between a man and a woman and should be defended," Bush shouted.

Bush also drew a good response from an applause line he used in both Georgia and Texas: "We will not run from thugs and assassins."

In the interview with Hannity on the Fox News Channel's "Hannity & Colmes," Bush said he believes the United States will one day be hit by another terrorist attack. Asked whether the country would be attacked again, Bush said, "I think so, and we've got to do everything we can to stop them."

Write-in Tightens Race In District 22 (HC)

By Kristen Mack

Houston Chronicle, October 31, 2006

The Republican write-in effort to hold former Rep. Tom DeLay's congressional seat, once viewed as a long shot, has created a tight race, according to a Houston Chronicle-11 News poll.

Thirty-five percent of respondents said they would vote for a write-in candidate, a statistical tie with the 36 percent support for Democrat Nick Lampson, according to the poll of more than 500 likely voters in the 22nd Congressional District.

Most who say they will write in a candidate plan on naming Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, the Houston city councilwoman backed by the Republican Party. Two lesser-known candidates also are running as write-ins.

One voter in four is still undecided.

Libertarian Bob Smither, the only person besides Lampson on the general election ballot, drew 4 percent support.

The third option on that ballot is "write-in." Voters who make that selection on the electronic voting machines that most will use are directed to an alphabet screen, where they use a wheel to spell out their choice's name a letter at a time.

Well-publicized raceAbout two-thirds of voters in the suburban Houston district know how to do that and are aware of a write-in candidacy, the poll shows.

"This is why we have elections and we don't have talking heads decide in May who the winners are going to be," said pollster John Zogby, president of Zogby International, which conducted the poll last week.

Fifty-two percent of poll respondents identified themselves as Republicans, 32 percent as Democrats and 16 percent as independent.

That GOP strength also was evident when poll respondents were asked specifically about Sekula-Gibbs, Lampson and Smither. Sekula-Gibbs drew 52 percent support in that situation, with Lampson holding at 35 percent.

"There reasonably enough would be a substantial number of Republicans looking for a Republican or at least not willing to vote for a Democrat," Zogby said.

But if Lampson were still facing DeLay — as he expected when he entered the race — he would fare much better, walking away with 48 percent of the vote to DeLay's 40 percent, the poll shows.

In the 2004 election, DeLay garnered 55 percent of the vote in a district that went 64 percent for Republican President Bush. DeLay — under fire for close ties to an indicted federal lobbyist and facing his own state indictment on charges relating to campaign finance — resigned from Congress after winning the GOP nomination for a 12th term.

Courts said his resignation came too late for Republicans to replace him on the regular ballot. Sekula-Gibbs is on the ballot in a separate special election to fill the last two months of DeLay's unexpired term. Lampson did not file in that race.

Once an uphill battleRepublicans widely acknowledged then that her candidacy was an uphill battle. A write-in candidate has never won a U.S. House race in Texas. And only six write-in candidates nationwide have been elected to Congress — five in the House and one in the Senate.

Yet a week before Election Day, Sekula-Gibbs appears to be within striking distance.

"I think we are at the top of the hill. We are ready to plant the flag," Sekula-Gibbs said.

She has made the race close with saturation television advertising, much of it funded by the national party, that illustrates how to cast write-in votes. "This underscores what a weak candidate Lampson is," Sekula-Gibbs said of the Chronicle-Channel 11 poll. "He's spent millions and can't get more than 35 percent of people to support him."

Lampson said he remains encouraged, because it's hard to tell how many people will actually vote for a write-in.

"I felt this was doable from the beginning and I still feel that way now," Lampson said. "I knew I had to reach out to a community used to voting one way politically. And I've had to ask those people to have confidence in me."

Bush coming to townSekula-Gibbs may get a boost today, when President Bush visits Sugar Land for a get-out-the-vote rally. It is one of several free events the president is headlining in the waning days of the midterm campaign, hoping to energize the base and woo disenchanted Republicans.

Most of the tickets required to attend the event already have been distributed by Republican Party officials in the four counties that make up the 22nd District — Harris, Fort Bend, Brazoria and Galveston.

Both Lampson and Sekula-Gibbs remain unfamiliar to one in four likely voters, though neither is new to the district.

Sekula-Gibbs has served on Houston City Council for five years and lives in the Clear Lake part of the district.

Lampson served in the U.S. House from 1997 to 2004, representing about 20 percent of what is now the 22nd District. He lost the seat in 2004 in congressional redistricting engineered by DeLay. He moved last year from Beaumont to Stafford, which is in the district.

"Both candidates seem to be swimming upstream here," Zogby said. "What's clear on one hand, is Nick Lampson seems to have had the opportunity and has not closed the deal just yet. On the same token, Shelley Sekula-Gibbs has a great opportunity in a Republican district."

Fifty-three percent of respondents have favorable opinions of Sekula-Gibbs, while 23 percent report unfavorable impressions. Lampson's favorables and unfavorables are about even — 38 percent favorable to 32 percent unfavorable.

Forty percent of poll respondents say they usually vote straight-party. Thirty-two percent plan on doing so this year.

Republican straight-ticket ballots will not register votes for Sekula-Gibbs, since the special election is nonpartisan and the general election does not have a Republican candidate in the district.

What Would Democrats Do About Iraq? (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON

So if voters tip one or both Houses of Congress out of Republican control, what impact would that have on the US war effort in Iraq and, more generally, on American foreign policy?

Democrats could conceivably view such an election outcome as a mandate for asserting a markedly different course in Iraq than the one President Bush has set.

But don't expect too much, most experts say.

For one thing, Democrats are not of one mind on what to do about Iraq. And while committees chaired by Democrats might hold more meetings and call more testifiers critical of some White House policies, Mr. Bush would still retain the power of the presidential bully pulpit.

In addition, Bush's foreign policy in the second term has already evolved in a direction - away from unilateralism and toward greater cooperation - that suits both Bush's political opponents and moderates in his own party, some analysts say.

For others, the differences between Bush and the Democrats on the big foreign-policy issues are really a matter of details and not starkly black and white.

"My hunch is that there wouldn't be a large change in American foreign policy with a divided government because there really hasn't been a deep division over the overall direction of that policy," says Julian Zelizer, a specialist in foreign policy and contemporary American politics at Boston University.

"It's ironic because the rhetoric has been so fierce," Mr. Zelizer adds. "But there is general consensus on the war on terror, and even on Iraq it's principally a matter of specifics - for example, the exit strategy and how to handle the Iraqi government. It's not, 'the president says stay' versus 'the Democrats say get out now.' "

Indeed, while some Democratic members of Congress have fielded ideas that have pushed the Iraq debate forward - Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania calling for a withdrawal from Iraq, or Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware proposing a confederation of sectarian-based provinces to stem the violence - the Democrats are not united behind one Iraq policy. That can be seen in the disparate campaigning by Democrats on Iraq, with the one common thread a stiff criticism of Bush's "stick with it until victory" policy.

Despite some niche attention to Darfur or Iran or China trade policy, foreign policy in the midterm elections largely boils down to Iraq. Recognizing that, the White House is signaling to voters that it hears and shares their anxiety, some analysts say, while suggesting that adjustments in policy are coming no matter the outcome of the elections.

"It's what I call the law of anticipated reaction," says Lawrence Korb, a former Pentagon official in the Reagan administration, now at the Center for American Progress in Washington. "The White House can read the writing on the wall and is already adjusting: They've given up 'stay the course' and are now talking about tactical adjustments," he says. "That way they get ahead of looking like they are being pushed by the Democrats."

That said, a House or Senate controlled by Democrats would not be welcomed by the White House. After all, relatively recent history shows that a hostile Congress can at least slow a president's preferred foreign-policy course.

As a new president in 1974, Gerald Ford received briefings from Pentagon officials saying the United States could stave off a full victory by North Vietnam in the south with a bombing campaign. But the Republican president decided against it. Faced with stiff opposition to more war from a Congress that had increased its Democratic majority in midterm elections, Mr. Ford would later conclude in his memoirs that approving the airstrikes would have gotten him impeached.

Congressional opposition to Bush's Iraq war policy may not have reached that level. But that and other differences over foreign policy could raise the speed bumps for the White House.

For example, Democrats who were earlier forced to hold a kind of rump committee meeting for retired military officers disgruntled over Iraq could now make such hearings official.

"It will cause problems for Bush, that we know," says Thomas Henriksen, a foreign-policy expert at the Hoover Institution in Stanford, Calif. "We could anticipate new troubles for [Defense Secretary Donald] Rumsfeld, more debate over what we do with radical Islam."

In terms of foreign policy, perhaps even more important than who controls Congress is the fact that Bush will be entering his last two years in the White House. Mr. Henriksen says Bush faces a "double whammy" of receding power and the unpopularity of his defining foreign-policy action.

"It makes him the ultimate lame duck," says Henriksen, who expects Republicans with presidential aspirations to begin distancing themselves from Bush policies that the public has turned against.

But not even this means that major shifts in US foreign policy are likely anytime soon. Some experts point out that Bush, hardly known as a leader who changes his mind easily, has paid little heed to respected foreign-policy thinkers in his own party with differing views: for example, Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, or Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a longtime critic of Bush Iraq policy.

Some observers believe that kind of brushoff will end when the congressionally mandated Iraq Study Group, cochaired by former Secretary of State James Baker III, offers its recommendations sometime after the elections.

But there are even doubts in some quarters over how much stock the White House will put in those recommendations. This suggests to some analysts that the Democrats won't expect to make dramatic changes in foreign policy, even if they manage to win both houses of Congress.

"A lot of Democrats will remember the aftermath of 1994 [midterm elections that delivered a huge Republican tide], when one of the biggest mistakes of the Republicans was to overplay their hand the first year out," says Zelizer of Boston University. "The focus then was the domestic agenda, but it will still serve as a cautionary tale to the Democrats about being too bold."

Bush Family Members Hit The Campaign Trail (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — As President Bush scrambles to fend off a Democratic takeover of Congress, he's getting reinforcements from those closest to him - his family.

His wife, father, mother, at least two of his siblings and a nephew have all become surrogate campaigners in the runup to the Nov. 7 midterm elections to help preserve a Republican congressional majority for the remaining two years of Bush's term.

"They're getting to seem more like the Kennedys," said Stephen Hess, a professor of media and public affairs at The George Washington University, recalling the election-time activism of another famous political clan. "There is no question that, on any particular day, they're all out campaigning for somebody."

Leading the family's charge, of course, is the president, who was in Georgia and Texas on Monday, including a stop in the Houston suburban district of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay.

With a week before voters go to the polls, the election looms as a referendum on Bush's presidency, the war in Iraq and the GOP-led Congress. Growing disenchantment over the war and other policies could cost Republicans their majority in the House of Representatives and possibly the Senate.

Preventing that outcome has become a family affair for the Bush clan. Other than the president, the most visible family member on the campaign trail is first lady Laura Bush, who's shed any remaining vestiges of her reluctance about campaigning to plunge headlong into the 2006 political season.

As of late last week, the first lady had appeared at 51 political events and helped raised $16 million.

The president's wife of 28 years offers an asset that her husband no longer has - a reservoir of good will with the public. According to a Newsweek poll late last week, the president had a 37 percent approval rating. Voters gave Laura Bush a favorable rating of 68 percent in a CNN poll in late September.

Republican political operatives have directed the first lady, as well other family members, to strategic battlegrounds to help struggling GOP incumbents. In a typical foray, the first lady appeared on behalf of Republican Sen. Jim Talent in Missouri and was described in a press account as "the chief attraction" at a fundraiser that collected $300,000 for Talent's campaign.

"There is certainly more demand than there is supply," said Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee. "There are far more requests for Mrs. Bush to travel around the country than she can possibly fill."

Similarly, Bush's parents, former President George H.W. Bush and former first lady Barbara Bush, have repeatedly ventured out of their hometown of Houston to help their party's cause. The president's brother, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, is also working on behalf on GOP candidates.

Others have offered more limited assistance. George P. Bush, the son of Jeb Bush and the president's nephew, has appeared on behalf of several Hispanic Republicans, including Rep. Henry Bonilla of Texas. For the younger Bush, whose mother is Mexican, the appearances extend a high-profile effort to strengthen the Republican Party's ties to Hispanics.

Bush's sister, Doro Bush Koch, who lives in Bethesda, Md., says she has done "a little bit" of work for Maryland Republican Michael Steele in his race for the U.S. Senate. But she's spent most of her time recently promoting her new book on the first Bush to serve in the White House, "My Father, My President, a Personal Account of the Life of George H.W. Bush."

At times, members of the Bush clan cross paths as they swoop into races designated as must-win for Republicans.

The president was in Indiana over the weekend, appearing before more than 4,000 energetic supporters for Rep. Mike Sodrel, who won his seat by only 1,200 votes two years ago. Laura Bush hit Sodrel's district a few days earlier, several weeks after her mother-in-law came to the state.

Florida is another popular Bush destination, giving the former president and former first lady a chance to reunite with their governor-son while helping out the party. Laura Bush has also campaigned in the state.

Bush's parents - he's 82, she's 81 - have been indefatigable. The former president has made stops in at least six states, and his wife has hit at least five.

Although the elder Bush was defeated for re-election, he remains a "venerated figure" among a substantial segment of the electorate, said Norman Ornstein, a resident scholar at the conservative American Enterprise Institute. Barbara Bush, he said, is "still a superstar."

The white-haired former first lady frequently displays her trademark flair for straight talk or self-deprecating humor. At a Dallas appearance for Texas Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, who's being challenged by Democrat Barbara Ann Radnofsky, Bush said she was surprised to find that Radnofsky's "most stinging criticism was that she called Kay an aging prom queen."

"That sounds pretty good to me," said the former first lady. "I'd love to be a prom queen, aging or fat or whatever."

Controversy Gives Hastert Time At Home (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

He spent part of a cold, blustery Friday in Geneseo at an outdoor ceremony with local business leaders. Nose dripping as he endured 20 minutes of speeches, he spoke only briefly, paying homage to the high school football team. He spent Saturday morning thanking volunteers in his campaign headquarters in Batavia and Sunday afternoon riding his antique fire engine in the Pumpkin Day Parade in Sycamore.

Mr. Hastert, 64, had planned to be on the road in October, campaigning for Republican House members. But most of those events were canceled after Representative Mark Foley's sexually explicit e-mail messages to House pages became public and Mr. Hastert was criticized as not doing more to stop them.

"Sure, it bothers you," Mr. Hastert said in an interview in his headquarters. "But I understand, if I've got 15 television trucks sitting outside my house, and I've got a helicopter looking in the window, you probably don't want to bring that into somebody else's district."

So he has stayed here, in his district west of Chicago, where he used to teach high school and coach wrestling. Mr. Hastert has been elected here 10 times; his opponent, John Laesch, is a carpenter and political newcomer. People call Mr. Hastert Denny and Coach and talk about the bum rap he is getting.

"The way the media's talking, you'd think he was the one that sent the e-mails," says Dennis Wiggins, a friend visiting Mr. Hastert's campaign offices.

Friends say Mr. Hastert is in decent spirits, if going slightly stir crazy at times. "He absolutely misses the campaigning," said Tom Cross, the Republican leader in the Illinois House of Representatives and a former student of Mr. Hastert.

The speaker takes pride in his efforts on behalf of his Republican members. "I've been out in 50 or so districts since the first of August," he said Saturday. But few of the trips have been recent and most took place in August.

He still makes a few carefully selected visits. He traveled Thursday to northeastern Tennessee, where he campaigned for the Republican candidate in a district no Democrat has carried in more than a century.

On Monday, he was in Texas and Oklahoma City, where he attended a fund-raiser for a Congressional candidate whose Democratic opponent promptly accused her of aligning "herself with the disgraced leadership of the Republican Party."

Mr. Hastert is unaccustomed to the role of incendiary figure. He has operated largely out of camera range, leaving much of the focus on deputies. He has always fashioned himself a slightly beleaguered leader, someone who does not need the job and never wanted it.

His unlikely rise came after the would-be successor to Speaker Newt Gingrich, Representative Bob Livingston of Louisiana, bowed out because of marital infidelity. Mr. Hastert was called "the accidental speaker" but has since become the longest-serving Republican in that role.

"The speaker has always brought a real balanced and grounded approach to an otherwise surreal process," says Representative Adam H. Putnam, Republican of Florida and a protégé of Mr. Hastert. "Now he's in the middle of all the surrealness."

Last Tuesday, when Mr. Hastert returned to Washington to testify about the Foley affair before the House ethics committee, reporters and photographers staked out his office. At one point, Mr. Hastert left to use the bathroom down the hall. He greeted reporter Mike Viqueira of NBC, with whom he shares an interest in Japanese culture.

On the way out, Mr. Viqueira asked the speaker in Japanese if he would be "going downstairs" that afternoon, to which Mr. Hastert replied, "Hai" ("Yes").

After lunch, Mr. Hastert rushed downstairs, trailed by members of the news media and an entourage of staff and security. He entered the ethics committee room, in the basement of the Capitol and right next to a House page locker room.

Mr. Hastert stayed for almost three hours, came out, made a quick statement, ignored shouted questions ("Mr. Speaker, will you resign?") and headed out of town.

"When you take a job like this, you basically offer yourself up," Mr. Hastert said Saturday back in Illinois. "You know, you're going to take some criticism. You're going to take some spears."

The question that lingers is how long Mr. Hastert wants to keep taking spears and offering himself up. Even before he became speaker in 1998, he had spoken to headhunters about jobs in the private sector. He thought seriously about leaving after the 2004 election, but President Bush asked him to stay.

Mr. Hastert says he will run again for speaker if Republicans stay in the majority. Asked whether he will serve out his full term, Mr. Hastert says, "That is my intent," but shrugs while he says it.

Friends and associates of Mr. Hastert say he seems driven less by any great ambition to remain as speaker and more by a desire to let his reputation recover.

"He needs to win the re-election, keep the majority and continue as speaker because this would be a terrible way for his career to end," said John Feehery, a former Hastert aide.

Mr. Hastert is also fueled by what appears to be a genuine dislike of Representative Nancy Pelosi, the House minority leader, who would be speaker if Democrats gained 15 seats next week. To invoke Ms. Pelosi as speaker is a Republican talking point, but when Mr. Hastert does it, it smacks of disdain.

Asked if he has spoken to her recently, Mr. Hastert grimaces and says Ms. Pelosi called him last week "to read me the riot act about something." He adds: "She's scripted, and you don't really get a word in edgewise. You don't get a lot of dialogue."

Two weeks after the Congressional page scandal erupted, Mr. Hastert bought some farmland along Wisconsin's western edge. The parcel is the second he had bought there in less than a year. Mr. Hastert and his wife, Jean, have told friends they intend to spend part of their retirement on the property, which sits on a bluff overlooking the Mississippi River.

Republicans See Edge From Early Voting (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And Erika Lovley

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Down in the polls and with their majorities in Congress at risk, Republicans say they have some good news in early-voting statistics that suggest their voter-turnout machine is providing an edge in some tight races.

If the trend holds, it could mean that early voting is growing -- and continuing to benefit Republicans, who exploited the practice in the 1990s. Experts say early voters could be a bigger factor this year when overall voter turnout could be lower than in 2004, a presidential-election year.

This year, though, Democrats contend that Republicans are exaggerating their successes so far, by highlighting a few races, while ignoring problems they are having in motivating their troops around the country. Democrats also questioned several

Several of the examples Republicans cite are coming from states and congressional districts where they have some of their strongest local organizations. And despite the strength of the Republican turnout machine in the past few election cycles, it's yet to be seen whether Republicans can replicate isolated success stories across the electoral map in a tight election year.

Early voting has grown in the past 15 years, from around 2% of the national electorate participating to about 20% in 2004, said R. Doug Lewis, executive director of the Election Center in Houston, a nonprofit group. Experts predict this year that 19% to 25% of the electorate will vote early at the polls or by mail-in absentee ballots. That compares with about 14% in 2002, the most recent midterm election.

Republicans have had an advantage with early-voter turnout over Democrats because of better party funding and organization, according to Paul Gronke, director of the Early Voting Information Center at Reed College in Oregon, a state where traditional Election Day polling has been eliminated altogether in favor of voting by mail. "I suspect it will still be their advantage," he said.

In congressional districts from Ohio and Florida to New Mexico and Arizona, Republicans report that their get-out-the-vote organization is gaining traction a week ahead of Election Day. The aim of the effort generally is to maximize turnout among their most loyal and reliable voters. If successful, it could help them to hold down their losses in this election cycle and perhaps even retain their majorities in the House and Senate.

In the fiercely contested New Mexico district held by Republican Heather Wilson, the party says that the number of absentee ballots already requested by Republicans has almost reached the number requested in 2004 -- nearly 22,000 so far this year, compared with almost 24,000 in 2004. The party says it is on a pace to exceed 2004.

Meanwhile, in the bellwether Ohio district held by Republican Steve Chabot, about 60% of all early votes are coming from the roughly 40% of the electorate that the party has targeted for early voting. That's the highest rate in the country, according to an internal party memo, and good news -- "provided they vote the way we predict," the memo adds.

In two Florida districts that are in doubt -- the 13th and 16th, previously held by Reps. Katherine Harris and Mark Foley, respectively -- Republicans are ahead in both absentee balloting and early voting. In previous election cycles, Democrats have enjoyed an advantage in early voting, party operatives say.

And in the Georgia congressional district now held by Democrat Jim Marshall, "nearly twice as many of our supporters are voting as they should be, based on population," according to the internal memo. President Bush will visit the district today to stump for the Republican challenger, former congressman Mac Collins. Republicans hope to unseat Democrats in two districts in Georgia as a way of offsetting losses expected in districts across the Midwest and in the Northeast.

Democrats questioned the Republicans' claims, particularly regarding New Mexico's 1st District. They said Democrats are almost even with Republicans in the number of absentee ballots cast so far in the area, suggesting that the incumbent party is struggling even in a district where its volunteer organization is regarded as one of the best in the country. They also pointed out that Ms. Wilson's real worries lie not with Republicans but with Democrats and independents, who appear to be backing her opponent more strongly than in the past.

"It's a bunch of spin," said Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Stacie Paxton. "I don't think their numbers add up." She said in the battleground state of Iowa, for example, Democrats have returned more absentee ballots than Republicans, and their rate of return is higher too.

To encourage early voting, the parties typically mail out applications for absentee ballots to their targeted voters. Fueling the trend toward early voting, 30 states now allow unrestricted absentee voting, with 15 allowing early voting in person at county-clerk offices and polling areas.

The process isn't free of glitches, though. Some elections experts criticize the widespread use of absentee ballots because of the potential for fraud. And early voting has had at least a few glitches because of mechanical problems.

In Maryland, where voting-machine glitches were reported during primary balloting earlier this year, requests for absentee ballots for Nov. 7 have more than doubled from the number during the state's most recent gubernatorial election in 2002. As of yesterday, 161,094 Maryland voters had requested absentee ballots, according to Donna Duncan, director of election management for the Maryland Board of Elections. Roughly 78,000 were from Democrats and 68,000 from Republicans.

Some analysts have predicted that the growth of early voting -- much of it encouraged by Republicans -- would backfire on the party this year. Analysts figured that many of those early voters would be affected by the run of bad news the party suffered in September and early October, including violence in Iraq and the congressional-page scandal involving Rep. Foley.

But Republican National Committee political director Mike DuHaime said that concern is likely exaggerated, because the party is focused on turning out a relatively reliable core of supporters. "We try to drive people who we feel with a high degree of confidence are going to vote Republican, and leave it to the candidates" to persuade independents and swing voters, he said.

Democrats, Playing Catch-Up, Tap Database To Woo Potential Voters (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In the final week before the election, Democrats pushing to convert their lead in the polls into control of Congress are pinning their hopes of success on an increasingly common tactic for pumping up voter turnout: microtargeting.

The technique aims to identify potential supporters by collecting and analyzing the unprecedented amount of information now readily available -- from census data to credit-card bills -- to profile individual voters. Political strategists then tailor messages to entice those prospects to the polls, using the same methods marketers use to sell autos or aspirin to consumers.

In this tight election year, microtargeting could make the difference in important House and Senate races in states such as Minnesota, Ohio and Pennsylvania. Alexander Gage, president and founder of TargetPoint Consulting, an Alexandria, Va., microtargeting firm that works for the Republican Party, estimates that successful microtargeting can bring congressional campaigns an additional 5,000 to 10,000 votes, a number that could be decisive in a House race. "Politics is always won and lost at the margins," he says.

Democrats are playing catch-up to Republicans, whose use of microtargeting in 2004 energized millions of new voters who backed President Bush. Republicans have since expanded their database in size and sophistication, even as formerly skeptical Democrats have spent millions of dollars building microtargeting systems of their own.

A key player for Democrats is Copernicus Analytics, a small and little-known firm based here that made its name last year by helping to propel Democrat Timothy Kaine to victory in the Virginia governor's race. Big-money, Democratic-leaning clients from the AFL-CIO to Emily's List, a group that backs pro-choice female candidates, have enlisted Copernicus this election year.

Focusing on 29 races, Copernicus says it already has helped campaigns identify more than a million potential new supporters, a significant number given that many races in the closely divided nation are likely to be decided by thin margins.

Copernicus's chief scientist, Ben Yuhas, likens microtargeting to searching for a needle in a haystack -- over and over again. The spreadsheet on a single voter from one of the states where Copernicus is operating contains more than 500 rows of information, ranging from whether a prospect lives in an apartment or house to commercially purchased data on the type of car the voter drives. Mr. Yuhas has developed mathematic formulas based on such factors as length of residence, amount of money spent on golf, voting patterns in recent elections and a handful of other variables to calculate the likelihood that a particular American will vote Democratic.

Last week, a Democratic congressional campaign locked in a tightening race in a battleground Midwestern state asked Copernicus to identify Republicans who could potentially be swayed into voting Democratic, and the issues likeliest to win them over. Copernicus crunched the numbers and came back with its answer: Tens of thousands of Republicans who the company predicted to be abortion-rights supporters didn't have strong partisan affiliation with the Republican Party. Now the campaign, which Copernicus declined to identify, is making a play for those voters.

Microtargeting entered the political mainstream in the 2004 election, when White House adviser Karl Rove, who long ran a direct-mail marketing business, deployed it to reach voters whom Mr. Bush's re-election campaign had failed to reach by other means. The Bush campaign gave TargetPoint $3 million to microtarget voters in 18 states. In Florida, the campaign used microtargeting to make contact with 84% of eventual Bush voters, up from 33% in 2000. In Iowa, the campaign reached 92% of his eventual voters, up from 50% in 2000.

"It gave us a way of finding people we couldn't find before," says Bush strategist Matthew Dowd. "We could get at Bush voters in Democratic precincts, swing precincts and other places we'd never been able to look before."

Republicans have long outstripped Democrats in their support for, and use of, the technique -- an edge the Republicans hope to maintain this election. Today, Republicans use a centralized computer system called Voter Vault that is available to Republican candidates across the country. TargetPoint executives hold monthly conference calls with top Republican operatives such as White House political director Sara Taylor. The Republican National Committee now has data covering tens of millions of voters from across the country, to which TargetPoint has access. In 2004, the firm had such a comprehensive database only for Ohio.

Until recently, Democrats, who had long relied on the old get-out-the-vote muscle of organized labor, were skeptical of building voter databases, says Copernicus founder Mark Steitz, who spent several years as a senior official at the Democratic National Committee in the early 1990s.

In April, frustrated by the lack of a party-driven effort, former Clinton aide Harold Ickes launched a $9 million initiative now known as Catalist to build a massive new voter file that campaigns and interest groups will be able to access directly. Catalist provides Copernicus with data on individual voters, which Copernicus then uses to predict how people with similar profiles will vote.

Though it is working for some individual Democratic campaigns, Copernicus doesn't work for the DNC. Most of the firm's work is for pro-Democratic interest groups. America Votes, a new umbrella group of 32 major liberal organizations including the Sierra Club, is pooling its members' microtargeting efforts in the hopes of boosting Democratic turnout in battleground states. Emily's List is spending $250,000 in Michigan and Minnesota, while the AFL-CIO is spending nearly $2 million more to run microtargeting efforts in more than 24 other states. Both organizations, which are part of the America Votes alliance, mostly use Copernicus, though Emily's List also uses rival company Garin-Hart-Yang, better known for polling work.

Naming his firm Copernicus was Mr. Steitz's nod to the famous 16th-century astronomer, whose work he had studied at St. John's College in Annapolis, Md. The astronomer tried to change how his contemporaries saw the world around them. "Copernicus took individuals out of the center of the physical universe; we are trying to put them back at the center of the political world," Mr. Steitz says.

The firm's number-crunching is done by Mr. Yuhas, who did his doctoral dissertation on lip reading and later spent years in the credit-card industry. He joined Copernicus in early 2005 because of anger at the Bush administration's opposition to stem-cell research. His brother was diagnosed in 1999 with amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or "Lou Gehrig's disease," and Mr. Yuhas saw the administration's stem-cell decision as profoundly misguided.

Messrs. Steitz and Yuhas, whose offices are above a yoga studio here, won their first big victory last year in Mr. Kaine's gubernatorial race. Recently, to illustrate the firm's work, Mr. Steitz called up a color-coded map of Virginia on a large flat-screen computer monitor, noting that none of the state had the bluish tint of a Democratic district. He punched a series of keys and the map zoomed in on a neighborhood, and then a street, until blue dots began appearing. Each dot represented an individual Kaine supporter in Loudon County. The Copernicus system allowed the campaign to find potential supporters regardless of where they lived, based on factors such as whether they lived in private houses (more likely Republican) or apartment buildings (more likely Democratic).

Last year, Copernicus was unable to divide people into segments of like-minded voters, something Mr. Gage at TargetPoint has done for years. That left the Democrats at a disadvantage to Republicans, who have used Mr. Gage's models to decide what themes to emphasize with voter segments such as "Religious Conservative Republicans" or "Tax and Terrorism Moderates."

Copernicus says it has honed its techniques in recent months, enabling it to focus on voters in the same ways Republicans did in 2004. In Minnesota, Copernicus's work has led Democrats to focus on what the firm calls "Rural Religious Moralists," predominantly married women who might be swayed into voting Democratic over health care, education and gasoline prices. In Michigan, the company's work identified "Downscale Union Independents," who are socially conservative but deeply concerned about the economy.

For their part, TargetPoint and Republicans haven't been standing still. After profiling voters in many key states in 2004, the company can generate more detailed predictions of how voters will behave this time around. In Michigan, for example, TargetPoint's Mr. Gage says he will be able to give Republican officials a list of 800,000 voters with a strong likelihood of voting Republican, up from 500,000 in 2004.

Copernicus's Messrs. Steitz and Yuhas, meanwhile, are spending the last days before the election helping a liberal advocacy group compile lists of Christian voters who the company believes can be persuaded to vote Democratic. "We're not saying that all Christian voters can be moved a little on this," Mr. Steitz says. "We're saying that some Christians can be moved significantly, and that we can tell you who they are."

By Liz Sidoti

AP, October 30, 2006

Judging by history — and the latest math — Republicans are likely to lose House seats on Nov. 7.

Democrats now hold a double-digit lead over Republicans on the polling question intended to forecast which party will win control of the House, a gap unseen for at least a decade. Just how many seats — and whether the GOP sustains enough losses for Democrats to rise to power — is less clear.

Admittedly, the question is imperfect. It doesn't mention candidate names and congressional districts, simply asking voters whether they want Democrats or Republicans in charge.

The main problem with the measure: "We have 435 separate elections. This is national polling," says Charles Franklin, a University of Wisconsin-Madison political science professor. "We don't know what's going to happen."

Still, historical trends show that the so-called generic ballot question has proven to accurately predict whether a party will gain seats when other variables are taken into account as well. However, on its own, the question can't say with certainty which side will win the 218 districts needed for a majority.

Little more than a week before the elections, the Democratic advantage in national polls is much wider that in previous midterm elections when Democrats captured a few Republican-held districts. That has led analysts to conclude that Democrats inevitably will gain seats this fall.

For months, Democrats have been widely favored over Republicans on the question most every pollster asks to measure where the campaign for control of the House stands. It's some version of what the Associated Press and Ipsos asks — "If the election for U.S. House of Representatives were held today, would you vote for the Democratic or Republican candidate in your congressional district?"

The latest AP-AOL News poll showed 56 percent of likely voters said Democrats, while 37 percent said Republicans, a 19 percentage-point advantage less than two weeks before voters choose a new House. The gap was 10 percentage points in early October.

Because of the way House districts are drawn, a narrow Democratic advantage in the question doesn't necessarily portend that the party will gain seats. However, the wide gap of late indicates Democrats likely will knock off GOP incumbents because it reflects the mood of the country against the status quo — even though it doesn't directly translate into how many seats Democrats will gain.

"The question traditionally has done a good job of measuring the popular vote, and the popular vote is a good predictor of the number of seats each party will win," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center, an independent public opinion organization.

However, he and other analysts say, because congressional seats have been redistricted through the years to make Republican districts more GOP and Democratic districts more Democratic, there's less of a relationship between the popular vote and the exact number of seats won, which makes for somewhat unreliable forecasts.

Despite such uncertainty, each time a poll comes out, Democrats seize on the results to bolster their argument that the public wants a change in the status quo. Republicans, meanwhile, dismiss the results as not reflective of the race for House control.

To a degree, both are correct.

On one hand, the question can be used as a barometer to measure the political mood of the nation. And, right now, polls show that voters are very disgruntled with the GOP-controlled Congress and more apt to put Democrats in charge of the House.

"What it tells you more than anything else is who's running into the wind and who's got the wind at their backs," said Geoff Garin, a Democratic pollster. So far, he said: "This tells a horrible story for Republicans."

On the other hand, the question is broad and riddled with problems. Chief among them is the question's lack of specificity, which analysts say undermines its validity.

The question doesn't mention names, districts, challengers or incumbents. It doesn't take into account other factors specific to the race, such as the personal attributes of the candidates or the local issues and where candidates stand on them.

That explains why voters say they favor Democrats to run the House, but also say — when asked a more specific question — that they overwhelmingly support their own congressman.

"What you're ultimately trying to do is figure out what's the greatest predictor of whether the party of the president is going to win or lose seats," said Steven Lombardo, a Republican pollster, who suggested that better measures would be the president's approval rating. "Ultimately, there's no one single data point or place you can go to tell you what's going to happen."

The best measure — analysts agree — is individual polls in each competitive House district, a costly and cumbersome task.

The Six-Year Itch By MICHAEL BARONE (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

As Democrats begin, in George W. Bush's words, "measuring the drapes" in the offices of the House speaker and Senate majority leader, it's worth looking back on the history of sixth-year-of-the-presidency off-year elections. Have big gains for the out party been a harbinger of future voting patterns? And have opposition victories in those elections resulted in significant public policy changes? History gives us clear answers to those questions. They are: sometimes yes and sometimes no.

Sometimes yes: In the post-Civil War years, there were two big sixth-year victories for the out party. The first was in 1874, during the presidency of Ulysses S. Grant, when the opposition Democrats converted a 194-92 deficit in the House to a 169-109 majority. Historians writing in the backwash of the New Deal tended to ascribe this reverse to the Panic of 1873. But my reading of history tells me that this was a revolt against Grant's policy of stationing troops in the South to enforce civil rights for blacks. Americans had been growing weary of this strife (as they may be growing weary of the strife today in Iraq) and wanted the troops sent home. They were, and Democrats held the House for 16 of the next 20 years -- and Southern blacks were left to the mercies of segregation laws and lynch mobs.

There was another great reversal 20 years later -- the greatest in American electoral history. Amid a depression deeper than any except that of the 1930s, with violent labor strikes and low farm prices, the House flipped to 244-105 Republican from 218-127 Democratic. This was the beginning of the McKinley Republican majority (said to be the model of Karl Rove) which prevailed for most of the time till the '30s. The laissez-faire policies of Democratic President Grover Cleveland were rejected, even by his own party, and the era of Progressive government interventionism -- and Republican majorities -- followed. This sixth-term off-year election was consequential indeed.

The 20th century presents more of a mixed bag. In 1938 FDR's Democrats had been flying high for six years. In 1936 they won the popular vote for the House by 56%-40%. But in 1938 the popular vote was only 49%-47% Democratic and Republicans gained 75 seats. For most of the next 20 years Congress was dominated by an anti-New Deal coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats, much to the fury of liberal political scientists who argued that every Democrat should somehow be compelled to vote for Roosevelt-type programs. FDR's Third New Deal, as Alan Brinkley chronicled, was stopped in its tracks. The field was set for talented maneuverers like the (in 1938) freshman Congressman Lyndon Johnson to manipulate the system for his conservative and Democratic confreres.

The 1946 elections looked like another landscape-altering reversal. Republicans won the House races by a 53%-44% popular vote majority and got a 245-188 majority. "Had enough?" was their slogan, and they promptly set about repealing wartime wage and price controls, reducing wartime tax rates and passing the Taft-Hartley Act, which reduced the power of labor unions

(1946 saw the largest number of strikes in American history). They also supported Harry Truman's Cold War aid to Turkey and Greece and the Marshall Plan. This 80th Congress, which Harry Truman labeled "do nothing," and in which Richard Nixon and John Kennedy served as freshmen, made major changes in public policy. But the Republicans' work having been done, the voters pitched them out in 1948. Republicans never again had such a large House majority.

The next big change came in President Eisenhower's sixth year, 1958. It was a recession year, at a time when most voters still feared that the Depression of the 1930s might be returning. Democrats gained 15 seats in the Senate and 50 in the House. This was the first Congress in which a majority believed in FDR's New Deal, 13 years after his death. Their numbers were winnowed a bit in 1960 and 1962 but were augmented in 1964, enough to produce the votes for LBJ's Great Society measures and, with support from most Republicans, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Less consequential for changes in public policy were the Republican gains in the Kennedy-Johnson sixth year, 1966, when Republicans won more House votes than Democrats outside the South; the feat was accomplished again in 1968, when Nixon was elected president. This was a reaction against the Great Society, against riots in the streets of the big cities and uprisings on campuses. But under Nixon, Congress ratified the expansion of government -- through wage and price controls, the creation of OSHA and EPA, racial quotas and preferences. Thwarted in his drive for Republican majorities in 1970, he campaigned in 1972 in tandem with conservative Democrats like John Connally. He evidently supposed that Southern Democrats would stick with him on big issues. But when Watergate became an issue, Sam Ervin and other longtime opponents of civil rights let him down. The War Powers and Budget Acts were passed despite Nixon's opposition. The sixth-year election produced neither a Republican majority nor conservative public policies.

Similarly, the big Democratic gains in the Nixon-Ford year of 1974 did not produce policy gains or lasting partisan gains for the out party. The new 2-1 Democratic majority in the House did stifle attempts to come to the relief of Saigon. But under Gerald Ford and his successor Jimmy Carter domestic policy did not move far left. Deregulation of transportation and communications proceeded, and a 2-1 Democratic House passed a tax bill that cut the capital gains tax and included the great generator of individual investment accounts, Section 401(k).

Under Ronald Reagan, the House, with reduced Democratic majorities, and the Senate, with a Republican majority produced by narrow victories in 1980, cut tax rates and refused to cripple the policies by which Reagan defeated communism and won the Cold War. More consequential were the Republicans' big gains in 1994, in Bill Clinton's second (not his sixth) year. These gains resulted in welfare reform, a balanced budget and the Bush tax cuts, and a Republican trend that has lasted 12 years. But a lot of conservatives now are asking the old political question, what have you done for me lately?

All of which leaves me with the conclusion that ideas are more important than partisan vote counts. Democrats could not go beyond the New Deal from 1938 to 1958, because they had not persuaded most Americans to go Roosevelt's way until 13 years after his death. Similarly, Republicans never had reliable majorities for Reagan's polices until 1994, six years after he left office. Democratic gains in 1974 made the House the most left-leaning branch of government for 20 years -- in vivid contrast to the prognostication of '60s liberals, who said it would always be the most conservative -- and Republican gains in 1994 made it the most conservative-leaning. Those majorities affected public policy, but not always in ways their partisans liked.

If the Democrats are justified in preparing to change the drapes today, the questions to ask are: How enduring will be such a partisan switch? How much change in public policy will it accomplish? To the first question, the likelihood of an enduring partisan switch is not high -- if you believe the polls showing the leading Republicans, Rudy Giuliani and John McCain, walloping the best-known Democrats, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Al Gore, in 2008. Changes in public policy? Well, the lead item on the Democrats' wish list is to raise the minimum wage, a law first passed in 1938. Not exactly a new idea.

I don't know what the results of the midterm elections of 2006 will be. But I doubt that they will have the sweeping partisan or policy consequences of the midterm elections of 1874 and 1894, or 1938 and 1994.

Heavy Coverage At Midterm Favors Democrats, Study Says (USAT)

Network news coverage has favored Democratic candidates in the midterm election, and the page scandal involving former congressman Mark Foley has been the main story line, drawing almost as much coverage as Iraq and terrorism combined, a new study finds.

An analysis by the Center for Media and Public Affairs of midterm election stories aired on the ABC, CBS and NBC evening newscasts Sept. 5-Oct. 22 found that 2006's coverage has been almost five times as heavy as in the 2002 midterm elections: 167 stories, compared with 35 four years ago.

The study found that three out of four evaluations of Democratic candidates' chances of winning — such as sound bites — were positive, compared with one out of eight for Republicans. Coverage has been dominated by two major themes: the effects of the Foley scandal, and the impact the Bush presidency is having on the party's congressional candidates.

The Foley scandal produced 59 stories alone, compared with 33 on Iraq and 31 on terrorism/national security issues. "What's hurting Republican candidates is the media's focus on two non-candidates: Mark Foley and George W. Bush," says center director Robert Lichter.

Because of the focus on Foley, the re-election race of House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., was featured in 42 stories. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., was featured in 10 stories, even though he's not up for re-election this year. Sen. Hillary Clinton's possible 2008 presidential run was grist for nine stories.

MSNBC and a new grass-roots community political website, Hotsoup.com, have a long-term deal to share content that the cable channel hopes will initially help round out coverage of the midterm elections and that Hotsoup hopes will put it on the map.

MSNBC.com's politics section, with content from NBC News and The National Journal, will be further bolstered by daily and weekly commentary and analysis from Ron Fournier, a Hotsoup co-founder and former AP political reporter.

The pact is the latest example of mainstream outlets entering into strategic partnerships with online sites and younger-skewing media to stay relevant and take the pulse of the nation, especially Web-savvy viewers and readers. On election night, CNN and Fox News will team with bloggers for coverage.

"This is the Internet version of 'man on the street' or taking calls on Larry King Live," says MSNBC vice president Tammy Haddad, who once produced King for CNN. "We're saying, 'We want to know what you think.' We're involving the community."

Along from comments from ordinary people, political strategists from both parties who contribute to Hotsoup will now be featured on MSNBC. "We're going to hear their strategy, what they're thinking about," Haddad says.

"Our audience is deeply news attentive, very interested in the current conversation, so being able to expand the voice of what's going on in our site to a larger audience is very important," says Hotsoup co-founder Chip Smith.

Since no money is changing hands, the deal is also attractive to NBC at a time when the network is cutting costs.

As Election Nears, A Flood Of Nastiness (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON

A taxpayer-funded call to a fantasy sex hot line. Support for using Taser weapons on 7-year-olds. Votes in Congress to deny modern body armor to US troops in Iraq.

These are but a few of the charges leveled in campaign ads against candidates for office this fall, in what some experts say is probably the most negative US election campaign in modern times.

Nasty, misleading ads have been around for decades, and it's impossible to prove empirically that the 2006 campaign tops them all, but the wave of over-the-top claims has caught the attention of both casual observers and professionals.

"Politics has always been a contact sport, but it really does feel like the rhetoric has crossed a line," says Evan Tracey, a campaign ad analyst at TNS Media Intelligence in Arlington, Va. "We've had ads with baby-crying noises from dumpsters, Playboy mansions, criminals coming over the border creating crime and mayhem. And that's the tame stuff."

Control of Congress hangs in the balance, and in many cases, the highly negative ads are coming out of close races where strategists - either for the campaigns or from the parties and independent groups that are trying to help - believe they will make a difference. They can also be seen as a sign of desperation. In some cases the ads appear to work and in others they backfire (see story below), but when a candidate is trailing badly, strategists often feel there's nothing to lose.

Perhaps the most talked-about ad of this cycle took shots at Rep. Harold Ford (D) of Tennessee, who is running for the Senate. The ad - which ended with a blond, scantily clad woman saying, "Call me" - was perceived by some viewers as racially motivated, since Mr. Ford is black and the woman in the ad is white. If nothing else, the uproar over the ad demonstrated that sensitivities about possible racial innuendo are alive and well in American politics. Ads as sources of information

As distasteful as negative ads can be to the viewing public, many campaign experts defend them for their ability to provide useful information to voters.

"There's nothing inherently wrong with negative advertising, if it's accurate," says Brooks Jackson, a former journalist and director of the Annenberg Political Fact Check project. "A positive ad can also be inaccurate and misleading. That's political disinformation that's also a bad thing."

Often, though, negative ads contain a kernel of truth that is distorted beyond the point of fairness. Take the "fantasy hot line" ad unleashed against Michael Arcuri (D), district attorney in New York's Oneida County, who hopes to fill the seat of retiring Rep. Sherwood Boehlert (R). The National Republican Campaign Committee (NRCC) created a spot accusing Mr. Arcuri of billing taxpayers for a phone call to a sex hot line, and depicting Arcuri with the silhouette of a dancing girl. According to records released by Arcuri's campaign, the truth is that someone misdialed the hot line in a call from Arcuri's hotel room, hung up in seconds, and dialed the intended number - the state Department of Criminal Justice Services in Albany.

Arcuri's Republican opponent, state Sen. Ray Meier, also denounced the ad and called on the NRCC to pull it, but by law, political campaigns are barred from conferring with groups that make independent expenditures on candidates' behalf. Ultimately, the ad did not air on most stations in that part of New York, according to the local press.

Democrats are also producing their share of negative ads deemed unfair by watchdog groups. Mr. Jackson's group, which posts its findings at www.factcheck.org, found 11 ads by Democrats that accused Republican incumbents of voting against a $1,500 bonus for US troops.

One such ad, produced by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) and aired in New Mexico to support House challenger Patricia Madrid, accused her opponent of voting against the bonus (and for a congressional pay raise) - but failed to note that the bonus would have come at the expense of reconstruction funds for Iraq. Rep. Heather Wilson (R), the incumbent, is locked in a tight race with Ms. Madrid, state attorney general. Negative-ad advantage: Republicans

Between the two House campaign committees, the Republicans are beating the Democrats in the race to the bottom. According to a report released last week on Factcheck.org, the NRCC so far this cycle has spent $41.9 million attacking Democrats and $5 million supporting Republicans - about 8 to 1 negative versus positive advertising. The DCCC has spent $18 million on attacks and $3.1 million on positive ads - a 5 to 1 ratio.

Looking at all campaign spending for all races - projected to come in at $2.6 billion, a record for a midterm election - ad-watchers cannot say for certain which party is more guilty of attacks. "I would guarantee you it's equal opportunity," says Mr. Tracey. "The Republican Party is not Darth Vader and the Democrats are not Luke Skywalker. It's basically, once one goes negative, everybody goes negative."

Whether negative ads drive down turnout is open to debate. But if it does, says Tracey, that's not the ads' fault. "This is America, where you've got this great right people die and bleed for. If you're going to let a bunch of silly commercials stop you from voting, it's your fault."

Still, any political candidate knows that blaming voters for their decisions - including whether or not to vote - is a losing proposition. And so, aware of the public's distaste for negativity, many see the good-cop bad-cop routine at work in Missouri. There, Senate candidate Claire McCaskill (D), locked in a close race to unseat Sen. James Talent (R), says she will not air negative ads, knowing well that the party and surrogates will do the dirty work.

But Ms. McCaskill has herself attacked Senator Talent's positions, his loyalty to President Bush, and his campaign donations, notes David Robertson, a political scientist at the University of Missouri in St. Louis. She also approved ads featuring actor Michael J. Fox, who is diagnosed with Parkinson's disease and who favors embryonic stem-cell research, in which Mr. Fox asserts that Talent wants to "criminalize the science that gives us a chance for hope."

But, Mr. Robertson adds, Talent's ads have been perceived to be more personal and mean-spirited than McCaskill's. "These ads have hurt his image as a nice-guy, conservative, policy wonk," he says.

On The Fence On Election Day; Naming 'Worst' Immigration Ads (WSJ)

By Aaron Rutkoff And Jennifer Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

AD WATCH: The national debate on immigration policy, which came to a head in a midterm election year, has been a bountiful source of negative advertising. At the New Republic Online, the center-left magazine's editors provide a handy list1 ranking "the seven worst immigration campaign ads," which coincides with an editorial2 excoriating the party behind each and every one.

All seven ads flagged by the New Republic -- and mostly pulled from YouTube, which features dozens of other examples -- have been made by or for Republican candidates. Democrats, as a group, surely succumb to their own issue-exploitation instincts, but by and large immigration is not that issue. "The genre has several hallmarks," TNR's editorial explains. "It evokes a fear of lawlessness and a sense of growing social decay; it impugns opponents with a lack of patriotism (MITCHELL AGAINST ENGLISH LANGUAGE, reads the bottom of the screen in one of Representative J.D. Hayworth's ads3)."

Vernon Robinson, a long shot ultra-conservative congressional candidate from North Carolina, earns the distinction of having two of his campaign's ads on the TNR list. One, a radio spot4, is sung to the tune of the "Beverly Hillbillies" theme song. Rep. Brad Miller, the incumbent, has "all the sneaky aliens eating from his hand," according to the lyrics. A Vernon Robinson TV ad5, which took first place in the rankings, features an image of a Latino man grabbing his crotch and the disturbing suggestion that illegal immigrants "take our jobs and our government handouts, then spit in our face and burn our flag."

Peter Roskam, a Republican vying for an open House seat in Illinois, also has two ads on the list (one paid for by the NRCC6) accusing his Democratic rival of supporting tax hikes to pay for "handouts for illegal aliens7." A hardnosed immigration-themed ad from the gubernatorial race in Colorado is also included.

Beyond Republican sponsorship, these ads demonstrate an interesting trend: All but the Hayworth ad, from Arizona, originate from states that are located far from the Mexican border. * * *

DESERT DECISIONS: In Arizona, the fault lines on the immigration issue are impossibly tangled. In one congressional district on the border, Republican hardliner Randy Graf has called for the expulsion of undocumented immigrants, staking out a position far from much more moderate views of Democrat Gabrielle Giffords. The irony, as the Christian Science Monitor points out8, is that the district's retiring Republican congressman, Jim Kolbe, has publicly sided with Ms. Giffords on the issue.

And even Mr. Graf can find himself shocked by immigration foes in his district. At a rally, the CSM article notes, someone handed him a denim vest that allegedly belonged to an illegal alien. "When Mr. Graf put it on, the crowd cheered. But the theatrics went too far, and his face blanked when the giver joked: 'It has a bullet hole in the back.'"

Meanwhile, Republican Rep. J.D. Heyworth, an incumbent with an anti-immigration platform, has found himself under attack from his Democratic challenger for not doing enough to fix the problem. "The number of illegal immigrants in our state has increased 400% during his tenure in Congress," declares an ad for challenger Harry Mitchell, according to a Cox News Service report9.

And then there is Arizona's Democratic governor, Janet Napolitano. As the Cox story indicates, she's "expected to win re-election handily despite her support of a guest-worker program that would allow illegal immigrants to get temporary visas" – an outcome that may show limits of the immigration issue's power over statewide voters.

In final twist, Arizona also features four immigration-tinged ballot issues10. Proposition 103 would make English the state's official language, although as an Arizona Republic article11 indicates, even if passed little would change. "Ballots would still be printed in Spanish because federal law requires it. Conversations at government offices, from the Motor Vehicle Division to the agency that issues birth certificates, could continue in languages other than English."

The remaining ballot initiatives would deny certain benefits, such as in-state college tuition and subsidized childcare, to illegal immigrants; amend the state constitution to prevent illegal immigrants from winning punitive damages in court; and eliminate bail for illegal immigrants arrested on felony charges. * * *

SUBURBAN BATTLE: Border security and illegal immigration have emerged as defining issues in two bitterly contested congressional races12 in the Chicago suburbs. It's part of the new "suburban political landscape," according to Oscar Avila and John Blemer in the Chicago Tribune. In this world, immigrants play a central role in the economy, but residents see their presence as a drain on resources.

Republicans have rolled out immigration ads in many of these suburban areas, and polls shows that the issue has energized the Republican base. In Illinois's 6th District, an ad for Peter Roskam criticizes his Democratic opponent, Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth, for her support of an immigration reform bill.

Still, a study found that these Chicago districts have added 45,000 naturalized citizens since 2000, and that means 45,000 potential new voters. * * *

TEXAS: Republican Cynthia Calhoun is using her maiden name of Figueroa when she runs for Dallas County clerk this time around. And Rose Renfroe went to court to be able to use her nickname, "Rosita," on the ballot for District 4 Commissioners Court. Dallas Morning News columnist Mercedes Oliveras asks: Is being a Latino finally an advantage at the ballot box13?

"I am encouraged ... that there are more Hispanics on the ballot. It's more reflective of the community, and the more Hispanics you have running, the more it encourages other Hispanics to go out and vote," says Juan Jasso, a Dallas County justice of the peace.

These local Texas races could signal a shift that some say "will propel [Dallas County] and Texas into the blue column sometime within the next six to eight years," she writes. Political consultant Dan Weiser says Dallas will be the first major urban county in Texas to swing back to Democrats. He says other cities will follow as the state's Hispanic population grows and Latinos become familiar with the voting process. * * *

AND THE WINNER IS …: As we near the midterm milestone, two conservative analysts present retrospectives on the immigration issue. Oddly, however, the authors reach opposite conclusions about who emerged victorious from the immigration policy trenches.

John Fonte, a Hudson Institute fellow writing in the National Review this week14, looks back at the now-signed fence legislation passed without even the suggestion of a guest-worker program – and declares it a victory for ordinary citizens over institutional elites. "How did this happen?" he asks. "The answer is that it happened because the House Republican leadership (with help from Senate conservatives) made immigration enforcement a priority, fought for it, and won in the face of vehement elite opposition."

Given this assessment, Mr. Fonte darkly notes that the anti-amnesty bulwark formed by the Republican-controlled House seems most vulnerable now in the midterm elections. "A change in House leadership from Republican to Democrat will mean a major change in immigration policy," he writes. "It will mean amnesty, a massive increase in legal, low-skilled immigration, and the gutting of serious border and interior enforcement."

Manhattan Institute scholar Tamar Jacoby, writing in this month's Foreign Affairs magazine15, foresees that same outcome. But, on her analysis, the hallmarks of the "comprehensive reform" agenda on immigration will win the day because of an emergent national consensus on the issue. "In fact, the nation is far less divided on immigration, legal or illegal, than the current debate suggests," she writes. "[A]n overwhelming majority -- between two-thirds and three-quarters in every major poll -- would like to see Congress address the problem with a combination of tougher enforcement and earned citizenship for the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already living and working here." In her full essay, Ms. Jacoby maps out the immigration realignment to come. * * *

DETERMINING FACTOR? Immigration has never been such a hot-button political issue, says Brian Mitchell of Investor's Business Daily, but it still isn't likely to be a determining factor in most midterm elections16. Recent Republican scandals have pushed immigration into the background. Plus, Republicans "torn between pro-immigration donors and anti-immigration voters" have shied away from the issue, he writes.

In races where candidates differ on immigration reform, Mr. Mitchell says the issue hasn't paid off as much as hoped. Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum has attacked Democratic challenger Bob Casey Jr. on the issue for months in various political ads. Still, polls show Mr. Casey with a slight lead.

"Republicans are more anti-immigration than Democrats," he writes, "but the GOP's split between its leadership and grass-roots has kept the party from taking advantage."

Republicans' Double Negatives (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Ronald Reagan's brilliant achievement on behalf of American conservatism was to capture hope and optimism from a liberal movement that enjoyed a near monopoly on those virtues from the day Franklin Roosevelt told us we had nothing to fear but fear itself.

Whatever else it will be remembered for, this year's campaign will mark the moment when Republican leaders who govern in the name of conservatism turned definitively away from hope and waged one of the most trivial and ugly campaigns in our country's history.

It's common to gather all political attacks under one large rubric called "negative campaigning" and to condemn the lot. But this is misleading.

A conservative who attacks his opponent for wanting to raise taxes and a liberal who accuses an adversary of favoring cuts in Medicare or environmental programs are both being "negative," but legitimately so, presuming that the criticisms are rooted in fact. If candidates can't air their disagreements, what's the point of free elections?

But this year Republican campaigners and their advocates in the conservative media have crossed line after line in sheer meanness, triviality and tastelessness. Conservative optimism and its promise of morning in America have curdled into the gloom of a Halloween midnight horror show.

The reason is obvious: With the public turning against President Bush's policies in Iraq, most Republicans would prefer not to defend the war. Because most voters do not see the battle in Iraq as making us more secure, fear of terrorism has not worked as effectively for the GOP as it has in the past two elections. And the current majority can't exactly brag about, say, balanced budgets or its achievements in this Congress.

And so in Virginia we have Sen. George Allen, a Republican, assailing the widely admired novels written by his opponent, Democrat Jim Webb, for what an Allen adviser called "chauvinistic attitudes and sexually exploitative references." Lost here is that Webb's fiction has drawn praise for the moving and realistic way he has depicted war and those who fight for their country.

Conservatives should be embarrassed by Allen's last-minute sliming of Webb's books, since conservative critics have been among their biggest fans. In 2002 a writer for National Review, one of the nation's leading conservative publications, said Webb's "Fields of Fire" was "still the finest novel yet written about Vietnam." Reviewing Webb's novel "Lost Soldiers," a writer for the conservative Weekly Standard warmly praised the book's moral message and called it "an affecting and taut tale."

Are such views now inoperative because Republicans desperately need to hold on to Allen's Senate seat?

And how many compassionate conservatives will come forward to condemn Rush Limbaugh's cruelty in mocking Michael J. Fox's painful body movements induced by Parkinson's disease? Limbaugh felt free to parody Fox's agony because the actor had the nerve to make advertisements for Democratic candidates who support embryonic stem cell research. If you help Democrats, anything goes. Limbaugh claimed that Fox either "didn't take his medication or he's acting." Limbaugh ultimately apologized but called Fox "really shameless" in seeking sympathy. Really shameless? From Limbaugh?

Perhaps Republicans will be less skittish about criticizing Limbaugh after he has used his broadcast to turn out the party faithful on Nov. 7.

Space does not permit a full listing of other trivial and seamy ads being run by the GOP. They were well described last week by Post reporter Michael Grunwald, and many of them falsely accuse various Democrats of one bad thing or another related to sex.

And there is what will, sadly, become the most famous advertisement of this election cycle, the "Harold, call me" ad run by the Republican National Committee against Rep. Harold Ford Jr., the Democratic candidate for the Senate from Tennessee. To claim that an ad depicting a pretty blond woman coming on to an African American politician does not play on the fears of miscegenation on the part of some whites is to ignore history.

My hunch is that the sliminess won't work this year. A Newsweek poll published over the weekend found that only 9 percent of voters who have seen Republican ads say they made them more likely to vote for GOP candidates; 24 percent said the ads made them less likely to vote for Republicans. By contrast, Newsweek reported, "The Democrats seem to turn off fewer voters with their commercials and win more over, but it's still a wash," meaning that Democratic ads attracted and pushed away roughly equal shares of the electorate.

My hope is that principled conservatives will rebel against those who are dragging their once forward-looking movement through the mud. In their hearts, they have to be asking: Would Ronald Reagan campaign this way?

Ad Echoes GOP's 'Southern Strategy' (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, October 31, 2006

Last week, he started backsliding.

"I just think those criticisms of it are wrong," Mehlman said of a television ad that was produced with money from his treasury and aired in Tennessee. In the 30-second spot, a scantily clad white woman appears to suggest that she and Harold Ford Jr., a black Democrat, have had an intimate relationship.

"I met Harold at the Playboy party," the woman coos into the camera. That's a reference to Ford's admission that he attended a party that Playboy hosted during the 2005 Super Bowl. As the commercial closes, the woman says with a salacious wink, "Harold, call me."

The commercial plays to the fears of whites who think interracial relationships are taboo. It also conjures up memories of the awful fate that befell the Scottsboro Boys, Matt Ingram and Emmett Till — blacks who were victimized for simply being accused of getting too close to white women.

Mehlman wants us to think that's not his intention. He wants us to believe that although he funded the ad, he had absolutely no knowledge of its content.

William Cohen, a former Republican senator from Maine and a former Defense secretary whose wife is African-American, said the commercial was "an appeal to racist sentiment." Even Corker called the ad "over the top." While that was a fairly tame criticism, it at least put a little distance between Corker and the racist attack that was made on his behalf.

"The way that process works under the campaign reform laws is I write a check to an independent individual and that person's responsible for spending money in certain states," Mehlman said lamely during an appearance on MSNBC.

The problem with this dodge is that a voice in the commercial, which was pulled off the air late last week, loudly proclaims: "The Republican National Committee is responsible for the content of this advertising."

"Some Republicans gave up on winning the African-American vote, looking the other way or trying to benefit politically from racial polarization," Mehlman said of the GOP's "Southern strategy," during his 2005 speech at the NAACP convention. "I am here today as the Republican chairman to tell you we were wrong."

That mea culpa came at a time when Republicans had a firm grip on Congress, and it was touted by some as proof of the sincerity of Mehlman's outreach to black voters. But now — plagued by scandal and President Bush's war policies — the GOP could be on the verge of losing control of both houses of Congress.

And so Republicans have dusted off their Southern strategy playbook. Mehlman won't admit as much. But the subtle racism of the ad is just a new twist on the more blatant appeals the GOP used to make to whites who were angered by the Democratic Party's embrace of the civil rights movement.

I don't know how voters in Tennessee will react to the GOP's bigoted ad. It's hard to tell in a contest as close as this one what might influence the outcome. But I'm certain of this much: The Republican Party is not done with its Southern strategy. It hasn't given up on appealing to people's fears. It hasn't tired of stoking the still-smoldering embers of white racism.

And if Mehlman's refusal to condemn this ad is any indication, Republicans will continue to use their Southern strategy — at whatever cost — for as long as it gets them the results they seek.

Former Republicans Campaign As Democrats (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

At a time of widely expected Republican losses in both chambers of Congress, a new breed of politician has emerged: former Republicans challenging Republican incumbents.

Most famous is James H. Webb Jr., who served as Navy secretary under President Reagan and is challenging Sen. George Allen in Virginia. Mr. Webb wears combat boots on the campaign trail, loves his guns and chews tobacco.

Then there's Tim Mahoney, a Florida Republican-turned-Democrat running for the seat of disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley. Mr. Mahoney lists Ronald Reagan as a political hero, opposes the "death tax" and calls himself a "conservative Christian."

In New York, former Republican Jack Davis is giving Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds one of the biggest challenges of his career. Mr. Davis, a multimillionaire businessman, says he wants to end illegal entry without granting amnesty, opposes higher taxes and wants to kill the death tax.

In Florida's 13th Congressional District, former banker and former Republican Christine Jennings is running as a Democrat for the seat being vacated by Rep. Katherine Harris. She, too, is running on tax cuts and greater fiscal responsibility in Washington.

All are the kind of Democrats that Republicans have a difficult time hating. Hearing them explain why they left the Republican Party is like listening to voters today talk about why a growing number of them are tired of Republicans in Washington.

"Congress has run up the national debt to an astounding $8.4 trillion, mortgaging our future and saddling our children and grandchildren for endless years," said Mrs. Jennings, who promises to balance the nation's checkbook.

Mr. Mahoney, an investment banker and cattle rancher, said he got fed up with the Republicans' out-of-control spending, scandals and poor handling of the war in Iraq. He calls himself a "common-sense businessman who reflects the values and morals of Florida's families."

Mr. Webb left the party in large part out of disgust over the Republican response to the September 11 terrorist attacks and over the war in Iraq.

"He's a Vietnam veteran, and these guys were politicizing the war," said campaign adviser Steve Jarding, who has long argued that Democrats must appeal to a broader audience to survive as a political force.

Just a few years ago, Mr. Jarding said, a conservative candidate such as Mr. Webb would not have been welcomed by party leaders unless he or she submitted to the party's entire platform. This year, winning trumped ideology.

"They're more accepting of people with different ideas, and that's a difference," Mr. Jarding said. "We're not going to be having all these litmus tests because they were killing us."

Mr. Jarding said that had Democratic primary voters sided in the primary with Harris Miller -- a longtime politician who is ideologically more in tune with national Democrats -- "we would be 40 points behind George Allen right now."

"Democrats are finally wising up," he said.

As a result, Senate Democrats will move rightward if candidates such as Mr. Webb, Bob Casey Jr. in Pennsylvania, Jon Tester in Montana and Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. in Tennessee win their general elections.

Republicans in the chamber, meanwhile, stand to lose some of their most conservative voices. Among the incumbents in the tightest races are Sens. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Conrad Burns of Montana and Jim Talent of Missouri.

Strategists from both parties expect Democrats to gain 10 seats or more in the House. But the strategists note that since pickup seats by definition come from districts held by the other party, the new Democratic lawmakers likely will be more conservative than the current Democrat caucus.

GOP Seeks To Benefit From Gay Marriage Ruling (TSSC)

By Steven Thomma

The State (SC), October 30, 2006

NORFOLK, Va. - In the final stretch before Election Day, embattled Republicans feel as if they've received a gift from an unlikely donor: advocates of gay marriage.

They think that last week's ruling by New Jersey's Supreme Court ordering equal rights for gay couples - seven of whom had sued for the right to marry - is re-energizing Christian conservatives, who had been losing interest in and passion for politics. Republicans predict that could draw more conservatives to the polls next week, especially in the eight states that will vote on proposed amendments to their state constitutions to ban gay marriage.

The eight states comprise Virginia, Tennessee - coincidentally two states with razor-close Senate races that could decide which party controls the Senate next year - Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Getting conservative Christians to the polls also could help Republicans in some close races for the House of Representatives, such as the one in Virginia's 2nd Congressional District. It's home to Pat Robertson's Christian Broadcasting Network and Regent University and includes a large number of Christian conservatives.

"It will improve turnout on our side," said Rep. Thelma Drake, R-Va., who's in a close re-election battle with Democratic challenger Phil Kellam. "We all work very hard for turnout. This is a plus for us."

Nearby, Sen. George Allen, R-Va., visited two largely black churches Sunday, where he invoked the New Jersey ruling as a potent reminder of the need to pass the proposed amendment to the Virginia state constitution banning gay marriage.

"The Supreme Court decision in New Jersey this week showed even more importantly to the people of Virginia why the Virginia marriage-protection amendment is so important," he said afterward.

Asked if the issue would help him appeal to African-Americans, who might have grown skeptical about his candidacy after news reports that he used racial epithets while in college, Allen noted that several people at one service stood up in support of his remarks about marriage.

"There will be some who say, and they will be wrong, that this is a divisive issue," he said during a later campaign event with two former pro football players, both African-American. "I look at it as a bridging issue. This is one that brings many people of different backgrounds together. Bringing the issue up as a salient issue, regardless of race or ethnicity or religious denomination, unites many people."

After years of growing political participation and helping Republicans win, Christian conservatives have been pulling back this year, frustrated by their inability to win significant victories in public policy such as a ban on abortion, and perhaps disillusioned by the page sex scandal in the House.

One sign: The ranks of Christian conservatives with favorable views of the party dropped from 74 percent two years ago to 54 percent this year, according to the Pew Research Center.

"Evangelicals remain the party's most supportive group, but at levels significantly diminished from where they were in the 2002 and 2004 elections," a recent Pew analysis said.

If a rally Sunday in Norfolk is a guide, however, the threat of the New Jersey ruling could bring some of them back into politics.

"I'm a born-again Christian," said Vernon Mills, a retired Navy veteran from Norfolk, standing amid a sea of yellow lawn signs urging support for the anti-gay marriage amendment that outnumbered candidates' signs.

"The Bible tells us God created Adam and Eve. One man and one woman. That's the way it's supposed to be. ... I hope it passes by a landslide."

"Prior to the New Jersey decision, I may have questioned whether the commonwealth of Virginia needed this amendment," added Leo Wardup, a Republican state legislator from Virginia Beach.

DOJ_NMG_0089007

"The New Jersey decision made a lot of people say, `Wait a minute.' The New Jersey decision is a catalyst showing people that this is necessary. And it's going to get more people to turn out on Election Day."

In Ohio, Democrats Show A Religious Side To Voters (NYT)

By David Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Oct. 30 — Representative Ted Strickland, an Ohio Democrat and former Methodist minister, opened his campaign for governor with a commercial on Christian radio vowing that "biblical principles" would guide him in office.

In his first major campaign speech, Mr. Strickland said "the example of Jesus" had led him into public service. He has made words from the prophet Micah a touchstone of his campaign.

Ohio, where a groundswell of conservative Christian support helped push President Bush to re-election two years ago, has become the leading edge of national Democratic efforts to win over religious voters, including evangelicals.

Explaining his hope to win conservative Christian votes, Mr. Strickland said, "I try to make a distinction between the religious right — people who have a conservative theological perspective — and the political religious right, who seem to have as their primary motivation political influence."

Polls show a notable decline since 2004 in support for Republicans among white evangelical Christians, who make up about a quarter of the electorate. The slip in Ohio has been especially steep. In 2004, 76 percent of white evangelical Christians in Ohio voted for Mr. Bush over the Democratic candidate, Senator John Kerry. But in a recent New York Times/CBS News poll, 53 percent of the same voters approved of the president's performance, and 42 percent disapproved.

Democrats, meanwhile, have stepped up efforts to lure religious voters in states including Michigan, Pennsylvania and Tennessee. But Mr. Strickland has capitalized more than anyone else on evangelical disaffection from the Republicans, helping to give him a lead of more than 20 percentage points in the race.

Mr. Strickland faces a Republican opponent, J. Kenneth Blackwell, who speaks just as openly about his evangelical faith, staunchly opposes abortion rights and same-sex unions and carries the endorsement of several nationally known Christian conservatives. But in a recent Quinnipiac University poll, Mr. Blackwell led Mr. Strickland among white evangelical voters by only three percentage points, which is within the margin of error.

"I have talked to lots of folks who say this is the first time they are not voting Republican," Rich Nathan, pastor of the Vineyard Columbus Church, one of the largest in the state, said in an interview Sunday after a service. Mr. Strickland, he said, was "making headway."

Still, dozens of evangelicals interviewed at Vineyard Columbus and another megachurch, Grace Brethren, said they remained wary of overtures from Democrats, even Mr. Strickland. Many said they felt more repelled by the Republicans than attracted to the Democrats.

"The Republican is lying, and the Democrats are secular," said Joshua Porter, a video producer attending Vineyard Columbus. "Who do we vote for?"

Robert Oser, an usher at Grace Brethren, said Mr. Strickland's liberal positions undercut him. "The Democrats are trying to change their spots," Mr. Oser said, "but their spots are still there."

No one brought up the New Jersey Supreme Court decision to recognize some form of same-sex unions as a factor on Election Day.

Only Mr. Oser offered the explanation for grass-roots malaise that Christian conservative groups in Washington usually suggest: that the Republicans had not done enough about abortion or other social issues.

Instead, some said they were disturbed by corruption in the Republican-controlled Statehouse here and in the Republican-controlled Congress. And many pointed to the Ohio economy, budget cuts for schools and social services and the war in Iraq.

Lawrence Porath, a parishioner at Grace Brethren, said he called himself a staunch Republican two years ago and helped turn out voters as a county leader of the Christian Coalition. But a week before this year's midterm elections, he said he was not sure whom to vote for.

"I feel like our president has really not given us the complete truth from the beginning, on the war, or on anything," Mr. Porath, a commercial real estate investor, said in an interview after services on Sunday.

Mr. Nathan of Vineyard Columbus said such disillusionment was common. "How is it that we evangelicals have become the strongest constituency for war of any group in America?" he asked.

When he asked that question from the pulpit, Mr. Nathan said, people stand up and cheer.

Other Democratic candidates here are also reaching out to evangelicals and other Christians. Until recently, Representative Sherrod Brown, a Lutheran who is running for Senate here, seldom spoke publicly about his religious views.

This year, however, Mr. Brown's advisers discovered that after visiting Israel a decade ago he had written to his daughters and a Jewish friend about the emotions he felt reading aloud from the Sermon on the Mount at the site where Jesus is believed to have delivered it. Mr. Brown's campaign quickly incorporated his private words into messages sent to Christian voters.

In an interview, Mr. Brown said he now talked about his faith "a bit, not a lot." A campaign aide then arranged a second interview with Mr. Brown's wife, Connie Schultz, who said her husband tithed, listened to Lutheran hymns to relax and prayed before each campaign debate.

Mara Vanderslice, an evangelical Protestant who worked on Senator Kerry's presidential campaign, has opened a consulting firm, Common Good Strategies, based here, to help Democrats across the country reach religious voters and, she said, to help make the party more welcoming to them.

In addition to working with Mr. Strickland and Mr. Brown, Ms. Vanderslice is consulting with Democrats in Alabama, Michigan, Pennsylvania and elsewhere.

The Michigan Democratic Party consulted with 500 members of the clergy, including many evangelical Christians, and revised its platform. The revision included a dedication: "The Common Good. The best for each person in the state. The orphan. The family. The sick. The healthy. The wealthy. The poor. The citizen. The stranger. The First. The Last."

At a speech this month at a Lutheran college here, Mr. Strickland put a liberal twist on the common conservative Christian theme about secular forces trying to squeeze religion from the public square.

"There are those in Columbus and elsewhere who argue that the biblical mandates to love your neighbor and to work for justice are meant only for individuals and have no application to the political sphere," Mr. Strickland said. "They dismiss the Democrats and those religious leaders who claim that our faith requires us to insist that governments and government leaders — not just private citizens — seek justice, love, mercy, and humbly work to help the least, the last and the lost in our society."

In an interview, Mr. Strickland said that Christian conservatives had a right to their interpretation of the Bible, but that "it is an anemic interpretation, at best."

Phil Burress, president of Citizens for Community Values and a prominent Christian conservative organizer here, accused Mr. Strickland of using his faith. "He abandoned his theology degree," Mr. Burress said, "and all of a sudden he has found that it is a good political toy."

Still, Mr. Burress commended the Democrats for at least competing for conservative Christian voters. And, he added, "if he is successful in breaking into that bloc of voters, it is going to be a very interesting 2008."

Union Heads South To Recapture U.S. Political Clout (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Kim Chipman

Bloomberg, October 30, 2006

Oct. 30 (Bloomberg) -- The AFL-CIO, the biggest U.S. labor federation, is pushing into unfriendly territory -- the South -- in an effort to gain new political friends and help its Democratic allies win control of Congress.

The AFL-CIO has included contests in at least five states in the largely non-union South on its list of targeted races in the Nov. 7 midterm election, one that it says is vital to the future of organized labor.

``Our existence is at stake," said Jerry Lee, head of the AFL-CIO Labor Council in Tennessee. ``If we don't take control of at least one of the houses in Congress, Republicans will have free rein to do all the devastating things they can do to labor over the next two years."

The AFL-CIO says it's spending a record $40 million this year to defeat Republicans nationwide. The money is being used to mobilize some 13.5 million union members, affiliated workers and their families through door-to-door visits, phone calls, direct mailings and leafleting.

The federation is broadening its political effort this year after concentrating much of its energies in 2004 on pivotal states such as Ohio -- and still failing to stop President George W. Bush from winning there and clinching re-election.

Some political experts as well as Republican critics, eying organized labor's shrinking membership and declining clout, question whether the AFL-CIO can deliver enough votes to make a difference.

Declining Membership

The percentage of U.S. workers in labor unions was 12.5 percent last year, down from 35 percent in 1955, according to government data. The rate among private sector employees was 7.8 percent, the lowest in more than seven decades.

Virginia and Tennessee, two of the southern states the federation is targeting this year, have about 200,000 union members each, including retirees. Active union members account for about 5 percent of total workers in each state, according to government data.

That's a decline in Tennessee from 8.9 percent in 2000 --the year that Democratic presidential nominee Al Gore lost his home state even with strong union support.

North Carolina, where the AFL-CIO is supporting Democratic challenger Heath Shuler over Republican incumbent Charles Taylor in a House race, has the second-lowest percentage of union members in the country at 3 percent, ahead only of South Carolina.

Southern Battlegrounds

``The problem is that the areas where Democrats need to pick up votes aren't necessarily places where labor has a stronghold," said Jennifer Duffy of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report in Washington.

Still, some of the southern states being targeted by the federation -- Tennessee, Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky and Texas -- are the sites of a cluster of Senate and House races that will help determine control of the next Congress.

The AFL-CIO targeted these states after it became clear that the contests there were up for grabs, said Karen Ackerman, the AFL-CIO's national political director. ``These were reliably Red states, and the fact they are now toss-ups speaks to how fertile the moment is for more progressive candidates," Ackerman said.

Virginia AFL-CIO Treasurer Doris Crouse-Mays said the union vote can make a difference in her state's Senate race, which pits Allen against Democratic challenger Jim Webb in a contest polls show is very close.

Virginia Turnout

In last year's Virginia governor's race, which Democrat Tim Kaine won, a union analysis of state voting data found that almost 60 percent of active AFL-CIO members and 70 percent of retirees voted, exceeding the general turnout of about 45 percent, Mays said.

Republicans say they aren't worried. Doug Grindstaff, the party's chairman in Tennessee's Williamson County, which includes the Nashville suburbs, said he welcomes union efforts on behalf of Democratic Senate candidate Harold Ford Jr. because they reveal him as a liberal.

``I'd say 70 to 80 percent of voters in my county oppose organized labor issues, so it helps us," Grindstaff said.

The Ford campaign seems to recognize that union support in the South can cut two ways. While Ford appeared at a rally with union officials in Nashville on Oct. 13, he didn't publicize the event, according to John Geer, a political scientist at Vanderbilt University in Nashville.

Split Movement

``I didn't see anything about it from the Ford campaign, and I get all their stuff," Geer said. ``It would hurt Ford if he embraced labor in very strong terms."

Unions are counting on a Democratic-controlled Congress to pass legislation making it easier for workers to organize and push back against what labor sees as anti-union measures, such as a recent National Labor Relations Board ruling giving management wider scope to exempt certain employees from union membership.

``People understand what the present administration in Washington is doing," AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, 72, said in an Oct. 13 interview at a labor rally in Nashville for Ford. ``It's not difficult when you see a government trying to privatize Social Security or avoid increasing the minimum wage."

A debate among unions last year about the best way to revive the movement led to the biggest split in 70 years and threatened to weaken labor's already dwindling political power. Several unions broke away from the AFL-CIO to form a new federation called Change to Win.

Rift's Consequences

Leaders in both federations say predictions that the rift would hurt labor's political efforts proved to be overblown. Coordination has been ``relatively seamless," said Greg Tarpinian, executive director of Change to Win, which represents seven unions and about 6 million workers.

Union supporters in some southern states said voters' attention is shifting from issues such as gay marriage to economic ones, like lost manufacturing jobs and a federal minimum wage that hasn't been raised since 1997.

``I can't feed my family on gay marriage," said Robert Lewis, a machinist and a coordinator for the Tennessee AFL-CIO. ``I can't put a roof over my family on gay marriage."

By Marcus Kabel

The Belleville News Democrat, October 31, 2006

After campaigning in southeast Missouri and St. Louis Monday, Talent was scheduled to hold campaign events in Joplin, Springfield, Bolivar, Lebanon and Rolla on Tuesday. He plans to keep up a similar pace for the next week, a Talent spokesman said.

Talent will be joined Tuesday by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. Missouri's senior senator, Kit Bond, campaigned for Talent at Monday's stops and will take part for a second day.

McCaskill had no public campaign events scheduled Monday, but had evening fundraisers in St. Louis, where she planned to begin a statewide RV tour Tuesday.

Talent told supporters Monday that Democrats such as McCaskill would roll back tax cuts if they win control of Congress.

Talent told crowds of GOP workers and backers, ranging from around 40 people to more than 100, that they need to work phone lines, knock on doors and talk to friends and co-workers about voting next week.

"If you haven't been busy doing that, I want you to get busy," he said at a farm equipment dealership in Poplar Bluff, the last of five stops on a roughly 200-mile swing through southeast Missouri, before heading to an evening appearance in St. Louis.

"I think that all that can possibly stop us is if we and the people who believe as we do just don't go to the polls next Tuesday. But that isn't going to happen," he said.

Talent wound up activities in the St. Louis area Monday night for a fundraising event that featured White House spokesman Tony Snow. The stop at the St. Louis Hilton Frontenac was one of more than a dozen Snow is making for Republican candidates around the country ahead of the Nov. 7 elections.

"There's no reason to do politics unless it's to make a difference," Snow told the crowd. "If you've got the right attitude, you can get a lot of stuff done. Jim's done that."

He spoke on topics ranging from energy policy to the war in Iraq and how the nation has changed since Sept. 11, 2001. He said the U.S. operation in Iraq is a chance to spread democracy.

"This is a country that really does spread dreams," Snow said. "This is a chance to expand that dream."

DOJ_NMG_0089011

In his appearances earlier in the day, Talent touted a legislative record of working on what he called national issues that had extra benefits for Missouri. He said those included legislation to combat methamphetamine by restricting the amount of cold medicines - which contain ingredients used in making meth - that people can buy in one stop. It also included legislation requiring oil companies to mix ethanol in gasoline, which he said could revive rural economies such as Missouri's.

"This will be for Missouri what oil was for Texas," Talent said.

Talent mentioned the war in Iraq only once in a brief line accusing McCaskill of supporting a U.S. troop withdrawal "before our mission is done."

McCaskill has called for a redeployment of U.S. troops from Iraq in about two years. She also has criticized President Bush's policies in Iraq, suggested Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld should be fired and claimed Talent has not asked enough questions of Rumsfeld as a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Talent said he supported the Bush administration's intelligence efforts against terrorists and opposed leaks to the news media of programs such as warrantless wiretapping of phone conversations between possible overseas terrorists and people in the United States.

"I'm going to stand up for your security and your freedom and your civil liberties, and I'm not going to worry too much about the captured terrorists," he said.

Bond campaigned for Talent as a representative of "commonsense conservative Missouri values" - a slogan Talent has used frequently at campaign events.

Talent said those values included opposing gay marriage and supporting border security, including a border fence bill recently signed by President Bush, while opposing amnesty for illegal immigrants.

Supporter Darrell Myers welcomed the push Monday. Myers, 78, a retired Poplar Bluff accountant, described himself as a conservative Christian and said he has spoken with many people with similar views who are reluctant to vote next week.

"It's not any one thing. It's the state of society as a whole. Our politicians need to do more to push moral values," Myers said, adding he was volunteering to make calls to voters.

But Tom Burchan, a volunteer GOP organizer in Farmington, said he had more volunteers for phone calls and house visits than at the same point in the 2002 and 2004 campaigns.

"The enthusiasm is enormous," Burchan said.

New CNN poll shows Webb with slight edge on Allen (AP)

By Bob Lewis

AP CNN Poll, October 31, 2006

Among likely voters, the former Republican was the choice of 50 percent of those surveyed while 46 percent favored Allen and 4 percent were undecided.

Because Webb's edge is equal to the margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points, it means Webb is slightly ahead.

The result is based on telephone interviews Opinion Research Corp. conducted for CNN from Oct. 26-29 among 597 registered Virginia voters who identified themselves as likely to vote on Nov. 7.

Among the larger sample of 904 registered voters, the results were about even, with 48 percent of the respondents backing Webb, 46 percent for Allen and 5 percent undecided. One percent voiced support for an "other" candidate not identified in the survey.

The poll is the first to show Webb with an advantage in a mean and expensive campaign in once reliably Republican Virginia whose outcome could be pivotal in determining whether an embattled GOP can retain control of the Senate.

Webb, along with help from a national Democratic organization, is airing about $3 million a week in television ads to more than $2 million a week for Allen and his national GOP allies in the campaign's frantic final week.

While Webb supporters crowed over the results, longtime Allen adviser Christopher J. LaCivita said the poll was skewed because half of it was conducted over the weekend.

"It sure doesn't reflect anything we're seeing," said LaCivita, a national GOP consultant who lives near Richmond.

"Any survey conducted Fridays and Saturdays, everybody knows they're skewed toward Democrats," he said.

The latter two days of the survey, however, reflect two intensive days of news coverage of Allen's claim that selected sexually explicit passages in some of Webb's six gritty novels about war are demeaning to women.

"Virginians are a lot smarter than that, and he insulted their intelligence," said Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd. "It was a baseless attack on Jim that didn't make sense. He (Allen) was trying to attack Jim on works of fiction."

The fictional books reflect the bloodshed and dehumanizing conditions Webb saw and experienced as a Marine in some of the deadliest combat of the Vietnam War in 1969.

He has written one nonfiction book, "Born Fighting," that traces the heritage of Scots-Irish families in America, including his own, to their ethnic origins in Europe.

Allen campaigned with veterans groups with Virginia's senior senator and Armed Services Committee chairman, John W. Warner, in Hampton Roads, an area that's home to the world's largest U.S. Navy base as well as active duty and retired military households.

Poll Shows Webb Leading Allen For First Time (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

If the Nov. 7 election were held today, Mr. Webb would receive 48 percent of the vote to Mr. Allen's 46 percent, the poll conducted by Rasmussen Reports shows.

Of the 500 likely voters questioned in Sunday's telephone survey, 2 percent favored another candidate and 5 percent were undecided.

The margin of error is 4.5 percentage points, which means the two men still are statistically tied.

Over the course of the campaign, Mr. Allen's lead has eroded steadily. Last fall, before any Democrat had declared a candidacy for Senate, Mr. Allen, a former governor, held a lead of more than 30 points. In the summer, he led Mr. Webb by 16 points.

In the latest Rasmussen poll, Mr. Webb leads with 51 percent to 46 percent for Mr. Allen when the results include "leaners," or undecided voters who are leaning toward one candidate. When leaners are included, 3 percent remained undecided.

Of the Webb voters in the poll, 43 percent said they would choose the Democrat as a way to vote "against Allen."

Issues were more important to 82 percent of those surveyed, while 14 percent said questions of character are more important.

Mr. Allen's recent criticism of salacious passages in Mr. Webb's novels did not seem to sway voters in the senator's direction.

Though many Allen supporters have said the depictions of incest and an acrobatic stripper raise questions about Mr. Webb's character, many of those surveyed disagreed.

In the poll, 59 percent said the passages caused them no concern about Mr. Webb, and 39 percent said they were of concern.

Black Democrats Cross Party Lines To Back Steele For U.S. Senate (WP)

By Ovetta Wiggins

DOJ_NMG_0089013

A coalition of black Democratic political leaders from Prince George's County led by former county executive Wayne K. Curry endorsed Republican Michael S. Steele's bid for the U.S. Senate yesterday.

The support from Curry, five County Council members and others barely a week before Election Day reflects their continued disappointment that the Democratic Party has no African American candidates at the top of the ticket and a sense that the county is being ignored, officials said.

"They show us a pie, but we never get a slice," said Major F. Riddick Jr., a former aide to then-Gov. Parris N. Glendening and a former county executive candidate. "We are here today to say we've waited and we've waited and we're waiting no longer."

Steele, who as lieutenant governor is the first African American elected statewide in Maryland, said he was humbled by the support. "I said I did not want this [campaign] to be so much about party but about the people," he said. "And these people understand that."

Ron Walters, a political science professor at the University of Maryland, said the endorsements could be significant. "This is going to go through the black community like a rocket," he said. "It's going to be the talk of the county, the state, maybe even the nation."

Oren Shur, a spokesman for the Democratic Senate candidate, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, was more skeptical. "The endorsements will not make Prince George's County residents forget that Michael Steele is George W. Bush's handpicked candidate," he said.

The politicians were joined at a news conference in Largo by about a half-dozen business leaders, including Ron Lipscomb, a trustee of the state Democratic Party.

All said they are lifelong Democrats who do not agree with some of Steele's stances but are not in lock step with the Democratic Party, either.

"The party acts as though when they want our opinion they'll give it to us," said Curry, Prince George's first black county executive. "It will not be like that anymore."

He noted that support for a Republican is not unprecedented: In 2002, Democrat Kathleen Kennedy Townsend picked a GOP running mate in her gubernatorial bid, passing over a black candidate.

This year, Democratic contender Martin O'Malley is running with an African American from Prince George's County, Del. Anthony Brown. But black Democrats who ran for the U.S. Senate and state attorney general lost in the primary.

Curry would not answer questions about Brown, but he said the state Democratic Party had "trivialized" Prince George's, though it provides the "mother lode of votes in the state of Maryland."

Terry Lierman, state Democratic chairman, said there is plenty of diversity in the party. "They are trying to make an issue out of something that doesn't exist," he said.

According to a recent Washington Post poll, Steele trailed Cardin by 11 percentage points. The lieutenant governor has support from only 14 percent of black voters, despite an aggressive bid for their support, the poll shows.

During the primary, Curry's endorsement gave Rushern L. Baker III a boost in his unsuccessful bid for county executive. Steele is hoping Curry will do the same for him among black Democrats.

Walters said the Prince George's politicians made an "audacious" move by putting local interests above national ones since a Steele victory could keep the Senate in Republican hands.

Curry said the decision to endorse the lieutenant governor was about dignity and respect and an opportunity to back a "good man with a good plan."

Curry said he disagrees with Steele on several issues but supports his plans for equity in business opportunities, economic development and improved schools.

Prince George's council member David Harrington (D-Cheverly) said he was comfortable supporting Steele. "It's a way to say, 'Don't leave Prince George's out, and don't leave African Americans out,' " he said.

Harrington said race is a factor for him. "It's not the factor," he said, "but it is a factor. There needs to be a diversity of voices in the room."

In addition to Harrington, the council members backing Steele are Samuel H. Dean (D-Mitchellville), Camille Exum (D-Seat Pleasant), Tony Knotts (D-Temple Hills) and Marilynn Bland (D-Clinton).

Black Democrats Support Steele (WT)

By S.a. Miller And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

Former Prince George's County Executive Wayne K. Curry and five fellow black Democrats on the county council excoriated their party yesterday and endorsed Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a Republican, for U.S. Senate.

"The [Democratic] Party acts as though when they want our opinion, they'll give it to us. It's not going to be like that anymore," said Mr. Curry, who in 1994 became the county's first black executive and remains influential in the mostly black and heavily Democratic county.

Mr. Curry and the lawmakers said Democratic leaders repeatedly have snubbed the black community and their county, noting the lack of party support for the Senate campaign of former National Association for the Advancement of Colored People chief Kweisi Mfume, who lost the Democratic primary to Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin.

The Democratic ticket lacks black candidates, they said, and candidates from Prince George's County, which is home to more than 320,000 registered Democrats -- the most of any jurisdiction in Maryland.

"We're not puppets. We're not gullible," Mr. Curry said during a press conference at the Infusion Tea Cafe in Largo. "This ain't the first time we've charged up a hill."

He was joined by fellow black Democrats David Harrington of Bladensburg, Samuel H. Dean of Bowie, Camille A. Exum of Capitol Heights, Tony Knotts of Temple Hills and Marilyn Bland of Clinton -- all officials on the nine-member county council.

Other black Democratic leaders endorsing Mr. Steele yesterday included Major Riddick, former chief of staff for former Gov. Parris N. Glendening; Ron Lipscomb, a major fundraiser and trustee of the state party; and businessmen Clayton Duhaney and M.A. "Mike" Little.

"There's a revolution going on here," said Jerry McLaurin, a county developer and Steele supporter who attended the announcement. "This is going to radiate throughout the county like an explosion."

Mr. Steele, who lives in the county and is the first black to be elected to statewide office in Maryland, said he was "humbled."

"As I started this campaign, I said to myself I didn't want this to be so much about party as about people, and these individuals seem to understand and appreciate that as well," he said.

The endorsements were issued as Democratic officials are scrambling to secure their most loyal bloc -- black voters.

Mr. Curry said the Steele endorsements are "the continuation of a long civil rights struggle."

Mr. Dean, a former council chairman who was elected in 2002 with 93 percent of the vote, said blacks have had a one-sided relationship with the Democratic Party since they shifted allegiance from the Republican Party in 1932.

"We were in the Democratic Party while they were lynching black folks. We were in the Democratic Party while they were segregating folks," Mr. Dean said. "We have been loyal Democrats, [but] when the party has an opportunity to do something to show that their base is recognized, appreciated and acknowledged, they don't."

"The issue is what we want not only from the state party but from the national party," he said. "Give us respect. We cannot continue to be in the room but not allowed to come to the table. What we are doing now is saying, 'Forget it. We are not going to wait for you to bring us to the table. We are going to not only get to the table, we are going to take it.' "

Other Maryland Democratic leaders -- such as U.S. House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson and Delegate Anthony G. Brown of Prince George's County, who is running for lieutenant governor -- declined to comment.

Mr. Cardin, a white 10-term congressman from Baltimore, said this weekend that his "message to the African-American community and to all communities is that we've got to change the priorities in Washington."

"You're twice as likely to be without health insurance if you're African-American. So, yes, [black voters are] concerned about a senator who's going to stand up for universal health coverage. I will. Michael Steele won't. He supports George Bush's policies," Mr. Cardin said.

DOJ_NMG_0089015

Mr. Curry said that Mr. Steele is a "good man with a good plan," and although he differs with some of Mr. Steele's views, he also differs with some of the Democratic Party's platform.

He said the lieutenant governor is "most responsive to the things that will make our futures brighter."

A G.O.P. Leader And Star Struggles For Traction (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

PITTSBURGH, Oct. 27 — There is no better snapshot of the brutal political climate facing many Republicans in these final days than this: Senator Rick Santorum, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate, stubbornly behind in the polls, warning with anger and growing frustration that voters should not — must not, for their own good — reject him for his Democratic opponent, Bob Casey, the state treasurer.

Assailing Mr. Casey's national security credentials, the Santorum campaign has run a television commercial that shows a mushroom cloud, missiles streaking through the air and the faces of North Korean, Iranian and terrorist leaders. It concludes, "We just can't take a chance on Bob Casey."

Mr. Santorum began the final stretch of his campaign with a series of speeches on "The Gathering Storm," offering a dark, Churchillian vision of the threats facing the United States — like the threats, he said, that faced England in the years leading up to World War II.

But Mr. Santorum all but acknowledges that the national security issues that proved such a fundamental strength for the Republicans in 2002 and 2004 are far riskier for his party this year.

"People ask me, 'Why are you giving a major foreign-policy address two weeks before your election? Don't you realize this war is not popular?' " he said Friday. But he plowed forward, to an audience of about 75 in a Holiday Inn in the western Pennsylvania city of Johnstown, one of several stops on his tour.

The political world has changed fundamentally for Mr. Santorum, who rode an anti-establishment wave into the Senate in 1994 but is now at risk of being swept out of office by a very different wave. He has spent millions, campaigned hard, attacked his Democratic opponent on every imaginable front, closing with what Democrats assert is "a campaign of fear and smear." But Mr. Santorum has remained consistently behind in the public polls.

He speaks of Mr. Casey with barely disguised disdain, as if he cannot imagine the possibility of losing to the Democrat who, he asserts, "is simply reading from the bullet points of Howard Dean."

[The latest Philadelphia Inquirer/Temple University poll, published Sunday, showed Mr. Santorum at 38 percent, 16 points behind Mr. Casey. Other polls have shown smaller leads for the Democrat, but G. Terry Madonna, who runs the Keystone Poll at Franklin & Marshall College in Lancaster, said, "The stability in this race is truly remarkable" in one respect: Mr. Santorum generally comes in at about 40 percent.]

Mr. Santorum's advisers blame the national climate for his difficulties; in a state like Pennsylvania, which often leans Democratic, the plummeting popularity of President Bush and the Republican-led Congress was bound to hit hard. In fact, several Republican House incumbents are also fighting for their political lives in Pennsylvania this year.

But Mr. Santorum's own personality and political style have also played a role, political strategists and analysts say. Over the past two years, he aggressively intervened in the right-to-die case of Terri Schiavo and jumped into debates on flashpoint issues like the Roman Catholic Church's sex abuse scandal and same-sex marriage. Along with his staunchly conservative voting record, that took a toll, reflected in what polls show as his continued difficulty among moderate suburbanites outside Philadelphia.

At the same time, a controversy over his residency — his family lives much of the year in Virginia — is widely blamed for his sagging support in the polls in western Pennsylvania, where he began his political career. He won a House seat in 1990 with a campaign that lambasted the Democratic incumbent for living in Virginia.

As he campaigned across western Pennsylvania, Mr. Santorum said he "absolutely" felt he had time to turn the race around, that voters would, in the end, recognize what he asserted was a clear gap in competence between him and Mr. Casey.

Mr. Brabender, who dismissed the public polls, said he believed that the Santorum campaign could be five or six points behind on Election Day and still win through their superior turnout operation.

Mr. Santorum opened new lines of attack in recent days, including one over Mr. Casey's management of state pension fund investments.

But Democrats can taste victory. At a Casey rally at the University of Pittsburgh Friday afternoon, college Democrats roared as Representative Mike Doyle, Democrat of Pennsylvania, declared, "In 11 days, we're going to change America!"

Mr. Casey proceeded to give a stump speech aimed squarely at the bread-and-butter issues of the middle class, like affordable health insurance, universal pre-school access, assistance for college tuition, and the general promise of "a new direction." He mocked Mr. Santorum as a rubber stamp for the Bush administration who had defended Mr. Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld instead of asking hard questions about the war in Iraq.

It was not a dazzling performance, but it was disciplined and firmly on message, and that is another explanation for Mr. Santorum's difficulties. From the beginning of this race, 20 months ago, the Democrats have run a careful, pragmatic campaign. Democratic leaders like Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, the chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, recruited Mr. Casey to run on the grounds that as an experienced statewide candidate, the son of a popular former governor, he was the strongest candidate the party could field.

From a strategic standpoint, Mr. Casey's conservatism on social issues — he opposes abortion rights — was expected to help the party with more traditional voters. In an interview, Mr. Casey, a Roman Catholic like Mr. Santorum, said he worked hard to signal that he wanted a conversation with "people of faith."

He spoke at Catholic University this fall over the objection of conservatives who did not want him invited there, met with evangelical Christians on global warming and closes his stump speech these days with a reflection that "your burdens can become your blessings."

"Too often Democrats have avoided talking about faith — the national party has had the perception, and sometimes it's a perception we've fostered or amplified — that people of faith are not part of a coalition we want to build," said Mr. Casey, a soft-spoken man, who often talks about the importance of his service as a Jesuit volunteer in an urban school. "But you can build bridges."

At the same time, the polls and the Democratic primary showed that Mr. Casey was holding his party's liberal base, even among those who disagree with him on abortion; opposition to Mr. Santorum proved a powerful unifying force among Democrats. And while the Santorum campaign raised more funds than the Casey campaign, the last fund-raising report showed Mr. Casey held a slim advantage in cash-on-hand for the final stretch.

Throughout the year, the Santorum campaign accused Mr. Casey of lacking ideas, ducking debates and failing to understand the nuances of foreign policy.

By the end of the campaign, an extraordinarily long campaign, by Senate standards, the personal animus between the two men was striking.

In a recent debate in Philadelphia, Mr. Santorum told voters: "I had to earn this job. It's not a job I inherited because of my last name."

Moments later, when reporters pressed Mr. Casey about the possibility of more debates, he shot back: "We've spent enough time together, the two of us. Let's go meet the voters. I'll see him at the finish line."

Hopscotch In New Jersey Senate Race (NYT)

By David W. Chen And Richard G. Jones

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

LODI, N.J., Oct. 30 — Thomas H. Kean Jr. began the last full week of his campaign for the United States Senate by getting on his knees to be blessed by Korean-American pastors in Cliffside Park on Monday. Hours later and just eight miles away in another Bergen County town, he mingled with Italian-American firefighters and community leaders at Lodi Hose Company 2.

A hundred miles south, Senator Robert Menendez attended two events in the Democratic stronghold of Camden County. On Tuesday morning, he planned to be back in the same area for a breakfast with veterans accompanied by former Senator Max Cleland of Georgia, a Vietnam veteran who lost his legs in the war.

With just eight days until the election, this is the time when candidates in New Jersey pack their schedules with appearances all over the state, often from dawn until the dinner hour. And with most polls showing Mr. Menendez, the Democratic incumbent, holding a slight lead over his Republican opponent, both he and Mr. Kean are frequently hurrying through their lengthening schedules by sticking to the same issues and repeating accusations.

But there is a purpose in the seemingly frantic game of hopscotch from Camden to Lodi or Somerset to Asbury Park hinting at the strategy shaping the final days of the campaign. And geography, not surprisingly, is a major factor.

"You need to focus on people who you are pretty sure are in your camp, but need a little push to make sure they go out and do it," said Peter J. Woolley, a political scientist at Fairleigh Dickinson University and the executive director of its Public Mind poll.

For Mr. Kean, that means a lot of time in such Republican strongholds as Morris County and some communities along the Jersey Shore as well as repeated forays to Bergen County, the state's wealthiest and most populous region, which is viewed as a battleground area.

Indeed, political consultants often say that no Republican can win without doing well in Bergen County. Last year, Gov. Jon S. Corzine, a Democrat, trounced his Republican opponent, Douglas R. Forrester, in the race for governor by a margin of 34,000 votes there and went on to win by a comfortable 9 percentage points.

For now, Mr. Kean is scheduled to campaign in Bergen County another half dozen times before Election Day next Tuesday, including several early morning appearances at train stations to greet commuters heading into New York.

In fact, Mr. Kean has been spending so much time in Bergen County that former Assemblyman Paul DiGaetano, who introduced Mr. Kean at the event here Monday afternoon, said jokingly, "I can't count the number of times he's been here."

For his part, Mr. Menendez plans to adhere to classic Democratic strategy by zeroing in on such urban areas as Camden, Essex and Hudson Counties, and appealing to ethnic minorities and organized labor, core party constituencies.

He also plans to rely heavily on out-of-state luminaries, with repeat appearances expected from Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and former President Bill Clinton, and a third appearance since June by the party's newest star, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois.

"My guess is that the campaigns are not looking at the undecideds at this point, because it's too risky and it takes up too much time," Mr. Woolley said.

A poll conducted last week by The New York Times and CBS News bears out the geographic differences. While the race over all shows Mr. Menendez ahead by 38 to 36 percentage points among registered voters, Mr. Menendez is doing better in the northeastern urban areas and Bergen and Passaic Counties, while Mr. Kean is leading in the northwestern part of the state, a region that historically votes Republican. In central and southern New Jersey — where the two northern New Jerseyans are not as well known — the candidates are running just about even.

This late in the campaign, a strategy of playing to one's strengths is not surprising. For instance, the Friday before the election last year, six of Mr. Corzine's eight public appearances were in Essex County. By contrast, Mr. Forrester's schedule one day in that final full week of stumping featured four appearances in Monmouth County, another in Morris County and two in Bergen County.

But there are also factors that make this year's race a bit different.

It is the first time since 2001 that a statewide race has not included at least one candidate named Corzine or Forrester who is largely paying for his own campaign. And because the race this year is so competitive and control of the Senate could be at stake, the national political parties are investing a great deal of money, with pledges of $7.5 million so far.

Buoyed by the prospect of sending someone to the Senate for the first time since 1972, New Jersey Republicans are working hard at employing the national party's "microtargeting" strategy: combing through voting and consumer database records to identify potential voters.

"From the cars we drive to the magazines we subscribe to, to whenever we enter a contest to win something — all of that is used to glean out particularly independent voters who might support our candidates," said Tom Wilson, the chairman of the state party. "This allows us not to allow stones unturned."

Still, Democrats have a strong advantage in the state. Of 4.86 million registered voters, according to figures released on Monday by Attorney General Stuart Rabner, 1.15 million are Democrats, 890,000 are Republicans, and the rest are unaffiliated.

As a result, Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who is chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said on Sunday that he was confident about Mr. Menendez's chances, and cited a recent Democratic poll reporting that his party's candidate held a 9 percentage point lead.

"We believe we're ahead in New Jersey by a significant amount," Mr. Schumer said. "Our goal is not to lose a blue state, and we believe we're on the road to achieving it."

Correction (NYT)

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

An editorial yesterday about the New Jersey Senate race incorrectly described the timing of donations to the campaign of Thomas Kean Jr. by executives of Horizon Blue Cross and Blue Shield of New Jersey. The checks were written for a fund-raiser for Mr. Kean that took place before the submission of legislation that maintained a tax exemption for the companies. Mr. Kean did not receive the money on the same day that he voted for that legislation. The reference was based on an article in The Star-Ledger of Newark that the newspaper subsequently corrected.

Hutchison Works To Keep GOP In Power (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, October 31, 2006

AMARILLO – For Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas is a line in the sand. The nightmare isn't so much that she'll lose her own re-election bid, it's that the ill national mood will flip control of Congress.

"It is a tough year. It is a tough year because times are tough. Because you've got boots on the ground," she says. "As Margaret Thatcher once said to George Bush 41, now is not the time to go wobbly."

No statewide candidate has ever collected as many votes as she did six years ago. Her bank account is 150 times bigger than her Democratic opponent's, and most analysts expect her to cruise to a third term.

Yet she is running hard, dashing across West Texas one day last week, exhorting Republicans in one city after another to get out and vote.

"This is a crucial election," she tells a rally that drew a few dozen supporters to a tractor dealership in Amarillo. Iraq is the key, she acknowledged through the day, saying it's dragging down the party and making the stakes that much higher on Nov. 7. "All of us want to leave, but the difference is whether we leave with our credibility intact and Iraq stable or just leave and hope the terrorists won't attack again."

It's a message meant to fire up Republican loyalists, though it also seemed to validate their anxieties. Sure, they'll keep the Texas seat, but what about the House and Senate?

'Worried'

"Well, I'm worried," says retired oil woman Betty Moore, 72, after the Amarillo speech. "I hope all Republicans get out and vote. That's all we can do is hope."

Four friendly venues are on the itinerary in Amarillo, Midland, San Angelo and Abilene.

DOJ_NMG_0089019

"We are not getting credit for the strength of this economy and that didn't happen by accident," Ms. Hutchison says in one way or another at each stop to crowds ranging from 40 to 100. "It is important to win decisively. That makes a difference. It makes a difference in Texas generally and your ability to speak with authority."

"She wants to cut and run from Iraq. I want to do the right thing and make sure we stabilize Iraq so it doesn't become a haven for terrorists," the senator says.

For months she kept mum as the Democrat taunted her, calling Ms. Hutchison an "aging prom queen" and a Bush "puppet."

"She's been poking a stick at me," the senator says. "I have not responded to her during the year because that's what she wanted."

But now, with voters paying attention, the senator is striking back. She calls her opponent desperate and ill-tempered and the name-calling "cheap shots."

On the way to Midland, an aide hands her a faxed copy of a Kerrville Daily Times story. Kinky Friedman voted for her. "She is not without charms," the independent candidate for governor told the paper.

She laughs: "He's so open, that he said that."

They had met last Sunday at Love Field, the crossroads of all statewide campaigns. She'll write a thank-you, but her ballot will go to Gov. Rick Perry, her fellow Republican, whom she had thought about challenging instead of running for re-election.

As it happens, the senator will be in Kerrville herself on Friday, during a two-day bus tour from Seguin to Weatherford.

"I love campaigning," she says. "If I were not doing this then I don't think that I would have the great grass-roots support that I do."

"This is a tough year," she tells them. "It really is crucial that our vote turns out. ... If the Democrats take control, you'll see a lot of gridlock. You'll see a lot of efforts to appease the terrorists."

Billie Ross has run Hutchison campaigns around here for years and would happily have helped her run for governor.

"I know she wants to," Ms. Ross says.

U.S. Rep. Mike Conaway, R-Midland, is on hand, too. Last month, he called the senator "stronger than a jalapeno." Today she's the "most beloved statesman" Texas has produced in a generation.

"I'm hoping to ride her coattails on Election Day," he says – a joke, given that he's running unopposed.

Midland Mayor Michael Canon says he won't be surprised if she pulls 85 or 90 percent of the vote. "She produces results for us. And I don't think she singles out West Texas as somebody she's particularly inclined toward helping," he says.

Could she continue to do so even if the Republican grip on Congress loosens? "One way or the other I think she'll still be extremely effective. ... She can cross the aisle and do so with grace and eloquence and effectiveness that only she can do," he says.

Wrong number

Wheels down in San Angelo after a short but bumpy flight. One of the senator's two BlackBerries starts ringing. She leans into the window for better reception as the plane taxis.

"Hello? I think you have the wrong number." She laughs. She never gives out this number.

What she does give out whenever possible are federal dollars. She paints herself as a senator who takes care of Texas, though her opponent says she doesn't secure nearly enough to justify the claim.

In Amarillo, she talks up farm policy. In Midland, it is support for a local nuclear project and a highway to link Mexico with the Midwest. In San Angelo, she touts her support for Goodfellow Air Force Base and its new foreign language training center, plus the time she escorted the librarian of Congress to town and announced a $200,000 grant for the Tom Green County library.

Incumbency has its advantages.

"This is as important an election as we have faced in our lifetime," she tells the 40 or so people gathered for her speech at headquarters of Town & Country convenience stores, in a lunchroom with a free soda fountain.

The choice, she says, is between lower taxes and a resolute approach to Iraq, or higher taxes and appeasement of terrorists.

At the final stop in Abilene, a hundred or so folks are gathered on the courthouse lawn, with country music and free hotdogs. Even Rick Perry's parents are on hand, and the senator chats amiably with them on her way out.

"This is a crucial election," she tells the crowd. "It's an election that's going to decide a lot about what we do in Texas, what we do in the United States. ... People have said that conservatives are going to stay home. We cannot let that happen. We need to make sure that we keep control of Congress."

If West Texans had their way, that wouldn't be a problem. But there are forces beyond their control.

"I'm concerned," says Curtis Tomme, the Taylor County GOP chairman and an assistant district attorney in Abilene. "The polls are all over the place. It's going to be close."

Back on the plane, Ms. Hutchison ticks off the dire consequences of a Democratic takeover. The Bush tax cuts are at risk. The nation's credibility would be shredded by a premature withdrawal from Iraq. There'd be little hope of rescuing Social Security or reforming immigration laws.

"We would be on defense," she says. "You saw gridlock the last year. I think that's what you'll see for the next two years."

CLINTON: 12 MORE YEARS (NYPOST)

The New York Post, October 30, 2006

October 30, 2006 -- The Post today also endorses Hillary Rodham Clinton for re-election to the United States Senate.

Surprised?

Well, so are we - a little.

Clinton has an insurmountable lead in the polls. She's worked hard the last six years, and it shows.

He's a down-to-earth, if not earthy, fellow who once served Yonkers well as mayor and who now appears to be running for another term in that office.

If so, we endorse him - for mayor.

As for Mrs. Clinton, well, she's been a pretty good senator - popular with her colleagues and as productive as a first-term legislator from the minority party probably can be.

Think of her as Sen. Pothole Redux (apologies to Alfonse D'Amato).

Meanwhile, her positions on numerous issues - particularly involving national security - have been much closer to the political center than we would have expected.

That's not to say that some of her positions haven't already begun "evolving" toward the Democrats' party line - especially on Iraq, where she has slowly, but surely, begun inching her way over to the "Bush lied" crowd.

For now, however, the fact remains that she has been, to repeat, a pretty good senator.

But what about the question of the hour?

What about the White House?

Well, New Yorkers simply expect their major officeholders to be presidential aspirants - and the pols always rise to the bait (occasionally delivering ludicrous results; has anyone seen George Pataki in New York lately?).

So Hillary's caught the bug.

So what?

But we think she's done such a good job these last six years that she'd do well to serve six more. If not 12.

Re-elect Hillary.

In 2012.

Campaign Gone South (WP)

By Libby Copeland

BARTOW, Fla.

Katherine Harris, who is trying to become a U.S. senator, says she is writing a tell-all about the many people who have wronged her. This includes, but is not necessarily limited to: the Republican leaders who didn't want her to run, the press that has covered her troubled campaign, and the many staffers who have quit her employ, whom she accuses of colluding with her opponent.

She is vague about what, precisely, makes her a victim, but she says she has it all documented.

"I've been writing it all year," she says in that kittenish voice. She often smiles and cocks her head as if she's letting you in on a secret. "It's going to be a great book."

If it is, it may be one of very few things that go well for the two-term Republican congresswoman. Once beloved by the Republican leadership for her role in overseeing the 2000 recount that delivered the presidency to George Bush, Harris was snubbed by those old friends before the primary. Republican chieftains, considering her too polarizing to win a statewide race, tried to recruit others, and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) said publicly that she could not win. Fundraising has been poor. She has come under scrutiny for her role in a bribery scandal. She has caught flak for a series of bizarre statements, including a comment in August: "If you're not electing Christians, then in essence you are going to legislate sin."

The Democrat she is challenging, Sen. Bill Nelson, was once considered highly vulnerable. Nowadays, according to recent polls, Harris is down by 26 or 35 points, approaching political rigor mortis.

"The only way Bill Nelson could lose this," says Darryl Paulson, a political scientist (and Republican) at the University of South Florida, "is if he got himself in a drug-induced stupor and ran naked down the main street of his home town."

"They can make the polls say whatever they want," Harris says. She says pollsters sometimes call her house and then hang up " 'cause we're not answering them the way they like."

The way Harris sees it, a vast left- and right-wing conspiracy, encompassing both the "liberal media" and the Republican "elite," is attempting to keep her out of the Senate. She says anyone could see the way the panel of questioners coddled Nelson at their debate last week. Her voice gets all high and mocking as she imitates them.

" Ooooh, Senator Nelson," she says. "I mean, come on."

Perhaps the worst blow to Harris's campaign has been the stories that have emerged from former staffers. They describe a Jekyll-and-Hyde candidate who can be seductively charming at one moment and pitch a temper tantrum the next, throwing a cellphone at a wall or a sheaf of papers at a campaign manager. Former chief adviser Ed Rollins, who managed Ronald Reagan's reelection to the White House in 1984, said working for Harris was like "being in insanity camp." He likened her staff to dogs that have been kicked.

Before he became the first of three campaign managers to quit, Jim Dornan programmed his cellphone to play the theme song from "The Exorcist" when Harris called.

In a recent campaign visit to Bartow, her home town in central Florida, there is little hint of the Hyde side. The 49-year-old Harris beams, dispensing hugs and telling stories about her late "daddy," the wealthy owner of a local bank chain. She is tiny and wears a fitted suit jacket the color of key lime pie. For old times' sake, she visits a livestock arena where her cousins used to show their cows. She shrieks with joy upon seeing an old friend, Bill Braswell.

"Billy and I grew up together," she says. They reminisce about an old haunt and an old boyfriend of hers. "That was, like, the first place Gary and I ever kissed," she tells him.

Here in Bartow, Harris appears to be adored. She is remembered for her days in 4-H, for her stint as Miss Polk Agriculture at age 16, and for her competitive tennis game.

"Daddy used to say not to come home if I didn't win my tennis matches [against] boys," she tells Braswell.

Nelson may have endorsements from 22 papers, including all the major dailies in the state, but Harris has an endorsement from a small collection of community newspapers (total circulation: 8,307) here in Polk, her home county. The endorsement was written by the papers' publisher, S.L. Frisbie IV, who has known Harris since she was a Girl Scout.

"Clearly she has difficulty maintaining a staff," Frisbie says. "I haven't the slightest idea why. . . . She is a charming person."

During an interview in the livestock arena, amid the ghosts of her cousins' cows, Harris talks about two of her greatest passions: art and Israel. She has made several trips to Israel, and it was on the first, in 1992, that her camera broke and she was forced to sketch her way across the country. These days, during meetings on Capitol Hill, she sometimes sketches when she's taking notes. She says she has drawn Alan Greenspan and Donald Rumsfeld.

After Harris's quote about the importance of electing Christians was published in a Baptist publication, her campaign went into damage control, issuing a press release discussing Harris's love for Israel and explaining that while she was speaking to a Christian audience, she really meant that "people of faith" should be involved in government.

Harris does love talking about Israel. She's proud that Israelis sometimes assume she's one of them and talk to her in Hebrew. She is a Christian but has called herself a "wannabe" Jew. During the bitterly contested recount in 2000, which she oversaw as Florida's secretary of state, she compared herself to the Biblical character Queen Esther, who risked her life to save the Jews.

She says that when her husband of 10 years, wealthy Swedish businessman Anders Ebbeson, asked her to marry him, she first extracted a promise that they could live in the Holy Land one day. She doesn't know why she's always been so fascinated by the country.

"I can remember riding my bike to piano lessons and thinking about Israel," she says. "I thought I was adopted for a while."

Harris's public spats with Republican leaders and her own former staffers -- shorn of the niceties of political etiquette that typically surround such things -- have played out in the Florida newspapers like the autopsy of a political campaign. The skin is peeled back and everyone can see inside.

Several of her former staffers say they would have kept silent about goings-on in the Harris campaign if Harris herself had not publicly criticized them after they left, accusing them of being bad at their jobs, of putting "knives in my back" and of working with the Nelson campaign. They describe her as a micromanager, unable to trust her staff, prone to tears and rages over tiny things. They say she would rewrite speeches and press releases over and over. She would get upset if an aide hadn't brought her the correct coffee order from Starbucks. Dornan, the former campaign manager, says Harris was so concerned that only the best photographs of her went up on the campaign Web site that she insisted on going through every picture.

"It would be weeks and weeks and weeks before we could put anything up on the Web site," he says.

Dornan says he once infuriated Harris right before an event by setting it up so she could make a grand entrance. Instead, she wanted to greet supporters at the door as they arrived.

"She just goes completely ballistic," Dornan recalls. He says she yelled at him for 10 minutes and accused him of ruining her life. "I literally held the phone away from my ear, and everybody within a six-foot circle of me could hear her screaming."

Harris's former staffers say they worried about her health, especially after the death of her father earlier this year and the news that she was implicated in a bribery scandal with a federal contractor named Mitchell Wade, who had pleaded guilty to bribing former congressman Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.). (Wade admitted funneling $32,000 in illegal donations to Harris, but Harris has said she didn't realize the contributions were illegal and ultimately gave the money to charity.)

They worried about her clothes -- suit jackets and sweaters that were too tight, skirts that were too short. Rollins says an aide was dispatched to take her shopping for more senatorial apparel.

They worried about what one former field coordinator called her sense of "religious mission." Two former staffers -- Rollins and another onetime campaign manager, Jamie Miller -- have said Harris told them that God wanted her to be a senator. Rollins adds, "She told me that she thought she could be the first woman president."

Sitting in the livestock arena, Harris laughs at the notion she'd ever want to be president. In the past she told the Palm Beach Post that she was complimentary of those staffers who performed well, but had problems with those who would "try to undermine" her. Now, she sidesteps the question of why she had problems with staff.

"It's going to be easily explained in my book," she says. "We have a great staff now."

The Harris campaign has suffered a series of embarrassing gaffes. According to one Florida paper, her Web site listed endorsements from people who hadn't endorsed her. According to another paper, her campaign organized a rally in an airport hangar, but none of the nine officials named on her flier showed up.

In the spring, Harris announced on television she was putting $10 million of her inheritance from her father into the race. Later, she said it turned out the inheritance would not be available, so she'd put in her own money. Thus far, she has put in approximately $3.2 million, which is, she says, "everything that I have liquid."

Meanwhile, according to a financial disclosure report, her campaign has less than $1 million left. Nelson's campaign has nearly $7 million. Nelson has run seven ads since the primaries in September. Harris has aired only one and it started yesterday, according to campaign spokeswoman Jennifer Marks.

Harris turns stony when she's asked what will happen if she doesn't win.

"Haven't even considered it," she says in a tone that suggests a follow-up question would be foolhardy.

Later in the evening, while talking about her love for Queen Esther, she runs to the passenger seat of her SUV and seizes a Bible.

"I'll give you one verse," she says. "On the day that the enemies of the Jews had hoped to overpower them, the opposite occurred, in that the Jews themselves overpowered those who hated them."

What does that have to do with this race?

"November 7th," she replies.

Democrats Are Seen To Gain In Statehouse Races (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

DES MOINES, Oct. 27 — More than 6,000 state legislative seats in 46 states are on the Nov. 7 ballot, and like the seismic state elections in 1994 and 1974 the cumulative impact of the outcomes could be immense, with Democrats possibly gaining control of a majority of state capitols for the first time in a decade.

While the nation's attention has been fixed on the question of which party will control Congress, another campaign season has been unfolding in the shadows — upstaged and overlooked but more likely to affect the day-to-day life of voters than the big-money Congressional races.

Most significantly, the groundwork for redrawing Congressional districts after the 2010 census will be done under the 50 capitol domes, and the party in power will set the table for those discussions in ways favorable to its interests. Gains made this year, analysts say, will help give incumbents a leg up in the final elections leading up to the redistricting.

If the Democrats take control of a majority of the legislatures, which polls indicate could happen, women could also attain leadership positions in greater numbers, since Democratic women in state capitals outnumber Republican women by nearly two to one. The next generation of national political leaders, by tradition, is nurtured in the state legislatures.

"This is a national election with big issues," said Alan Rosenthal, a professor of political science at Rutgers University who tracks state election issues, "and that will filter down to the people who nobody knows about."

One indication of both parties' interest in the local races is the money that has been flowing into them.

The Democratic Legislative Campaign Committee plans to spend $9 million to $10 million on legislative races, up from $6 million to $7 million in 2004. Its counterpart, the Republican State Leadership Committee, has nearly doubled spending on state races, including for legislators, to $20 million.

Republicans control both chambers in 20 states, Democrats in 19. One state, Nebraska, has a nonpartisan legislature, while the parties split control in the remaining 10 states. States to watch on Election Day include Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee and Wisconsin, where Republicans have narrow majorities in the lower house or senate. Democrats have narrow majorities in Colorado, Maine and Montana.

What makes the races even more suspenseful is that the parties have not been so even in decades, if ever. Of the 7,382 statehouse legislative seats across the country, Democrats hold 21 more than the Republicans, a margin of less than half a percent.

In 17 of the 46 states that will elect some or all of their state senators, a shift of only three seats would alter party control in the senate, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. In 12 state houses, a shift of five or fewer seats would tip the balance.

Some states, like Montana and Colorado, where Democrats gained narrow legislative control for the first time in decades in 2004, are being watched by some political scientists and party leaders as barometers of the party's Western strategy. Other states with closely divided legislatures, including Michigan, Nevada and Tennessee, could be swung by fierce contests for governor or the United States Senate.

Connecticut and New Jersey, where Democrats control both chambers of the legislature, and New York, where the parties each control a chamber, are not widely expected to see shifts in power. "We seem to be in this era of hyper-evenness of the parties at the grass-roots legislative level," said Tim Storey, a senior fellow at the National Conference of State Legislatures.

Presidential hopefuls have also poured several hundred thousand dollars into legislative races in Nevada in anticipation of the early presidential caucus there in 2008. In Michigan, a new group sprang up this year, the Michigan Coalition for Progress, to help defeat Republicans in the legislature.

And then there is Iowa, where the hyper-evenness is most hyper of all. Republicans have a one-vote advantage in the Iowa House, 51 to 49, and the parties are tied at 25 in the Senate.

Noticing these whisker-width margins, prospective presidential candidates, including Gov. George E. Pataki of New York and Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, have donated money to local campaigns, hoping perhaps to make friends before the Iowa Caucuses in 2008.

Mr. Pataki's political action committee has donated $270,000 to Iowa Republicans, Mr. Romney's PAC almost $1.6 million, according to the Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board. Independent political groups, called 527s, have waded in as well to influence or swing the vote.

But the money and the high stakes, many people here say, may be having another effect in Des Moines and many other state capitals. State legislative races, with their low-glamour blend of amateur politics and homespun local concerns, may be losing their traditions of civility.

"You have more money sloshing around," said Peverill Squire, a professor of political science at the University of Iowa who follows legislative races. More and more, Professor Squire said, control over local campaigns is slipping toward centralized parties or interest groups. "And it is certainly a much rougher campaign than we are used to seeing in Iowa," he said.

Just ask Kevin R. Wiskus.

Mr. Wiskus is a 42-year-old Iowa farmer and lifelong Republican from the town of Centerville, about 100 miles south of the capital, who is making his first run for public office for a House seat.

He became so outraged by his own party's efforts to elect him that he resigned last month in protest.

A mailing sent by the state committee told voters that Mr. Wiskus's Democratic opponent, a lawyer named Kurt Swaim, had defended a man charged with child molesting.

Mr. Wiskus knew that Mr. Swaim had been assigned the case by the court as a public defender, and decided the attack was unconscionable. He is now an independent, and said he would serve as an independent if elected.

"I was offended," Mr. Wiskus said in an interview. "I had promised and pledged to run a clean and ethical and honorable race, and I told the Republican party I did not want any attack ads."

The speaker of the Iowa House of Representatives, Christopher Rants, a Republican who has marshaled the party's efforts in the legislative races, said he thought the Democrats had done more than his party to coarsen the debate in Iowa with negative advertising.

One mailing about a Republican, Mr. Rants said, showed a cadaver under a sheet and suggested that the candidate's opposition to stem-cell research was responsible for the woman's death. Democrats and some independent scholars, including Professor Squire, say the Republicans have probably pushed the line harder and farther.

Whether the Republicans can hold onto the gains in state legislatures that they made beginning in the 1980s is probably the central question of the election.

The Democrats, for most of the 20th century, were statehouse titans all over the nation — with a peak in the mid-1970s when they controlled close to 70 percent of all legislative seats. In the post-Watergate election of November 1974, they added 628 legislature seats in just one night.

DOJ_NMG_0089025

The Republicans began a surge in the 1980s, making major strides in 1994, when they gained 514 seats overnight. They finally gained dominance in 2002, picking up enough seats to surpass the Democrats for the first time in 50 years. There has been almost perfect parity since then.

Nev. Congressman Assault Probe Reopens (AP)

By Ryan Nakashima

AP, October 30, 2006

The district attorney said Monday that authorities have reopened their investigation into a cocktail waitress' claim that a Republican congressman running for governor assaulted her in a parking garage after a night of drinking.

District Attorney David Roger said the case involving Rep. Jim Gibbons — which had been closed after the woman, Chrissy Mazzeo, dropped her complaint — is under investigation again.

Mazzeo, a Las Vegas Strip casino waitress, accused Gibbons, 61, of pushing her up against a wall Oct. 13 and propositioning her. Mazzeo, 32, said she had been pressured and offered cash from people linked to the Gibbons campaign to drop the complaint.

The five-term congressman, who is in a close race with Democratic state Sen. Dina Titus for Nevada's open governor's seat, has denied wrongdoing and sued Monday to force police to release surveillance videos he said would disprove Mazzeo's claim.

A judge set an emergency hearing for Tuesday.

Mazzeo's lawyer, Richard Wright, did not immediately return phone calls seeking comment. He told the Las Vegas Review-Journal that his client will press charges after all.

Gibbons, in statements to police and at a news conference with his wife earlier this month, said he walked Mazzeo to the garage, caught her when she tripped and walked away.

"A true record of the tape's recording will demonstrate that I was never in that parking garage on that evening," he said in the lawsuit.

Police previously said surveillance cameras in the garage weren't working. A property management company for the garage, however, said it turned hours of tapes over to authorities.

The police department said in a news release Monday that it would not comment until a judge ruled on the matter.

Gibbons led Titus 47 percent to 41 percent in a poll released Friday. Most of the polling took place after the allegations were reported but before Mazzeo held a news conference Oct. 25 to recount her version of the events. The poll conducted by Washington-based Research 2000 for the Reno Gazette-Journal and KRNV-TV had a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

A Politician Who Thinks Like A Linebacker (WP)

By Donna St. George

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

The governor had dropped by to teach a rhetoric class. It was mere weeks before Election Day, and Bob Ehrlich held forth in a small auditorium at Towson University, sleeves rolled up and a microphone in hand.

He asked the students to imagine themselves as political consultants. Their hypothetical candidate was a Republican governor. "Very handsome, by the way," he joked, flashing a smile. "Two beautiful children. Beautiful wife."

But there were problems, Ehrlich admitted: The state tilts heavily Democratic. The governor has been fighting with the legislature. Newspaper editors are not always in his corner. "When you are an incumbent," he added, "the election is generally about you ."

After 20 years of pulling out victories at the ballot box -- young and on the rise in the state House and in Congress before his election as governor at age 44 -- Ehrlich is now trailing his opponent, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D), in an array of polls.

But Ehrlich has come from behind before. This is the 16th contest of his political career. He has never lost.

DOJ_NMG_0089026

If he clinches it, his political profile will change markedly, said Matthew Crenson, a political science professor at Johns Hopkins University. As a two-time Republican victor in a predominantly Democratic state, "he will emerge as a figure in national Republican politics," Crenson said.

If Ehrlich loses, he will be thrust out of elective office for the first time since he was 28.

How it turns out will depend, in part, on how voters view Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. -- a college linebacker-turned-lawyer who rose from working-class roots to make history in 2002 as the first Republican governor in Maryland in more than a generation.

Even many of his critics say the 48-year-old governor is likable -- affable and unpretentious, the kind of guy who slaps backs, cracks jokes, talks sports. He has a strong streak of the Everyman.

But they also say the competitive edge that has helped him win football games and political campaigns has sometimes worked against him during his four years as governor.

"To understand Bob, you have to go back to his days of playing sandlot football," said D. Bruce Poole, a Democratic friend and former House majority leader who supports Ehrlich. "He is competitive. He's a linebacker in mentality. He has always been able to take a hit and return it with that much more."Emerging as the Republican Voice

It was another weekend on the campaign trail, and Bob Ehrlich was headed to a corn roast in Reisterstown. The rain had stopped, finally. He made his entrance behind a goat named Tootsie who was wearing an Ehrlich sticker on her hindquarters.

The crowd parted and cheered, opening the way for the telegenic governor, who pumped hands and patted backs all the way to a makeshift stage. There, inside a hay barn, one of the hosts introduced him as "the best governor Maryland has ever had."

Square-jawed and lean, in a red polo shirt, Ehrlich smiled broadly as he looked out on the crowd of 300. This was a fundraiser in the county where Ehrlich started his political life.

With both hands in the air -- his gestures large and emphatic, his wife beaming beside him -- he made a few jokes, then narrowed in: The Democrats are the problem, he said, especially House Speaker Michael E. Busch (Anne Arundel) and Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (Calvert).

"Raise your hand if you want Mike Miller and Mike Busch to run Maryland politics for the next four years," he boomed.

"Booooo!" the crowd shouted. "Boooo!"

Just five more Republicans in the state Senate, he said, could change the legislature. "I need five new senators to stop Mike Miller from running over you for four years," he thundered.

The idea of greatly increasing the Republican presence in either body is a long shot, but Ehrlich has clearly emerged as the state party's voice. The governor has made other Republicans feel relevant politically, said Del. Anthony J. O'Donnell (R-Calvert). Before, he added, "we were reduced to rhetorical bomb-throwing. . . . We were ignored."

The corn roast went so well that Ehrlich skipped the next event -- his wife went in his place -- and posed for photographs, smile after smile after still-perfect smile, until it seemed that few people had been missed.

This was Bob Ehrlich in his home base in Baltimore County -- among political kin, a few of them from far enough back to remember how he started out.

The son of a car salesman, Ehrlich grew up as an only child in a rowhouse in Arbutus in Baltimore County. With a gift for athletics -- and the help of his father's boss -- he landed a scholarship to the exclusive Gilman prep school in Baltimore.

It was a world unlike his own, and Ehrlich remembers having "a chip on my shoulder" at first. But he became a standout athlete, playing three sports, and with the help of the headmaster went on to Princeton, where he was a linebacker and team co-captain.

Ehrlich turned to politics in 1986, after law school at Wake Forest University. He had practiced three years, in a silk-stocking law firm in Baltimore -- Ober, Kaler, Grimes & Shriver -- when he decided to make a run for the state House.

Few thought he could win. But he did. Twice.

Those years, he said recently, were "the happiest of my life."

Several senior Democrats brought him along. "They taught me how to be a legislator," he recalled. "They made me part of the group. They let me in the backroom. They had me handle bills on the floor, which was very rare for Republicans."

The political mood had shifted when Ehrlich was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives. He won in 1994, during the heady days of Newt Gingrich's Republican revolution. For the first time, he was part of the majority.

But when he returned to Annapolis as governor, he was a Republican in a Democratic state -- in a more partisan atmosphere. Although he tried to forge relationships with lawmakers over basketball games and evenings watching sports at the governor's mansion, he said, it did not work.

On issues such as slot machines and medical malpractice, he did not find enough allies.

"Coming back, I mistakenly thought I could go home again -- and you cannot," he reflected in an interview. "It was the biggest surprise of my four years, the biggest disappointment."A Candidate Who Hates to Lose

His morning coffee is iced. It is 9:30 on a rainy Friday, still early for Ehrlich, an admitted night owl who usually doesn't go to sleep until 2 to 3 a.m. Today he started earlier than usual, making football picks on "The Junkies," a popular morning radio show on WJFK (106.7 FM). He has two more losses than wins for the season, but he defends his record. "It's not just the winners; it's the point spreads," he says. "It's easy to pick winners. This is a science."

The athletics that so defined Ehrlich in his youth are still part of his adult life. He reaches for sports metaphors in his speech; he asks about game scores on the campaign trail. For much of his term, he has played golf frequently, even improving his handicap from 10.6 to 8.3. But his aides say he has been too busy to hit the links during the past year.

For nearly four years, Ehrlich has lived in the 54-room governor's mansion in Annapolis with his wife, Kendel, a lawyer and cable television host, and sons, Drew, 7, and Josh, 2. Toys are piled near a side door. Halloween decorations are everywhere, including a giant inflatable pumpkin in the landscaped yard.

"I really like the job," he said. "Politics? I think we're pretty good at it. But it's not my favorite part of this process. My favorite part is clearly getting in front of crowds and making my case."

He talks about how much he enjoyed his two televised debates against O'Malley. "I like to compete," he says. He came to the debate armed with numbers, which he ticked off methodically. He tried to strike a tone of candor, and at one point answered his opponent with: "I don't know what all of that means, I gotta tell you."

His hard-nosed determination shows up even in small ways, friends say. On Capitol Hill, one lawmaker recalls, congressmen sometimes played games of matching quarters -- heads or tails -- during idle time in the cloakroom. Ehrlich "hated to lose, even if it was 25 cents," chuckled Rep. Howard Coble (R-N.C.), a friend who recalls teasing him about it.

But Ehrlich's quest to win, his critics say, has hindered his ability to get programs passed. When he was elected, Ehrlich promised to work with lawmakers beyond party lines. He started by making bipartisan Cabinet appointments; about 40 percent of his Cabinet secretaries have been Democrats.

Still, the governor has often locked into battle with legislators.

Ehrlich had vowed to bring legalized slots to Maryland. After four efforts, there are still no slots. Twice, Ehrlich called special legislative sessions only to veto the bills they produced. On more than 20 issues -- including minimum wage, health benefits at Wal-Mart and election law changes -- the legislature overrode his vetoes.

House Speaker Busch, a close friend when they both served in the state House, has clashed with him often. Ehrlich "ran for office as a consensus builder and compromiser, but he did not govern that way," Busch argued. If he had, he said, "I think he would be a much more formidable candidate today."

John Kane, chairman of the state Republican Party, said that the real problem was the liberal wing of the Democratic Party, which often blocked Ehrlich's proposals. "They like monopoly," Kane said.

Senate President Miller said the governor should have worked harder at gaining the support of lawmakers and learning the details of policies and proposals. He called Ehrlich "a ribbon-cutter, a golfer, a show horse."

"I see an absence of work ethic on his part, and it's frustrating," he said.

Last year, one of Ehrlich's aides, Joseph Steffen, dubbed "the Prince of Darkness," was fired after boasting on the Internet that he had orchestrated a whisper campaign about O'Malley's private life. Ehrlich said he had nothing to do with the incident, which he now waves off as overblown.

Old foes are skeptical. In a 1996 campaign for U.S. Congress, a leaflet was circulated describing Ehrlich's opponent as a "homewrecker" while calling Ehrlich "a family man in the truest sense of the word." Ehrlich has denied any dirty campaigning. But Connie DeJuliis, the opponent, said he did not deny involvement when she confronted him at the time.

"You cross the line when you attack people personally, and that's what Bob Ehrlich does," DeJuliis said. "It's not supposed to be winning at all costs."'Never Answer a General Question'

At Towson University, Ehrlich shifted from talking political strategy and addressed the class directly.

"Raise your hand if you're pro-choice on abortion," he said.

Hands shot up.

"Raise your hand if you're pro-life," he went on.

More hands.

"Never answer that question!" he boomed. "You're all wrong."

"I didn't define any terms," he said. "I didn't ask how you felt about partial birth abortion or judicial bypass or parental consent or Medicaid funding or stem cell embryonic research."

The students listened closely.

He tried again. "Who's against capital punishment?"

Ehrlich surveyed the room: No hands.

A moderate Republican, Ehrlich carefully parses his positions on many issues. He supports abortion rights, for example, but with limits: no partial birth abortions, no federal funding. He runs conservative on fiscal issues but has supported new taxes or fees on vehicle registration, sewage and property. He favors the death penalty but has granted many pardons and commutations.

Ehrlich has learned to be wary of labels.

"Make your questioner define the terms," he told the Towson students. "And once you do, guess what? You can give opinions for the rest of the day, but you can give opinions as a result of what you actually believe and not the territory the questioner wanted to capture you in."

Precisely how all of this will play on Election Day is the great unknown. A poll published Sunday by The Washington Post showed a majority of likely voters in Maryland thought that Ehrlich had done a good job as governor. Even so, he lagged 10 percentage points behind O'Malley, which analysts say reflects a national climate that is tough on Republicans.

Ehrlich's aides say the poll is at odds with their results -- and, in an interview, the governor said he has seen many signs of Election-Day promise on the campaign trail.

"If you're not an optimist," he told the class in Towson, "this is probably not your profession."

GOVERNOR'S BAN ON STAFF PERKS ISN'T PERFECT (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

Sacramento — After allowing his staff to accept tens of thousands of dollars' worth of gifts from business interests, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is now worried about the appearance of a conflict of interest and has barred them from taking even a free cup of coffee.

But the policy, stricter than state law, hasn't stopped the perks.

Schwarzenegger aides over the last year have been given free tickets to Disneyland and San Francisco Giants baseball games; to Rolling Stones concerts and Sacramento Kings basketball games.

DOJ_NMG_0089029

Schwarzenegger's chief of staff, Susan Kennedy, sent a memo to the governor's aides in August explaining that by taking gifts, even if the law allows it, they could create a public perception that they have been compromised.

In a separate letter to Schwarzenegger's staff, his legal counsel, Andrea Hoch, said aides could not attend any of the governor's campaign fundraising events unless they paid for their food and drink.

But the Spartan ethic comes with loopholes. Kennedy is scheduled to join lawmakers and state officials on a 12-day trip to South America next month that is sponsored by a tax-exempt group financed partly by energy companies and other businesses that lobby in Sacramento.

The visitors plan to stay at a hotel in Buenos Aires that is rated by one travel guide as "the most exclusive" in the city. A spokesman for Schwarzenegger said the trip doesn't violate the gift policy because Kennedy will deliver a speech as the governor's representative.

"It is important that Susan, as chief of staff, work with members and important policy leaders to further the goals of the administration," said Adam Mendelsohn, Schwarzenegger's communications director.

The new rules are an about-face for the governor, who in past years has taken a permissive approach to freebies.

In 2004, after The Times reported that dozens of Schwarzenegger administration officials had accepted free meals and sports tickets, the governor said in an interview: "Those are things that I don't think anyone has to worry about. There's no one selling out in my administration."

• Ameriquest Capital Corp., parent of the mortgage-lending company, spent more than $5,600 on Rolling Stones concert tickets over the last year for nearly two dozen members of the governor's staff and their spouses.

Ameriquest reported having lobbied Schwarzenegger's office this year on lending issues and a legal settlement. In March, California officials reached a multimillion-dollar settlement with the company over allegations that it had misled borrowers, among other things.

• Walt Disney Co. has given Disneyland tickets, parking passes and other gifts valued at $1,189 to six Schwarzenegger aides since early last year. One recipient was Richard Costigan, a senior aide who pushes the governor's agenda through the Legislature and advises him on which bills to sign or veto.

• AT&T last year gave $1,264 worth of San Francisco Giants tickets to six Schwarzenegger aides who went to a game together. The telecommunications company also gave $385 worth of tickets and refreshments to two Schwarzenegger aides who attended an Eagles concert one year ago. One was Cynthia Bryant, who also works on the governor's legislative agenda.

• The California Chamber of Commerce, the state's most influential business lobbyist, spent more than $5,800 this year and last treating dozens of Schwarzenegger administration aides at receptions, lunches and dinners. A party for outgoing Chief of Staff Patricia Clarey was held at the chamber's headquarters in Sacramento in January and was attended by more than 45 of the governor's aides.

State law allows public officials to accept gifts worth up to $360 a year from any one source. Under Schwarzenegger's new policy, aides are forbidden to accept tickets, meals, entertainment or loans from anyone doing business with the state, or any group lobbying for passage or defeat of legislation.

Kennedy's memo on the matter said the public might "perceive acceptance of gifts as creating a conflict of interest."

Asked what prompted the change, Mendelsohn said: "The administration has had new staff members come on recently. And often with new staff members, and new leadership, you'll find changes and important additional steps taken that were not put in place originally."

Kennedy's trip is courtesy of a tax-exempt group in San Francisco called the California Foundation on the Environment and the Economy. Her domestic partner also will go, paying her own expenses.

The itinerary includes a stay at the Alvear Palace Hotel in Buenos Aires, where room prices range from $550 to $4,500 a night, according to a state official familiar with the trip.

A Frommer's travel guide describes the hotel as a "a gilded, classical confection full of marble and bronze" with a guest list that has included "names like Antonio Banderas, Donatella Versace, the emperor of Japan and Robert Duvall."

Other stops are to include Santiago, Chile; Rio de Janeiro; and Bariloche, a popular tourist spot in Argentina.

The trip's purpose is to study technologies aimed at reducing global warming, said Patrick Mason, president of the foundation. He would not reveal who is going, citing security concerns.

He sent an e-mail to participants this week asking that they not speak to The Times about the trip. The e-mail, which was obtained by the newspaper, was sent to officials at Chevron, Southern California Edison, the environmental group the National Resources Defense Council, and to some Schwarzenegger administration officials, among others.

Two companies that said they were planning to attend maintain a lobbying presence in Sacramento: Sempra Energy and the cable giant Comcast. Sempra owns San Diego Gas & Electric Co. and Southern California Gas Co., both of which are regulated by the state Public Utilities Commission.

PUC Executive Director Steve Larson will be among the guests on the trip.

Sempra pays $30,000 a year in dues to the Foundation on the Environment and Economy. The firm is going because Sempra believes that it is important to "provide policymakers and elected officials some background that is helpful in making informed decisions," said company spokesman Art Larson (no relation to Steve).

Watchdog groups said the South America trip gives lobbyists extraordinary access to government officials — access that others don't get. They also said that if state officials think the trip is important and justified, taxpayers should pay for it.

"We want state delegations going on fact-finding trips if warranted," said Sheila Krumholz, acting executive director of the Center for Responsive Politics in Washington, D.C. "We just have to make sure they aren't being unduly influenced by such lavish trips, and that policy is not being skewed as a result."

The Schwarzenegger administration says that it also is revamping what have been loose practices when it comes to fundraising events. For much of the governor's term, policy aides invited to such events mingled freely with donors.

Bonnie Reiss, a longtime friend of Schwarzenegger and one of his top aides, attended a campaign fundraiser for the governor last month at the home of media mogul Haim Saban. The new policy does not rule out attending, but those who go must foot the bill themselves.

After The Times asked about Reiss' attendance in light of the new rules, Mendelsohn said Reiss would reimburse the campaign for her meal.

There are no penalties for failing to comply with the new policies, he said.

"We will remain committed," he said, "to continuing to enforce this policy and correct any oversights."

The Holes In The Border Fence Plan (LAT)

By Phil Angelides

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

ON THURSDAY, President Bush put his signature on a measure authorizing a new fence along 700 miles of the 1,952-mile-long border between the United States and Mexico. Funds for the fence may never be provided, and the fence may never get built. Regardless of its future, the fence legislation alone is no substitute for the kind of comprehensive immigration reform that California and the nation need.

The United States has long been strengthened by policies that have brought immigrants here from every corner of the world. And yet every period of high immigration also has been shadowed with fear, ignorance, hatred and racism. As we move forward with immigration reform, we must adhere to what makes our country great — freedom, opportunity and equality — and resist pandering to the lowest common denominators of divisiveness, stereotypes and ignorance.

Comprehensive reform starts with full funding for the strong border security provisions originally provided in the 2004 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act in response to the recommendations of the 9/11 commission. The act calls for at least 2,000 new, permanent border agents a year and 8,000 new detention beds a year for five years. Investments in border personnel and surveillance technology are essential for protecting national security and regulating immigration, but the federal government has funded only a fraction of these requirements.

Border control, by itself, is not a solution. For one thing, no border in a country as large as the United States can be made perfectly secure. More important, an estimated 40% of the 12 million undocumented immigrants now here entered the country legally and then overstayed their visas. Border fences and other border control measures can't deal with that part of the problem — and will likely make it worse.

Immigration policy must deal realistically with the major engine of illegal immigration: the economy's demand for immigrant labor. The federal government must enact rational and reasonable guest-worker programs that match immigrant workers with the nation's workforce needs. We need to end the shadow economy in which undocumented workers toil without regulation and without the protection of law.

We also ought to offer undocumented immigrants who are working hard and supporting our economy a path toward citizenship, as long as they are willing to be accountable, submit to a background check, pay back taxes, learn English and study American civics. They then should be allowed to get in line behind the backlog of people attempting to gain citizenship.

Finally, immigration reform must enable states to hold the federal government accountable for managing our nation's immigration. When the failures of the federal government — be it securing the borders or failing to limit illegal employment — result in increased burdens on state and local governments, then the federal government must be required to compensate state and local governments for their increased costs.

I come from a family of immigrants. My mother, who is of Greek descent but immigrated from Egypt, became a U.S. citizen when I was 10. My grandparents on my father's side came to this country from Greece at the turn of the last century. They worked hard and sent my father to college, and both of their American-born sons fought in World War II.

My grandparents never spoke much English, and yet they were great Americans. They faced the same anti-immigrant sentiment that we see too much of today: hate, ignorance and racism. Yet my grandparents, and millions like them, persevered and became a source of national strength and vitality.

The immigrants in this country today also can be a source of strength, and, guided by comprehensive reforms and orderly policies, immigration will continue to renew the United States and California. But it will take a lot more than a half-promise for a partial fence.

Rep. Hunter Aims For White House (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Alpine), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, announced plans today to make a longshot bid for his party's 2008 nomination for president.

Hunter said his campaign will feature the two issues that are his trademarks: support for the U.S. military and opposition to illegal immigration.

While other Republicans may be edging away from President Bush over the war, Hunter praised the president for his guidance of the U.S. military missions in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"We are going to carry our message of a strong national defense and strong national borders" to voters, Hunter said at a news conference at the waterfront site where he announced his first bid for Congress in 1980.

In that race, Hunter upset a longtime Democratic incumbent, helped by the Ronald Reagan presidential landslide. Hunter has never faced a close race since.

"It's going to be a long road. There's lots of rough and tumble, but I think it's the right thing to do for our country," Hunter said of his presidential bid.

Hunter expressed confidence that he will be reelected next week to Congress from the 52nd District and remain as chairman of the powerful committee. Under congressional rules, he could only serve as chairman for two more years if the GOP controls the House.

Hunter, 58, served in the Army in Vietnam and later earned a law degree at Western State University College of Law in San Diego. He was a plaintiff's attorney before entering politics.

He is a hardliner on illegal immigration and sponsored a bill signed by Bush to build a 700-mile border fence.

Hunter's congressional opponent, Navy veteran John Rinaldi, was on the fringes of the news conference crowd. He called Hunter's announcement a stunt to draw attention away from serious issues.

"He has about as much chance of being president as I do of becoming Miss America," Rinaldi said.

Rep. Hunter Exploring Presidential Run (AP-Y)

By Elliot Spagat

AP, October 31, 2006

Republican Rep. Duncan Hunter, known in the military's echelon for his congressional role but hardly a national name, said Monday he was taking the initial step in a 2008 presidential bid.

"This is going to be a long road, it's a challenging road, there's going to be some rough and tumble, but I think it's the right thing to do for our country," Hunter, the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said at a waterfront news conference.

The declaration to form an exploratory committee allows the 13-term California congressman to begin raising money and organize supporters in early Republican primary states such as Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

Hunter is a familiar face on Capitol Hill and at the Pentagon as chairman of the powerful panel that oversees military policy. Not so beyond Washington and San Diego, and his White House bid surprised many Republicans.

He had not been on any list of potential 2008 candidates that included more familiar names such as Sens. John McCain of Arizona, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

"In typical Duncan Hunter fashion, I didn't consult with any Republican leaders," he said to laughter and applause from an audience of about 100 people against a backdrop of military ships on San Diego Bay.

Analysts immediately characterized the quest as a long shot.

"You never say never, but Congressman Hunter faces extremely long odds given that practically no one apart from students of Congress knows who he is," said Jack Pitney, a government professor at Claremont McKenna College. "He's a good member of Congress, a very effective chairman of Armed Services. It's just that he has no following within the party."

Hunter, 58, became chairman of the House Armed Services Committee in 2003 — a position he would lose should Democrats take control of the House after the Nov. 7 midterm elections. By making an announcement now, he can begin raising money while still heading the committee.

The Vietnam War veteran, a recipient of a Bronze Star, has made his mark in Congress by advocating for a strong military and border security. He played a leading role in the construction of a 14-mile double fence on the U.S.-Mexico border that is nearing completion in San Diego. He co-authored legislation signed by President Bush last week that would extend the border fence to 700 miles.

Hunter voted against the North American Free Trade Agreement and the Central American Free Trade Agreement and opposed most-favored-nation status for China. This year, he was a vocal critic of a deal that gave a Dubai company control of some operations at six American ports.

Hunter has cruised to re-election since he, as a 32-year-old criminal defense attorney, rode Ronald Reagan's coattails to unseat a nine-term Democratic incumbent. The Riverside native faces token opposition next week in his bid for another term representing San Diego's eastern suburbs.

Hunter was a close ally of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican who was sentenced to more than eight years in prison this year for accepting $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors. Hunter has accepted $46,000 in campaign donations from the same contractors at the center of the Cunningham scandal, Brent Wilkes and Mitchell Wade, and their associates.

Carl Luna, a political science professor at San Diego's Mesa College, said Hunter may be preparing himself for losing the Armed Services Committee chairman slot.

"Duncan Hunter is looking for something to do if the Democrats take control of the Congress," Luna said. "He doesn't want to have to go from being chairman of a powerful committee to just another backbencher."

Things didn't end well for the last California House member to run for president — Republican Robert Dornan in 1996. Dornan, a vociferous conservative known by the nickname "B-1 Bob" for his support of military programs and bombastic style, spent his time and money on a fruitless White House bid and ended up losing his House seat to Democrat Loretta Sanchez.

Rep. Hunter To Explore White House Bid (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 30 -- Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and a vigorous opponent of illegal immigration, announced Monday that he is starting the process of seeking the presidency in 2008.

Hunter, 58, said he will form an exploratory committee for a presidential run, adding his name to a list of better-known GOP hopefuls such as Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

"I've always laid my cards on the table," Hunter said at a news conference in San Diego. "As I finish my final two years as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, I'm also going to be preparing to run for president of the United States in 2008."

The 13-term congressman is known in his suburban San Diego district for advocacy on immigration and military issues. He was a leader in the construction of a 14-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexico border south of San Diego, and he cosponsored legislation that President Bush signed last week to build 700 miles of additional fencing along the border. A Vietnam veteran, Hunter has advocated for a strong military, sometimes taking positions to the right of Republican leaders.

Hunter is expected to cruise to reelection next week, but if Democrats win a majority in the House he would lose his committee chairmanship.

That may be a factor in his unexpected announcement, said John J. Pitney Jr., a government professor at Claremont McKenna College.

"He has been in Congress long enough to remember what it was like in the minority," Pitney said. "The difference between being chair of a committee and being a minority member is like the difference between lightning and a lightning bug. . . . He may have decided a long-shot presidential campaign is more fun."

An Oval Office For Mayor Mike? (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

NEW YORK -- If you should happen to go to dinner here, the talk will inevitably turn to any one of the many presidential candidates the Empire State has to offer. Foremost among them, of course, is Hillary Clinton, but worthy of mention are Rudy Giuliani and George Pataki, Republicans both. Increasingly, though, the hum is also about the politically audacious Michael Rubens Bloomberg, 44th on Forbes magazine's list of the richest Americans and, as it happens, the mayor of this fair city. He might also be running.

I say "might" because Bloomberg has gone from the firm "no" he offered me some months ago to a more intriguing "I'm considering it" that he offered someone I talked with recently. Indeed, among this city's moneyed, journalistic (not, alas, the same thing), entertainment, financial and other sorts of elites, there are always one or two at the table who say, with great solemnity, that they happen to know Bloomberg will indeed run for president as an independent. Knowing my duty, I called the Bloomberg people and asked if that is the case. By press time, as they say in the movies, I had yet to hear back. I take that as a wobbly affirmation.

The prospect of a Bloomberg presidential candidacy delights me. I grant you that just last week I was excited about Barack Obama, but that is because I think the more the merrier -- especially if they are truly bright, unencumbered by a need to defend the Iraq war and willing to look at things afresh. This is particularly the case with Bloomberg, who has an unorthodox approach to politics. He says what he means and he means what he says and he tells it like it is. This string of cliches is, in fact, the truth.

Here is the quintessential Bloomberg story: In July, in the midst of a heat wave, the power failed in certain sections of Queens. For politicians, a power failure is such a no-brainer that even the alcoholically stupefied show up to denounce Con Ed, call for an investigation and demand that its chairman resign. Bloomberg, though, did no such thing. He supported the utility and its chief executive, noting that it was awfully hot as well for the Con Ed workers and that they were apparently doing the best they could. Jaws dropped all over the city.

Officially, Bloomberg is the Republican mayor of New York. But he's really the Democrat he used to be or, more to the point, the independent he would become if he chose to run for president. Running as neither a Republican nor a Democrat would be a nearly insurmountable hurdle, but Bloomberg is very, very rich and not at all afraid to use his money. He personally financed his two mayoral campaigns -- nearly $74 million in 2001, $84 million in 2005 -- and he has said that spending half a billion dollars on a presidential race is, if that's what it takes, easily doable. Ross Perot, not as rich as Bloomberg and clearly deranged, got 19 percent of the vote in 1992. Bloomberg, who's sane, could do better.

Is the country ready for a billionaire divorced Jew with a penchant for the blunt quote and a habit of getting his own way? Probably not. But there is no doubt that Bloomberg has done a terrific job managing New York, and there is no doubt that the federal government is a mismanaged mess -- so dysfunctional and weird that grown men will defend the appropriation of money for bridges that go virtually nowhere. Wasting money has become the functional equivalent of gutsy politics -- the willingness to defend the fiscally obscene. Bloomberg, maybe John McCain as well, would do something about that. One hopes.

A Bloomberg presidential candidacy would certainly complicate life for Hillary Clinton, not to mention Giuliani, and it's a long shot as an independent or third-party candidacy in any case. (Perot got nary an electoral college vote.) There are vast stretches of the country where you can't get a good pastrami sandwich, sarcasm is loathed, candor is confused with rudeness, advocacy of gun control is hardly appreciated and a crusade against trans fats might be confused with lunacy. For Bloomberg, a presidential campaign would be an enormously expensive tilting at a windmill, and no one should be surprised if, as he has said, he devotes his apres-mayoralty life to giving away his fortune.

But Bloomberg drops too many hints at dinner parties, says no with a total lack of conviction and has the gambler's yen to roll the dice for major stakes. Once before, he ignored sage advice, switched political parties and ran for mayor. Will he do something similar now? I don't know. Is he considering it? You bet.

Abstinence Message Goes Beyond Teens (USAT)

By Sharon Jayson

USA Today, October 30, 2006

Now the government is targeting unmarried adults up to age 29 as part of its abstinence-only programs, which include millions of dollars in federal money that will be available to the states under revised federal grant guidelines for 2007.

The government says the change is a clarification. But critics say it's a clear signal of a more directed policy targeting the sexual behavior of adults.

"They've stepped over the line of common sense," said James Wagoner, president of Advocates for Youth, a Washington, D.C.-based non-profit that supports sex education. "To be preaching abstinence when 90% of people are having sex is in essence to lose touch with reality. It's an ideological campaign. It has nothing to do with public health."

Abstinence education programs, which have focused on preteens and teens, teach that abstaining from sex is the only effective or acceptable method to prevent pregnancy or disease. They give no instruction on birth control or safe sex.

The National Center for Health Statistics says well over 90% of adults ages 20-29 have had sexual intercourse.

But Wade Horn, assistant secretary for children and families at the Department of Health and Human Services, said the revision is aimed at 19- to 29-year-olds because more unmarried women in that age group are having children.

Government data released last month show that 998,262 births in 2004 were to unmarried women 19-29, the ages with the most births to unmarried women.

"The message is 'It's better to wait until you're married to bear or father children,' " Horn said. "The only 100% effective way of getting there is abstinence."

DOJ_NMG_0089035

The revised guidelines specify that states seeking grants are "to identify groups ... most likely to bear children out-of-wedlock, targeting adolescents and/or adults within the 12- through 29-year-old age range." Previous guidelines didn't mention targeting of an age group.

"We wanted to remind states they could use these funds not only to target adolescents," Horn said. "It's a reminder."

Sarah Brown, director of the National Campaign to Prevent Teen Pregnancy, says abstinence programs are among many messages that have helped reduce teen pregnancy rates. But "the notion that the federal government is supporting millions of dollars worth of messages to people who are grown adults about how to conduct their sex life is a very divisive policy," she says.

"We would oppose any program that stigmatizes unmarried people," adds Nicky Grist, executive director of the Alternatives to Marriage Project, a non-profit organization based in Brooklyn, N.Y., that advocates for the rights of unmarried people.

For last year's state grants, Congress appropriated $50 million. A similar amount is expected for 2007, but the money has not yet been allocated, according to the Administration for Children and Families.

"I think the program should talk about the problem with out-of- wedlock childbearing — not about your sex life," Brown says. "If you use contraception effectively and consistently, you will not be in the pool of out-of-wedlock births."

Blue America (WT)

By Fred Barne

If Tom Edsall isn't America's greatest political writer, he's close to it. He meets the two tests that matter the most. The first is whether one who analyzes politics is willing to write against preference. Mr. Edsall is, and "Building Red America" is a perfect example. He is a liberal, especially on social and cultural issues, who persuasively chronicles how Republicans have gained the upper hand in politics today and explains why Democrats, even if they defeat Republicans in the midterm elections on Nov. 7, are not poised to become the majority party again anytime soon.

The second test involves whether the political writer can command an audience. Mr. Edsall, who recently left The Washington Post to join the New Republic, can. In his case, anyone with a strong interest in politics is likely to read his pieces regardless of the specific subject matter. They'll do so simply on the basis of the Edsall byline, assuming (as I do) that anything he writes is worth reading.

Mr. Edsall doesn't buy the conventional wisdom of liberal political reporters and commentators, most notably their take on the effect of social issues. Their view is that Republicans do well despite their opposition to abortion, embryonic stem cell research, homosexual rights and racial preferences. His view, slightly oversimplified, is that Republicans win elections because of their social conservatism.

In both 2000 and 2004, President Bush was a beneficiary. He won, Mr. Edsall writes, at least partly as a result of the "the high-risk strategy by the conservative movement and the Republican party of forcing wedge issues, of leveraging every marginal advantage, and of bearing down hard on morality and sex." Emphasizing social issues in 2000, he says, "established a framework for the aggressive use of the issue of gay marriage in 2004."

I'd quibble with the idea that Republicans were "aggressive" in opposing same-sex marriage. True, Mr. Bush endorsed the protection amendment, but he hardly stressed it during the 2004 campaign. He didn't need to. Same-sex marriage was already a prominent enough issue to aid in producing what Mr. Edsall calls at one point "a thin but durable GOP advantage" and at another a Republican "juggernaut."

Mr. Edsall gently but firmly rebuts those who chiefly blame voters for Democratic defeats. Thomas Frank popularized this notion in his book "What's the Matter with Kansas?" Mr. Frank argued that lower-middle-class voters, a natural Democratic constituency, are ignoring their economic interests to vote on the basis of social issues. Mr. Frank recommended that Democrats emphasize economic populism to lure these voters.

But the evidence from recent elections, Mr. Edsall notes, is that populist appeals haven't worked. He cites the presidential campaigns of Al Gore, Howard Dean, John Edwards, Richard Gephardt, Tom Harkin and Jesse Jackson. The common thread: They all lost.

There's also plenty of evidence that Democrats remain oblivious to the harm done them by their failure "to cross a security threshold" and gain credibility on national security. Mr. Edsall knows better. "Because the Democratic party became the party of antiwar activists during the Vietnam war," he writes, "... and because the party became increasingly hostile to defense spending, the security threshold has been a major stumbling block for the party's candidates."

The Republican Party: An Incredible Knack For Winning (CSM)

By Ari Pinkus

How the GOP turned the art of electioneering into a science.

You could hardly turn on the television or pick up a newspaper in recent weeks without learning about a Republican running for his or her life. Of course, no one knows yet what voters will really do in the privacy of the voting booth next week.

But whatever happens on Election Day, nothing changes the fact that the Republican Party has the upper hand over the Democrats in the mechanics of campaigning: money, message, and organization. Even should the GOP suffer a setback at the polls, these formidable advantages will not disappear anytime soon.

The new book One Party Country: Republican Dominance in the 21st Century examines the nuts-and-bolts of the way Republicans have been building this sturdy foundation aimed at achieving successive election victories.

At a time when Republicans have not articulated a clear strategy in the Iraq war and have bungled the aftermath of hurricane Katrina, "One Party Country" suggests that the immediate priority and long-range plan of the Republican Party is wrapped up in winning elections. With so much of the focus on electoral tactics, the offshoot is that governing the country takes a secondary role.

"One Party Country" does a good job of spelling out the GOP electoral strategy objectively and in detail, and without evidence of partisan leanings.

Written by two investigative reporters for the Los Angeles Times, Tom Hamburger and Peter Wallsten, this book shows the signs of incisive journalistic digging. Early on, a minihistory lesson shows how the Republicans seized the opportunities for electoral success afforded by redistricting, particularly in the South.

More recently, the Republican Party has shown that it is well on its way to flawlessly executing the technique of microtargeting - developing messages and reaching specific individuals who are most likely to vote for a candidate. A new approach to conducting campaigns, it puts the onus on campaign staffs to learn about voters, including those who have not turned out in the past.

The authors extensively discuss the Voter Vault, a database of names, voter registrations, positions on key issues, and marketing information that can help the GOP reach new voters.

With this under-the-radar model, the Republicans would take the Democrats by surprise, the authors say. "It was the political equivalent of stealth technology in air power: Democrats would feel the bombs explode, but they could not see the bombers."

In 2004, the Bush campaign, led by master strategists Karl Rove and Ken Mehlman, spent $120 million in grass-roots politicking.

It's been successful so far, according to Hamburger and Wallsten. In numerous regions of the country, Republicans are siphoning off votes from several demographic groups that traditionally vote Democratic: Latinos, African-Americans, and Jews.

In the current environment, politics goes beyond targeting blocs of voters right before elections. Republicans frame all issues, including managing governmental regulations, in terms of gaining political advantage. Bush's faith-based initiatives were intended to cultivate support among African-American preachers, and educational reforms have helped him with minority voters.

They also explain the importance of the conservative network's weekly meetings led by Grover Norquist of the Americans for Tax Reform in keeping the two main groups (the fiscal and social conservatives) focused on their common GOP connection.

The reporters were able to get into a few of these private forums where conservatives can promote a message or share disagreements. Mr. Rove explained the Medicare prescription drug plan to this gathering and encouraged them to support it or keep mum if they did not, all for continued electoral success.

Particularly with midterm elections looming, "One Party Country" leaves the reader with fundamental questions: Are the Democrats about to put a halt to Republican dominance? If not, what might US society look like with a one-party system where campaigning is king, and governing an afterthought?

Newspaper Circulations Slide More (WSJ)

By Emily Steel

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

Broad Decline May Hasten Move to Hone Web Focus; New York Tabloids Log Gains

Nearly every major U.S. newspaper suffered circulation declines in the past six months, according to the newspaper industry's twice-yearly report from the Audit Bureau of Circulations, the latest confirmation of the difficulties facing the industry as readers flock to the Web and other outlets for news.

Average daily circulation of the 770 newspapers reporting results to the ABC dropped 2.8% on a year-to-year basis during the six months ended Sept. 30, according to an analysis from the Newspaper Association of America, an industry-trade group. The drop in circulation follows a decline of 2.5% during the reporting period ended March 31 of this year and a 2.6% decline in the year-earlier period. Average Sunday circulation at 619 of the country's newspapers fell 3.4% in the most recent six months, according to the NAA. The circulation figures are preliminary and subject to audit by the ABC.

The circulation report, which comes on the heels of several major publishers reporting weaker ad revenue for the third quarter, is likely to reinforce concerns among investors about the industry's prospects. Those concerns have prompted some investors to push companies such as Tribune Co. to restructure or put themselves on the market.

The weaker circulation numbers may fuel efforts by publishers to adjust their business model to put more emphasis on the Web. Newspaper Web sites increased total audience by an average of 8%, according to an NAA analysis of more than 100 newspapers in the nation's top markets.

Some of the biggest declines occurred among the nation's large metropolitan daily papers, including several that have either changed hands or whose future business model is in doubt.

Tribune's Los Angeles Times posted the biggest percentage decline among the nation's top 25 papers, reporting an 8% six-month drop in total paid circulation to 775,766 compared with a year ago. Tribune's board is exploring a sale of the company, under pressure from shareholders unhappy with the company's stock price. Tribune's other major papers reported slightly smaller six-month declines: Chicago Tribune's circulation fell 1.7% while Newsday was down 5%.

Total paid circulation at the Philadelphia Inquirer, a former McClatchy Co. paper purchased this year from Knight Ridder Inc. and then sold this summer to an investor group led by Brian Tierney, chief executive of Philadelphia Media Holdings LLC, dropped 7.6% to 330,622.

At New York Times Co.'s Boston Globe, circulation dropped 6.7% to 386,415. Speculation about the Globe's future intensified last week after it emerged that former General Electric Co. Chairman Jack Welch had discussed with a group of Bostonians the possibility of launching a bid for the paper. The Times hasn't given any indication of wanting to sell the Globe, saying yesterday it views the paper as an important asset.

National newspapers managed less significant circulation drops. Gannett Co.'s USA Today retained its status as the nation's largest-circulation newspaper with total paid circulation at 2,269,509, down 1.3%. The Wall Street Journal, the nation's second-largest paper, published by Dow Jones & Co., reported a 1.9% decrease in total paid circulation to 2,043,235. The New York Times, the country's third-largest paper, saw its circulation decrease 3.5% to 1,086,798.

Several papers, including the Journal and Los Angeles Times, said "individually paid circulation" -- excluding bulk sales to offices, hotels and other places -- reflects a more accurate picture of circulation for advertisers. Individually paid subscriptions increased 9.2% to 1.428 million at the Journal, compared with last year. Daily individually paid circulation at the Los Angeles Times increased 0.3% to 741,665.

Of the nation's top 10 newspapers, only New York's tabloid rivals -- New York Post and New York Daily News -- reported higher total paid weekday circulation. With a 5.1% increase to 704,011, News Corp.'s New York Post emerged ahead of its rival New York Daily News, which reported a 1% increase to 693,382 in total paid weekday circulation. The New York Post's increase in circulation pushed it ahead of the Washington Post as well and made it the country's fifth-largest daily. The Washington Post's circulation fell 3.3% to 656,297.

The Chicago Sun-Times and Dallas Morning News didn't file data, pending the completion of their next six-month audits.

Newspaper Circulation Falls Sharply (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

The circulation of the nation's daily newspapers plunged during the latest reporting period in one of the sharpest declines in recent history, according to data released yesterday. The slide continues a decades-long trend and adds to the woes of a mature industry already struggling with layoffs and facing the potential sale of some of its flagships.

Over all, average daily circulation dropped by 2.8 percent during the six-month period ended Sept. 30, compared with the period last year, according to an industry analysis of data released by the Audit Bureau of Circulations. Circulation for Sunday papers fell by 3.4 percent.

The figures appear to be the steepest in any comparable six-month period in at least 15 years. They come after the sale of the Knight Ridder newspapers this year and in the midst of a possible sale of the Tribune Company, whose assets include 11 newspapers. The circulation losses also follow recent sour earnings reports, raising questions about why anyone would want to buy a newspaper now.

The losses have accelerated as the industry tries to adjust to the steady migration of readers and advertisers to the Internet. Papers in major metropolitan areas, where more homes are wired for broadband, fared worse than those in smaller markets.

Newspaper executives also attribute some of the decline to deliberate strategies to eliminate so-called bulk sales to third-party sponsors that offer papers free in places like hotels. Advertisers view them as having little value because the readers getting them did not pay for them.

The Los Angeles Times lost 8 percent of its daily circulation and 6 percent on Sunday. The Boston Globe, owned by The New York Times Company, lost 6.7 percent of its daily circulation and almost 10 percent on Sunday.

The New York Times, one of the few big papers where circulation had held steady over the last few reporting periods, lost about 3.5 percent of its circulation both daily and Sunday. The Washington Post's declines were nearly the same. The Wall Street Journal's daily paper fell by less than 2 percent but its Weekend Edition, which comes out on Saturday, reported a 6.7 percent drop.

As of Sept. 30, total circulation for the nation's dailies had dropped to 43.7 million. Daily circulation peaked in 1984, at 63.3 million.

Nonetheless, three billionaires in Los Angeles have said they are interested in buying The Los Angeles Times, which is owned by Tribune. John F. Welch Jr., the former chief executive of General Electric, has mused about buying The Globe, although The New York Times Company has said it is not for sale. And others have expressed interest in papers elsewhere.

Prospective buyers are interested, in part, because despite their problems, newspapers generally still turn a profit and remain attractive to advertisers who want to reach a mass audience. Many papers have higher profit margins than the average Fortune 500 company.

Moreover, many companies see promise in their online publications, which are drawing an increasing number of readers each year. At The New York Times, for example, the number of people who read the paper online now surpasses the number who buy the print edition.

The newspaper association said that for the third quarter of this year, 57 million people visited a newspaper Web site, an increase of 24 percent over the period a year ago. And revenues from online advertisers are growing.

"The fundamentals say to me that there is a future for a well-run newspaper," said Conrad C. Fink, who teaches newspaper management at the University of Georgia. "But short range, it looks dismal and nobody knows exactly what to do about it."

One immediate problem is that although online revenues are growing, they still make up only a small portion of the overall newspaper revenues. And it could take at least two decades for online revenues to equal half of current revenues, Lauren Rich Fine, an analyst with Merrill Lynch, wrote last week.

Still, there is the vanity aspect of owning a newspaper.

"If you're Jack Welch, you've already made a ton of dough," Mr. Fink said. "You want to buy The Boston Globe because you want a voice at the top."

He also said there was an "element of altruism" by some people, "who believe they can buy these papers and return them to their local roots." But he pointed to the recent acquisition of The Inquirer and The Daily News in Philadelphia by Brian P. Tierney, a local advertising executive, as an example that was "not all that impressive."

The Inquirer lost 7.6 percent of its daily circulation and 4.5 percent on Sunday, according to the new data. Some of the papers owned by McClatchy, which acquired Knight Ridder, also lost circulation in this period: The Star-Tribune in Minneapolis was down more than 4 percent daily and The Sacramento Bee was down more than 5 percent daily.

Nonetheless, Elaine Lintecum, treasurer of McClatchy, said the company was optimistic.

McClatchy's online sites now account for 8 percent of the company's revenue, Ms. Lintecum said. "It's a small portion, but it's growing more in importance each year," she said. "As that transition is taking place, we have to look at our total audience" online and in print.

She also said that like many other publishers, McClatchy was in the process of cutting back on third-party sales, "and until that's weaned out, the circulation numbers won't look so good."

One of the few increases in circulation was scored by The New York Post, which eked past its main rival, The Daily News, by about 10,000 copies and trumpeted the news on a giant billboard in Times Square.

With Tribune On Block, L.A. Times Circulation Down 8% (WP)

By Frank Ahrens

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Drop is Steepest Among Major U.S. Newspapers

The Los Angeles Times lost 8 percent of its daily circulation -- the most of any of the nation's largest newspapers -- over the past six months, potentially lowering its value even as suitors line up to bid on its parent company.

Nationally, newspaper circulation has been sliding since 1987 and the past six months were no exception. Overall circulation was down 2.8 percent from the comparable period last year. But the pain was felt worse in some cities than in others. The smaller-circulation Miami Herald, for example, was down 9 percent for daily and Sunday, while the New York tabloids -- the Post and Daily News -- gained.

The L.A. Times is owned by Chicago-based Tribune Co., which has put itself up for sale as the result of a boardroom war. A minority of board members are unhappy with the company's performance over the past year and think the company would be worth more split up or sold off.

On Friday, two private-equity groups -- Bain Capital of Boston and Thomas H. Lee Partners of Boston combined with Texas Pacific Group of Fort Worth -- met Tribune's deadline for expressing interest in buying the company, said sources with knowledge of the submissions who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the bidding is private. Tribune's market capitalization is $8 billion.

Tribune's sentimental flagship is the Chicago Tribune, but the L.A. Times is its largest newspaper and accounts for about one-quarter of Tribune revenue. The Times has been at the heart of Tribune's cost-cutting efforts in recent months; Chicago executives fired Times publisher Jeffrey M. Johnson this month for refusing to cut more jobs.

The 8 percent drop in circulation was recorded in April through September and left the Times with a daily circulation of 775,766, according to the Audit Bureau of Circulations, which monitors newspaper sales. The Times's Sunday circulation for the period was down 6 percent, to 1.2 million. The Times publisher said the big drop was attributable to low-value circulation -- such as giveaways -- that the paper cut to save money.

Other Tribune papers fared slightly better. Daily circulation at the Chicago Tribune was down 1.7 percent; the Hartford Courant was down 3.9 percent; the Baltimore Sun was down 4.4 percent; and Newsday was down 4.9 percent.

Tribune shares fell 50 cents in morning trading in reaction to the circulation news but mostly recovered during the day, closing down 2 cents at $33.45.

If the Times's circulation slide is the result of readers actively fleeing the paper, the company's value could be reduced as the sale process goes forward, said James C. Goss, an analyst with Barrington Research Associates Inc. of Chicago. That could lead bidders such as Bain and Lee to lowball Tribune, offering less per share to buy the company.

Analysts place Tribune's value at about $35 per share.

But if the 8 percent loss is the result of what Goss called "corporate choice" -- meaning that Tribune allowed low-value circulation to seep away -- that would be seen as smart corporate policy and could raise the value of the company.

However, allowing overall circulation to drop too far can result in lowered ad rates.

In a written statement, Times publisher David D. Hiller said his paper was focusing on "individually paid circulation," or full-price circulation. In that respect, the Times's circulation was up one-third of 1 percent over the past six months, yesterday's data showed.

Newspapers receive credit for other forms of circulation, such as "third-party sales," when a retailer agrees to buy a large number of newspapers at a reduced rate then give them away as a promotional tool. That kind of Times circulation was down 67 percent, the paper said.

The Washington Post lost 3.3 percent of its daily and 2.6 percent of its Sunday circulation in the same period. The New York Times was down 3.5 percent daily and Sunday. USA Today, the nation's largest newspaper, lost 1.3 percent.

In New York, the tabloid wars have been good for the industry: The New York Post's circulation was up 5 percent, while the Daily News's rose 1 percent.

Cotton-picking Subsidies (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

A CENTURY AND a half ago, the U.S. cotton industry fueled a booming trade in African slaves and indirectly helped spark the Civil War. One big difference between then and now is that although American cotton is still afflicting Africa, now the Africans suffer at home rather than here.

Cotton is a staple crop for many West and Central African countries, where a difference of a few pennies in the price of a pound of fiber can mean the difference between deprivation and relative prosperity. And an explosion of U.S. cotton exports over the last decade, fueled by one of the most obscene corporate welfare programs this country has ever seen, has increasingly helped tip the scales toward deprivation over there.

On Wednesday, trade ministers from four African countries whose economies are being savaged by U.S. cotton subsidies came to Washington to discuss the issue with U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns. They left with little more than vague promises. President Bush, cowed by powerful congressional Republicans from farm states, has done nothing to stop a surge in agricultural subsidies during his administration.

Few U.S. growers would be in the cotton business if not for the roughly $3.5 billion the government shovels their way every year. Much of this money goes to large corporate operations or wealthy families that feel it is their birthright to unfairly rig the global trading game. The payments encourage overproduction and make it almost impossible for African farmers to compete with this nation's subsidized exports.

When other nations try subsidizing industrial exports that compete with our goods, we cry foul, and this incessant hypocrisy contributes to anti-American sentiment in much of the world. The message from Washington to the rest of the world seems to be: We love fair competition and open markets, just as long as we're talking about those products and services we are inherently good or efficient at producing. This doesn't just hurt people overseas. The U.S. government last year spent about $23 billion on farm subsidies. What did taxpayers get for their money? A fat agribusiness industry and inflated land values. The overall farm support program also means U.S. consumers lack access to some lower-priced imports.

Two years ago, the World Trade Organization ruled in favor of Brazil in a case challenging the legality of U.S. cotton subsidies, yet the U.S. continues to flout the ruling. A five-year WTO effort to lower farm supports around the world, in order to address one of globalization's most brazen north-south inequities, collapsed in July. Europe and Japan may be even more culpable on these issues than the United States, but the Bush administration's unwillingness to unilaterally dismantle the cotton program prevented the U.S. from claiming the moral high ground in negotiations — not to mention a much-needed dose of goodwill in the developing world.

The crowning irony is that while the United States spends billions of dollars a year on foreign aid programs for developing nations, it spends even more billions on agricultural subsidies that make it harder for these countries to wean themselves off outside support. Enough already. Key farm legislation, which contained a big increase in subsidies in 2002, expires next year. When it is renegotiated, Bush and Congress need to kill off these subsidy programs that cost the nation billions of dollars, and much more in prestige and credibility around the world.

Iran Warns Of Response To Nuke Sanctions (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, October 31, 2006

Iran's firebrand president warned on Monday that his country would respond with an "appropriate and firm response" to any U.N. sanction over its nuclear program.

The comments by Mahmoud Ahmadinejad came as key United Nations Security Council members were considering a draft European resolution that would impose punishing measures on Iran over its disputed nuclear program.

"Efforts by the big powers will only incite anger and hatred," the hard-line leader told a large crowd on the outskirts of Tehran.

"The Iranian nation will respond to restrictive activities with an appropriate and firm response," he said without elaborating.

Meanwhile, Mohamed ElBaradei, who heads the International Atomic Energy Agency, said at the U.N. that his organization has not been able to verify that Iran's nuclear program is peaceful.

Tehran insists its nuclear efforts are solely geared at peacefully producing electricity. But the U.S. and its allies fear Iranians want to build atomic weapons.

Russia and China, which wield veto power as permanent Security Council members, have shied away from imposing punitive measures on their trade partner Iran, saying they prefer a diplomatic solution to the impasse. But the United States says the proposed sanctions are not tough enough.

Russian President Vladimir Putin told Ahmadinejad on Monday that Moscow strongly favors further negotiations on Tehran's nuclear program, the Kremlin said.

The brief Russian statement after a telephone conversation between the two leaders was the latest indication that Russia opposes sanctions against Iran and believes the international community should try to defuse tension through talks.

With Iran waving threats of a firm response to any U.N. sanction, it also appeared aimed at cooling Tehran's rhetoric and casting Russia as a peacemaker.

In the Iranian-initiated conversation with Ahmadinejad, "Putin outlined the fundamental position of the Russian side in favor of a continuation of the negotiation process," the Kremlin said.

President Bush insists that Washington will only agree to negotiate about Tehran's nuclear program if the Iranians first halt uranium enrichment, a key step to produce either peaceful nuclear power or an atomic bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0089042

With the council divided, Ahmadinejad remained defiant, telling the crowd that Iran would prefer to endure sanctions rather than bow to Western pressure.

"We want to stand on our own feet," he said. "You should know that our nation will not give in one iota in the nuclear case."

He also mocked Britain as a "follower of arrogance," for aligning itself with U.S. foreign policy, days after British Prime Minister Tony Blair called on the Security Council to achieve a "proper, binding resolution" on Iran's nuclear activities.

The British "have simply become the guide for a blind U.S," Ahmadinejad said.

"We do advise Britain not to squirm and not to do childish activities concerning the resolution. Iran's nation has stood up and will not let you achieve anything except humiliation," he added.

His speech was delivered after Iran officially confirmed on Friday that it has doubled its uranium enrichment capacity.

On Monday, ElBaradei said that the IAEA was "unable at this stage to confirm the peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear program which, obviously, is a matter of serious concern."

ElBaradei referred to his earlier report to the Security Council verifying that Iran had ignored the Aug. 31 deadline to halt uranium enrichment.

The U.N. nuclear watchdog had not been able to "make progress resolving the outstanding issues — issues that require certain transparency measures on the part of Iran," ElBaradei said.

The Iranians have insisted on their right to pursue a peaceful atomic energy program as a member of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Iran's deputy U.N. Ambassador Mehdi Danesh-Yazdi criticized the "dangerous trend" where countries outside the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty face no pressure to join and acquire large stockpiles of nuclear weapons. He singled out Israel, accusing it of leading "a masquerade of lies and deception against Iran's peaceful nuclear program."

Iran wants all nuclear weapons eliminated but in the interim the international community should take "all necessary steps to ensure universality of the non-proliferation regime," he told the U.N. General Assembly.

At the same time, Danesh-Yazdi said, Iran has a right under the NPT to nuclear technology and is ready to resume negotiations with the six key powers that proposed a package of incentives to assure them of the peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear program. But he made no mention of suspending uranium enrichment — a key demand of Britain, France, Germany, the U.S., Russia and China for resuming negotiations.

Giving Iran The Bomb (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

Does the Bush administration seriously mean to give Iran a nuclear bomb? Look carefully at the confidential text of a forthcoming U.N. Security Council resolution, and the answer, it would seem, is yes.

This is a Halloween column, but it is not a prank. Through diplomatic efforts spearheaded by Undersecretary of State Nick Burns, the administration is prepared to endorse a European draft of a U.N. resolution that imposes limited sanctions on the Islamic Republic for flouting its Aug. 31 deadline to stop enriching uranium. The chances the resolution will soon be voted and agreed on increased with last week's news that Iran has again enriched uranium using a second "cascade" of 160 or so centrifuges. Iran plans to operate 3,000 such centrifuges -- which can spin uranium hexafluoride to either reactor- or weapons-grade levels -- by March of next year.

In an interview last month with this newspaper, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice allowed that while a sanctions resolution would not satisfy the U.S. on every point, it would usefully ratchet up the pressure on Tehran and pave the way, if necessary, for tougher Security Council action later on. On its face, the current draft of the resolution does just that. After noting that the International Atomic Energy Agency "is unable to conclude that there are no undeclared nuclear materials or activities in Iran," the resolution forbids the sale or transfer of "all items, materials, equipment, goods and technology which could contribute to Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs." It also freezes the financial assets of everyone and everything known to be involved in those programs.

But then we come to the Bushehr exception, so broad the Iranians could drive a truck through it -- or, to be more precise, a truck carrying 330 kilograms of reactor-grade plutonium. That's enough to make about 55 Nagasaki-type atomic bombs.

Bushehr is a light-water nuclear reactor that Russia began building for Iran in the mid-1990s over the objections of the Clinton administration. Ten years on, the billion-dollar facility is nearly complete: All that remains to make it operable is reactor-grade uranium, which Moscow promises to supply by next October. In a sop to the Russians, the draft resolution specifies that the prohibition on technology transfers to Iran "shall not apply to supplies of items, materials, equipment, goods and technology, nor to the provision of technical assistance or training, financial assistance, investment, brokering or other services . . . related to the construction of Bushehr I."

For years it was widely believed that a light-water reactor could not be used -- at least not covertly -- to generate weapons-grade uranium or plutonium. It was for this reason that President Clinton agreed to supply two such reactors in 1994 to North Korea in exchange for freezing the reactor at Yongbyong, which lent itself more easily to nuclear-weapons production.

But as Henry Sokolski of the Washington-based Nonproliferation Education Center explains in a phone interview, the problem with that view is that it is at least 30 years out of date. Iran could secretly remove fuel rods of lightly enriched uranium pellets from Bushehr by substituting dummy rods, something the IAEA would be unlikely to notice using current inspection practices. It could then use its 3,000 centrifuges to enrich the uranium to weapons-grade levels in as little as five weeks.

That's not all. After a year's operation the Bushehr reactor would produce the previously mentioned 330 kilograms of plutonium in the form of spent fuel. That plutonium could be reprocessed at small and dispersed facilities, completely hidden from the IAEA's view. And unlike uranium, reactor-grade plutonium is only slightly less serviceable than the weapons-grade stuff when it comes to building a bomb. "It would take as little as 10 days of operation to get the first significant quantity [of plutonium] and then you could get a bomb's worth every day," says Mr. Sokolski. "You're talking about weeks, not months."

This means we need to radically revise our estimates of how soon the Islamic Republic will have all the ingredients and know-how it needs to build a bomb. National Intelligence Director John Negroponte speculated in June that Iran would be there sometime between 2010 and 2015 -- long after President Bush and presumably Mr. Negroponte are out of office. But as Mr. Sokolski notes, once Bushehr is operational, Iran could go nuclear "before the end of next year." We know that Iran already possesses a design for a functional weapon, probably courtesy of the A.Q. Khan proliferation network.

Proponents of the draft resolution argue that the Bushehr exemption is the only way the Russians will agree to any sanctions, and that an incremental resolution is better than none. This argument is questionable on three counts. Why would the Russians oppose the completion of Bushehr next year when they refuse to do so today? Why should the international community allow Iran to get a reactor when it is already in material breach of the safeguards agreement of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty?

Finally, why should the U.S. hand Moscow a bargaining chip for its broader strategic ambitions, which are increasingly antithetical to America's? Imagine if Vladimir Putin demanded that the U.S. abandon its support for the embattled Republic of Georgia in exchange for his compliance on the Iranian issue. Is that a trade-off George W. Bush would be willing to accept?

Tehran has grown shrill in its warnings that there will be "repercussions" if any step is taken to halt its nuclear programs. Whatever. It's time the Bush administration called Iran's bluff, and regained its nerve, by taking effective action in the face of the present danger. The Kabuki dance now being played out at Turtle Bay is not that.

U.S.-Led Exercise In Persian Gulf Sets Sights On Deadliest Weapons (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

ABOARD THE OIL TANKER BRAMBLELEAF, in the Persian Gulf, Oct. 30 — More than two dozen countries, including three gulf states, practiced intercepting and searching vessels suspected of trafficking in unconventional weapons in major military maneuvers on Monday that emphasized their coordination and willingness to aggressively block the spread of arms.

The daylong exercise, about 20 miles outside Iranian territorial waters, seemed to signal to Iran, too, that a coalition of Western powers and neighboring states was intent on denying it access to nuclear, chemical and biological weapons, even on its doorstep.

"The message is clear," said William T. Munroe, the American ambassador to Bahrain. "Responsible countries of the world will not stand aside as proliferators circumvent their international obligations. Responsible countries will not hesitate to deny proliferators a safe haven."

American officials insist that the training exercise, planned since January, was not related to tensions over Iran's uranium enrichment activities. Iran said Friday that it had stepped up enrichment in defiance of a Security Council demand to suspend such work.

"This is ultimately important because of where it's happening, when it's happening and why it's happening," said a diplomat observing the exercise, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment. "Iran and Korea are two main targets, but there are many others of interest to this effort."

Iran warned the exercise's participants on Monday against acts that could destabilize the region. Military officials taking part in the exercise said that Iranian patrol boats came close to coalition ships in recent days, inspecting their activities and positions.

"We do not consider this exercise appropriate," Muhammad Ali Husseini, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, told reporters on Sunday. United States actions in the region "go in the direction of more adventurism, not of stability and security," he said.

Instead, Iran has proposed that Persian Gulf states form a group, excluding the United States, to maintain security in the region.

The exercise on Monday was the first training maneuver in the Persian Gulf under the Proliferation Security Initiative, an American-led effort that seeks to coordinate and develop procedures for intercepting smugglers of unconventional weapons.

It was also notable for the involvement of Bahrain, and support by Qatar and the United Arab Emirates, which sent observers.

The operation began last week with war games to practice intelligence cooperation, then moved to the exercise at sea, which included Australian, British, French and Italian warships and three Bahraini frigates.

Sailors from the Italian and Bahraini Navies swooped onto the British oil tanker Brambleleaf in the choppy Persian Gulf waters, their machine guns waving in a scene that was half show, half test. Each team combed the ship's hold for almost two hours until they found a hidden simulated nuclear detonator.

Absent, however, were Saudi Arabia, a power in the Persian Gulf, and China. Officials involved in the Proliferation Security Initiative said that many states that had not signed on were largely concerned about legal aspects of the initiative.

Technically, teams conducting searches under the initiatives can board a ship only if given clearance by its owners or crew. Ships with no flag can be boarded at will. Organizers of the maneuvers said they hoped the exercise would convince those still on the fence of the legality of the initiative.

The initiative, first proposed by President Bush in May 2003, has held 24 other training exercises in Europe and Asia in the last three years.

Bush Opposes Nukes For Allies (AP)

AP, October 31, 2006

President Bush said Monday he would oppose helping Japan, South Korea and Taiwan develop nuclear weapons to guard against any threat from a nuclear-armed North Korea.

"I think the less nuclear armament in the Far East, the better off the world will be," the president said in an interview.

Bush said the United States should work closely with its allies in Asia on a missile defense system. "Our missile defense systems are getting better and better because of the money that we have been spending over the past five years," he said.

The president said the U.S. has convinced its partners in talks with North Korea that Pyongyang should not have nuclear arms. "The problem is, it's a little frustrating for people; diplomacy is a little frustrating for people because things don't happen overnight.

"So, it's a constant effort to keep people bound together and the best way to do it is to remind them of what the dangers will be to the stability in the Far East if there is either a nuclear arms race, or somebody, you know, uses a nuclear weapon."

Nuclear tensions in Asia were heightened by North Korea's underground nuclear test Oct. 9.

DOJ_NMG_0089045

The U.N. Security Council unanimously adopted a resolution sanctioning the North for its test, but South Korea — a major aid provider to the impoverished North — has been reluctant to adopt stern measures against its volatile neighbor.

Bush spoke in an interview for broadcast on Fox News Channel's "Hannity & Colmes."

More N. Korea Nuke Tests Said Expected (AP)

By Burt Herman

AP, October 31, 2006

The top U.S. general in South Korea said Monday that more nuclear tests can be expected by North Korea as it develops its atomic weapons program, and stressed that U.S. and South Korean forces could deter any aggression.

U.S. Army General B.B. Bell didn't cite specific intelligence that another test was imminent, but said that could be expected in the future as part of North Korea's weapons program.

"I can only surmise that since they tested one, we would see at some time in the future yet another test of a nuclear device," Bell told a news conference, adding that missiles and other weapons also could be tested.

A South Korean newspaper reported that the North fired five short-range missiles during military training last week.

North Korea fired the ground-to-air and air-to-air missiles, with ranges from 6 miles to 30 miles, as part of an annual training session, the Chosun Ilbo newspaper reported, citing an unidentified South Korean government official.

The North fired a series of longer-range missiles in July, including an intercontinental ballistic missile that many believe could potentially hit the United States.

Bell said that the U.S. and South Korean allied forces could deter aggression from the North and defeat any possible attack. He argued that the North's confirmed nuclear capability since its Oct. 9 nuclear test didn't change the balance of force in the region, because intelligence agencies had believed for several years that Pyongyang had atomic weapons.

He called for a diplomatic solution to the standoff.

"I wish that North Korea would not only stop testing these devices, but stop making them and come back to the bargaining table," he said.

Bell added that the U.S. "nuclear umbrella" continues to protect the South as part of the two countries' security cooperation.

In a commentary in its main Rodong Sinmun newspaper, North Korea said the United States' nuclear weapons won't be able to protect the South but "will be a source of disaster and trouble bringing the holocaust of nuclear war."

The U.S. and South Korea have been negotiating to transfer wartime command of forces on the peninsula as part of Seoul's efforts to assume more responsibility for its own defense.

South Korea transferred control of its forces to a U.S.-led United Nations command during the 1950-1953 Korean War. Peacetime control of the Korean military was given to the South Koreans in 1994, but the United States retained control should war break out again.

At negotiations earlier this month in Washington, both sides agreed the South would assume wartime command of its own forces sometime between 2009 and 2012.

Bell said details will be decided in the first half of next year, adding that the change could take place within three years, in the earlier part of the agreed time span.

Critics of the transfer deal have said the South lacks intelligence and aerial support capabilities it needs to assume the new role.

Bell said that as the transition occurs the U.S. would provide "bridging" capabilities to help the South in areas where it is still developing its defenses — stressing that fighting capability would in no way be diminished.

He said the United States would remain in South Korea as long as it was "welcome and wanted."

DOJ_NMG_0089046

Recent comments by the South's presidential security adviser that have been perceived as anti-American have reportedly drawn criticism from U.S. officials. But Bell said the "vast majority" of South Koreans supported the country's alliance with the United States.

About 29,500 U.S. troops remain in the South, a remnant of the Korean War, which ended in a cease-fire that persists to this day. Their numbers are set to decline by several thousand in coming years.

U.S. General Denies Any Plans For Attack (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

SEOUL -- The commander of U.S. forces in South Korea said yesterday he "certainly" expects another North Korean nuclear test, but dismissed reports that his forces were preparing a pre-emptive strike on the North.

"I can only surmise that since they tested one, they will test another," Gen. Burwell B. Bell said of North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test during a press conference at Seoul's Yongsan Garrison. "But I won't speculate as to when."

The Washington Times last week quoted nuclear experts including David Albright, a former inspector for the International Atomic Energy Agency, saying technical problems encountered by the North in its first test could likely be worked out within a few months.

Gen. Bell also addressed a published report last week that said U.S. and South Korean forces were planning a pre-emptive strike against North Korea.

His forces are "not in the business of developing pre-emptive strike plans," he said, explaining that the U.S. deployment on the Korea Peninsula is defensive in nature. South Korean government sources also denied the report.

Although some observers worry that the North's nuclear test shifted the balance of power on the peninsula -- an opposition assemblyman, for example, has said the South's armored forces are incapable of operating in a nuclear environment -- Gen. Bell adamantly rejected the argument.

The United States has acted under a mutual defense treaty to extend its "nuclear umbrella" to cover South Korea, he said, while allied forces continue to "overmatch" North Korea in conventional weapons.

The general said Washington remains committed to its half-century alliance with Seoul for as long as the U.S. forces are "welcome and wanted in this country."

There has been fierce debate in South Korea about the presence of U.S. troops, particularly since two schoolgirls were killed in a traffic accident involving U.S. soldiers in 2002.

Conservatives contend that pro-North Korean agitators have been behind anti-American movements in recent years, and over the weekend five persons -- including the deputy secretary-general of the minority Democratic Labor Party and a former student activist -- were arrested on suspicion of spying for North Korea.

Gen. Bell affirmed that the wartime command of South Korean forces will be transferred from American to Korean commanders between 2009 and 2012, and predicted a timetable would be announced in the first half of 2007.

He said the United States would extend "bridging capabilities" to make sure there was no gap in command, and warned that precise timing was essential. "We cannot have any doubt of who is in charge," he said.

He added that U.S. forces in Korea were now "air- and naval-centric" with South Korean forces making up the bulk of land forces. The infantry component of the U.S. contingent has been steadily reduced in recent years.

China Cited As N. Korea Supplier (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

China helped North Korea develop nuclear weapons and in the past year increased its support to Pyongyang, rather than pressing the regime to halt nuclear arms and missile activities, according to a congressional report.

The final draft report of the U.S.-China Economic Security Review Commission also says that Chinese government-run companies are continuing to threaten U.S. national security by exporting arms to American enemies in Asia and the Middle East.

The report is based on public testimony and highly classified intelligence reports made available to its members and staff. It indirectly criticizes the Bush administration for failing to pressure Beijing into joining U.S.-led anti-proliferation programs and calls for Congress to take action to force the administration to do more.

"China has contributed at least indirectly to North Korea's nuclear program," the report stated, noting that China was a "primary supplier" to Pakistan's nuclear-arms program.

A copy of the commission's final draft report, due to be released formally next month, was made available to The Washington Times by congressional aides. Congress created the bipartisan commission of outside experts in 2000 to analyze the impact of U.S.-China relations on security and the economy.

North Korea was a recipient of nuclear goods supplied by the covert Pakistani nuclear supplier network headed by Pakistani scientist A.Q. Khan, according to the group's fourth annual report. Several links between Pakistan and North Korea's arms programs have been identified, it stated.

The unclassified version of the report does not include details of the Chinese support but notes that China has "a history" of helping North Korea develop its weapons.

According to U.S. intelligence officials, North Korean front companies operate freely in China and have used China as a transit point for trade in missile and nuclear components.

One North Korean nuclear procurement agent was identified by U.S. officials in 2002 as Yun Ho-jin, who while working in Shenyang, China, sought to buy metal rods with nuclear applications in Germany while posing as an official of the Chinese aircraft manufacturer Shenyang Aircraft Corp.

Also, Chinese language documents on how to design a small nuclear warhead for a missile were discovered by U.S. intelligence officials in Libya after Tripoli agreed to dismantle its nuclear program.

China's government has not explained how the warhead documents reached Libya. U.S. officials think the warhead documents likely were sold by the Khan network and were also supplied to Iran and North Korea.

On China's failure to pressure North Korea, the commission report said that China has refused to exert economic pressure and "instead has actually increased its assistance and trade with North Korea."

Disclosure of the report comes as China last week refused to join the U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative (PSI), which the Bush administration hopes to use in enforcing U.N. Security Council resolutions aimed at halting North Korean trade in illicit arms-related goods.

The Chinese turned down an appeal from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice during her recent visit to Beijing to join PSI. The refusal raises questions about whether China will cooperate in a United Nations embargo against weapons and technology going in and out of North Korea.

Administration officials have praised China for supporting U.S. efforts to curb North Korea's arms programs. However, the report makes clear that Chinese cooperation is limited.

On China's role in arms proliferation, the report stated that Chinese companies and government organizations "continue to provide weapons, weapons components and weapons technology" in violation of China's commitments to international nonproliferation agreements.

The arms transfers "harm regional security in East Asia and the Middle East," the report said.

"Given strong U.S. interests in both regions, China's proliferation threatens U.S. security and potentially could place at risk U.S. troops operating in those regions," the report said.

The report also raises questions about whether China is willing to play a responsible role in working for global peace and stability. Beijing's support for World Trade Organization commitments is "spotty and halting," it said.

"And China's apparent willingness to value its own energy needs above the needs of international security is indicative of a nation as yet unprepared or unwilling to shoulder the burdens of a stakeholder state," it said.

The report recommends that Congress take steps to pressure China into joining the PSI, and calls on Congress to press President Bush to force China to carry out both sea and land inspections of weapons related goods going in and out of North Korea under U.N. Security Council Resolution 1718.

The report recommends tightening sanctions on Chinese companies engaged in illicit arms sales, and says Congress should also require the president to provide regular reports identifying what actions China has taken to curb North Korean and Iranian nuclear activities.

China May Be Using Oil To Press North Korea (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 30 — China cut off oil exports to North Korea in September during heightened tension over North Korea's nuclear and missile programs, Chinese trade statistics show.

The unusual move — the figures show China sold no crude oil at all to its neighbor in September — reduced sales for the year by about 7 percent from the similar period in 2005. China's oil exports to North Korea, though uneven, had been averaging about 12,300 barrels a day.

North Korea depends on China for up to 90 percent of its oil supplies, much of which is sold on credit or for bartered goods, according to Chinese energy experts. Any sustained reduction could cripple its isolated and struggling economy.

There is no clear indication that the September figures represent a policy shift by China on providing vital food and fuel supplies to its neighbor and ally in the Korean War. North Korea conducted a nuclear test on Oct. 9, after the period covered by the latest customs data.

But North Korea tested ballistic missiles in July, defying sharp warnings from Beijing. China supported a United Nations resolution condemning the missile tests, and urged that North Korea not take any steps that might "worsen tensions."

China did not announce a reduction in oil exports. The figures were released normally by the customs administration, and the drop in supplies was first reported by [a news wire].

It remains possible the statistics are an anomaly or that supplies were cut because North Korea did not need more oil in September. Officials at the China National Petroleum Corporation, which sells oil and manages an oil pipeline to North Korea, declined to comment.

But several analysts said the reduction suggested that Beijing was using crude oil as leverage to press North Korea to resume negotiations over its nuclear program.

"It is a sharp and sudden reduction at a sensitive time, so political considerations cannot be ruled out," said He Jun, a Beijing-based energy expert and consultant. "China could be sending a clear signal."

If that analysis is correct, it suggests that Beijing may seek to punish North Korea in a variety of ways, both open and unspoken, in the aftermath of its nuclear test.

Although China has long protected North Korea against outside pressure, analysts said the nuclear test surprised and angered the Chinese leadership. Many here considered North Korea's nuclear technology primitive and argued that the country was using the threat of developing atomic bombs as an economic bargaining chip.

China took the unusual step of supporting United Nations sanctions on North Korea after the test. The sanctions restrict sales of military equipment to the North and allow inspections of North Korean cargo.

Both China and South Korea, North Korea's main trading partners, have opposed restrictions on economic ties. They have interpreted the United Nations sanctions narrowly and declined to intercept North Korea cargo at sea, as the Bush administration suggested might be necessary to prevent exports of nuclear material.

But last spring Beijing followed Washington's lead in freezing North Korean assets that the Treasury Department identified as connected to money laundering, according to Bush administration officials. Chinese officials never announced that they had done so, suggesting that they take some tough actions quietly.

Chinese experts on North Korea who took part in discussions of the nuclear issue this month said officials had discussed reducing oil shipments if North Korea continued to defy the outside world. Beijing's response would be especially sharp if North Korea conducted more nuclear tests or declined to resume negotiations about dismantling its nuclear program, these experts said.

If Beijing was already using oil to warn North Korea in September, its response to the October test could be more severe.

DOJ_NMG_0089049

"I doubt you would see them cutting down on grain shipments, because that affects directly the lives of North Korea's people," said Han Xiaoping, who follows China's energy industry for the Beijing Qunying Enterprise Company. "My own feeling is that North Korea cannot expect normal supplies of crude in this environment."

China's crude oil exports, once robust, have fallen sharply in recent years, as it uses more domestic oil to power its surging economy. Beijing has already become the world's second largest oil importer after the United States, but still exports a small part of what it produces.

North Korea has remained a consistent customer even as China has stopped selling oil to some other countries. Volumes of oil shipped to the North varied in the past year from as low as 7,400 barrels a day to as high as 24,600.

The exception this year and last was February, when China celebrated its extended lunar New Year holiday. North Korea and other customers, including Japan, Malaysia, Thailand and Australia, got no Chinese oil supplies during that month in either year, customs figures show.

In September, China exported 125,185 tons of crude, the equivalent of 30,780 barrels a day, for a reported value of $62 million. All of that was exported to the United States, with North Korea receiving nothing.

For the first nine months of 2006, China exported 370,000 tons of crude to North Korea, valued by customs data at $176 million. That represented a 7 percent decline in volume but a 21 percent increase in value, according to the export prices recorded by Chinese customs.

Oil industry experts say the published price for the oil does not reflect discounts that China offers.

Meeting Held On Stopping Nuke Terrorism (AP)

By John Thorne

AP, October 31, 2006

The world's five leading nuclear powers and seven other nations kicked off a new program Monday aimed at keeping nuclear weapons beyond the reach of terrorists.

Amid the global concerns over North Korea's test of an atomic bomb and suspicions Iran is trying to develop such weapons, delegations from the United States and the other states said it was paramount for the world to guard against terrorist groups joining the hunt.

"The concern is fundamental — we must stop terrorists from acquiring" nuclear weapons, said Robert Joseph, U.S. undersecretary of state for arms control and international security.

The world's five leading nuclear powers — the United States, Russia, China, Britain and France — form the core of the new Global Initiative to Combat Nuclear Terrorism.

Those five plus Italy, Japan, Canada, China, Turkey, Kazakhstan, Australia and Morocco signed two agreements on common principles and "terms of reference" that were not immediately made public after the start of the two-day meeting in Rabat.

The initiative aims to provide guidelines for keeping track of radioactive materials, ensuring the safety of nuclear facilities, and combating illicit trafficking that could deliver nuclear materials into the hands of terrorists.

While Russia and the United States have been at odds on how to rein in Iran's suspect nuclear program, the two countries combined to provide the impetus for this international effort to keep atomic arms from terrorist groups.

They hope the initiative will lead to better security for the world's nuclear materials and knowledge.

"It's about galvanizing the elements in the world to protect ... people from one of the most dangerous threats we face," Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Sergei Kislyak said.

"We do agree on some things. We have disagreements and nuances on others," he added, referring to the United States and dealing with North Korea and Iran. "I think we will work together, but we might disagree on the technique."

A senior Western diplomat said the meeting was an important sign of cooperation between Americans and Russians in an area where they haven't always seen eye-to-eye, particularly over whether to impose sanctions on Iran.

The U.S. and its allies are seeking to force the Iranians to halt uranium enrichment, which can produce material for fueling nuclear reactors but also for nuclear warheads.

Russia and China, which have economic links to Iran, have shied away from imposing punitive measures. Iran insists its nuclear effort is solely aimed at using reactors to generate electricity.

The diplomat, who agreed to discuss the meeting only on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity, said the initiative's sponsors hope to prevent nuclear terrorism by doing more to curtail terrorist financing and improving safeguards for radioactive materials, from naturally occurring sources to hospital equipment.

President Bush and his Russian counterpart, Vladimir Putin, announced the initiative July 15 at the Group of Eight summit in St. Petersburg, Russia.

In a statement, the two leaders urged like-minded countries to expand joint efforts to "combat nuclear terrorism on a determined and systematic basis."

Bolton Faults Syria, Iran On Lebanon (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, October 31, 2006

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton accused Syria and Iran on Monday of trying to destabilize Lebanon's democratically elected government by violating a U.N. arms embargo.

Bolton stressed that Syria's obligations to respect a U.N. arms embargo authorized by the Security Council resolution that ended the 34-day Israeli-Hezbollah conflict in August "are particularly important as it is the one country other than Israel that borders Lebanon."

Syria and Iran are supporters of Hezbollah, providing weaponry, training and funding to the group.

He called on Syrian President Bashar Assad to abide by the commitment he made to Secretary-General Kofi Annan to support the resolution and the arms embargo.

In a speech to the U.N. Security Council, Bolton welcomed the Lebanese government's extension of its authority throughout the south of the country for the first time in almost 40 years and its deployment along the eastern part of the U.N.-drawn boundary with Israel and the border with Syria.

"Despite this advance, we continue to be concerned that Syria and Iran are actively trying to destabilize the democratically elected government of Lebanon ...," he said. "We call on Syria and Iran to abide by their obligations to respect Lebanon's sovereignty, territorial integrity, unity and political independence."

Syria's U.N. Ambassador Bashar Ja'afari told reporters his country was fully complying with the arms embargo and all U.N. resolutions. The Lebanese defense and foreign ministers and a Lebanese intelligence chief had denied reports of Syrian violations, he told Al-Arabiya television.

The spokesman for Iran's U.N. Mission was unavailable for comment.

But Terje Roed-Larsen, the top U.N. envoy for Syria-Lebanon issues, said representatives of the Lebanese government "have stated publicly and also in conversations with us that there has been arms coming across the border into Lebanon."

The U.N. has not received any information on quantities and types of weapons or where they come from, however.

Bolton said Roed Larsen told the U.N. Security Council "that the government was afraid to be specific about these arms coming across the Syrian-Lebanese border because of the fear of retaliation."

Roed-Larsen, when asked about Bolton's comments, said he had no specific information about threats of retaliation. But he said there had been 14 assassinations and assassination attempts in Lebanon since the February 2005 killing of former prime minister Rafik Hariri in Beirut.

Israel has said enforcement of the arms embargo, which blocks any entity in Lebanon except the national government from obtaining weapons from abroad, is crucial.

Bolton's made his remarks to the closed-door council meeting on implementation of Resolution 1559, which was adopted in September 2004 and called for the extension of Lebanese authority throughout the south and the disarming of all militias in the country.

The Security Council said in a presidential statement at the end of the meeting that "important progress" has been made toward the implementation of the resolution, particularly through the deployment of the Lebanese army in the south.

But the council also noted that some provisions of the resolution have yet to be implemented, namely the disbanding of militias, strict respect for Lebanon's "sovereignty, territorial integrity, unity and political independence," and free and fair presidential elections "without any foreign interference and influence."

In his report to the council earlier this month on implementation of 1559, Annan said Lebanon should seize the opportunity resulting from the end of the Israel-Hezbollah conflict by establishing diplomatic relations with Syria and resolving the dispute over Chebaa Farms, a plot of land along its border with Israel and Syria.

Syrian troops only withdrew from Lebanese territory the assassination of Hariri, a longtime opponent of Syria, provoked an outcry that eventually forced Syria to relent.

Chebaa Farms was captured by Israel when its forces seized Syria's Golan Heights in the 1967 Middle East war.

The United Nations determined that the area is Syrian, and that Syria and Israel should negotiate its fate. But Lebanon claims the Chebaa Farms — a claim backed by Syria — and Hezbollah continues to fight over the disputed land, arguing that Israel's occupation justifies its "resistance."

Roed Larsen called the issue "very complex," saying U.N. cartographers are working "full speed" to analyze what the territory encompasses.

Olmert Says Israel May Widen Military Role In Gaza (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 30 — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel said Monday that the Israeli military might expand operations in the Gaza Strip in an attempt to halt Palestinian rocket fire, but that there was no intention to reoccupy the territory.

His comments came on another day of turmoil, in which Palestinian gunmen kidnapped a Spanish aid worker in southern Gaza and held him for several hours before releasing him, and a Palestinian militant was killed in northern Gaza in disputed circumstances.

In a closed session with a parliamentary committee, Mr. Olmert was asked about the military's plans for Gaza. Israeli forces, which re-entered the territory in late June after an Israeli soldier was seized, have been clashing with Palestinian militants almost daily. Several Israeli political and military officials have hinted recently that a larger operation could be coming.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Olmert, Miri Eisin, who was at the parliamentary session, quoted the prime minister as saying: "We aren't going to reoccupy Gaza. But we will continue to fight terror, and there may be a change in the level of forces there at any given time."

Mr. Olmert also said the military killed about 300 armed Palestinians in the past four months, according to Ms. Eisin. Monitoring groups have said that more than 250 Palestinians were killed during this time, about half militants and half civilians. Two Israeli soldiers were killed in the fighting.

In Gaza City, Ismail Haniya, the Palestinian Authority prime minister, said, "We call on the international community to intervene immediately to halt the Israeli aggression."

On Monday, Mazen Abu Oudah, 20, a member of Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, was killed by Israeli fire near the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanun, according to Palestinian medical workers. However, the Israeli military said it had not been involved in any shooting in the area.

Also, Palestinians fired two rockets into southern Israel on Monday, Israeli officials said, but they caused no damage or injuries.

Palestinian gunmen kidnapped Roberto Vila, 34, a Spaniard who works for a Spanish aid group, according to Palestinian security officials and news media reports. He was freed unharmed late Monday night, according to Palestinian television.

In Israeli politics, Mr. Olmert's cabinet and the Parliament approved the inclusion of Israel Beiteinu, a far-right party, in the governing coalition. Mr. Olmert's coalition now controls 78 of the 120 seats in Parliament, and the increased majority is intended to make the government more stable.

However, with parties from the right, left and center, as well as a religious party, the coalition is so broad that the factions have little common ground on many issues, such as how to deal with the Palestinians.

Ophir Pines-Paz, the minister of science, culture and sports, who is from the left-leaning Labor Party, voted against including the new faction and announced that he was resigning as a cabinet minister.

Mideast Governments Watching U.S. Vote (AP)

By Robert H. Reid

AP, October 30, 2006

Arab governments are looking for change in U.S. policy in the Middle East after the midterm elections, hoping a politically weakened President Bush will talk with Iran and Syria, show greater interest in the Palestinians and find a way out of the crisis in Iraq.

Israel too is watching for any sign of change in U.S. strategy — especially toward the Palestinians, Syria and Iran.

"The whole region is volatile and it cannot face more problems and challenges," Arab League official Hesham Youssef said in a recent interview. "They cannot leave it like this, neither in Iraq nor in Gaza nor in Lebanon. More conflicts could be ahead."

The Bush administration came into office in 2001 committed to reshaping the political map of the Middle East, which was suffering from authoritarian regimes, Islamic extremism, the conflict with Israel and sluggish economies.

Bush has spoken repeatedly of his dream of creating a new Middle East. But five years later, most analysts believe few things have improved. And, U.S. influence in the region is at a low point, in part because despite Saddam Hussein's overthrow, Iraq has never stabilized.

A June poll by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press found that less than one-third of the people in Egypt, Jordan, Pakistan and Turkey had a favorable view of the United States.

"Virtually everything is worse than it was five years ago," said Jon Alterman, a Middle East analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "Iraq is worse, the Palestinian issue is worse, Iran is worse."

Many Arabs blame on the Bush administration, citing the war in Iraq especially, but also unqualified support for Israel in the battle against Hezbollah in Lebanon and inattention to the Palestinians.

Democracy efforts have stalled. Non-democratic but pro-U.S. governments in Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan now largely shrug off the administration's campaign for strong steps toward democracy.

The victory by the Islamic militant Hamas group in Palestinian elections last January gave a boost to arguments that stability was more important than democracy. And the biggest democratic experiment of all — Iraq — has degenerated into a vicious sectarian war.

"If the U.S. is going to help itself, its policy needs to change in the Middle East," the Saudi ambassador to the U.S., Turki al-Faisal, said Monday in Washington. He urged the U.S. to start by pressing Israel to relinquish all occupied Arab land — and Jerusalem — to the Palestinians.

Many Arab officials question, however, whether the Democrats have better answers to the region's problems. They consider the Democrats traditionally more supportive of Israel than the GOP is. Even as they eye the possible political upheaval in the United States, Arab countries like Egypt and Saudi Arabia are maintaining close ties to the Bush administration.

"At the level of those who follow politics closely, there is fear that if the Democrats win, there will be an imbalance in foreign policy," said Kuwaiti analyst Ayed al-Mannah. "Support for moderate forces and governments ... will be weakened."

Still, the belief is that heavy Republican losses in the House and Senate will force the administration into a major re-evaluation of policy, especially over Iraq. To that end, Arab governments are looking to the forthcoming recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group as a catalyst.

After the elections, the group headed by former Secretary of State James Baker, a Republican, and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, a Democrat, plans to announce recommendations on Iraq.

It's unclear what the group will recommend, but Baker has publicly questioned the administration's policy of not talking to Iran or Syria. Both countries have influence with Iraqi armed groups.

DOJ_NMG_0089053

Contacts with Syria would have to be done carefully to avoid undercutting the fragile government in neighboring Lebanon, which fears Syrian influence, or Saudi Arabia, with whom Damascus' relations are frosty.

Saudi Arabia "has no problem with contact if it's going to lead somewhere" an Arab diplomat familiar with the kingdom said. But indications at the moment are that contacts with Damascus would not produce results, said the diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to speak for the kingdom.

It remains unclear if the Bush administration would be willing to engage in talks on a range of issues with Iran and Syria. And contacts alone are unlikely to produce quick results. The United States has no diplomatic relations with Iran, which turned down U.S. offers for talks on Iraq this year.

The Iranians would doubtless seek U.S. acceptance of their nuclear program, which they say is for peaceful purposes — something the United States is highly unlikely to do because it suspects Iran wants an atomic bomb.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad alluded to this in a speech Monday, telling the Americans "you need someone to save you from the sadness of the Iraqi quagmire and then you threaten us" with sanctions.

Syria would likely press for an end to the investigation into the assassination of a former Lebanese prime minister and a tacit U.S. acceptance of Syrian influence in Lebanon — a move that could undermine pro-democracy forces in Lebanon.

Syria and Iran also hold the key to the Palestinian issue — more so even than in the past. Both countries are believed to be blocking efforts to replace the Hamas-led government in Gaza with technocrats — a step many feel is necessary before any peace moves could happen.

Traditionally, the Americans have worked with their moderate Arab allies, Egypt and Jordan, to influence the Palestinians. But Jordan never had influence with Hamas and some fear Egypt's influence with the militant group is now low — creating the push to talk directly with Syria and Iran.

"No quick or easy fixes exist to solve the problems of this critical region," Richard Haass of the Council on Foreign Relations wrote in The Financial Times. "The Middle East will remain a troubled and troubling part of the world for decades to come."

US Must Press Israel: Saudi Ambassador (AFP)

AFP, October 31, 2006

Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the United States firmly urged the Bush administration to push Israel into opening final peace talks with the Palestinians.

Prince Turki al-Faisal told a conference on Washington's relations with the Arab world that the United States was the only nation with the power to jolt the stalled international roadmap to Middle East peace into motion.

"We want you to remain friends with Israel, we have no objection to that," Prince Turki said.

"But that friendship should be used to push Israel to engage in the peace process," he added, rejecting arguments that political conditions in the volatile region were currently too inflamed to permit negotiations.

"These excuses will continue ... we have heard them for the last 50 years," Prince Turki said.

"Implementation should be done now. The United States devised the roadmap, it needs to implement it," he said.

"The United States is the only country that can do the right thing for everybody in the Middle East," Prince Turki told the conference of the National Council on US-Arab Relations.

"The United States has been engaged and enmeshed in our political situation for the last 50 years or so, whether it likes it or not," he said.

The Bush administration has been less willing than many of its predecessors to engage in nuts and bolts peacemaking between Israel and the Palestinians -- despite calling for the formation of a Palestinian state.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice returned from her sixth visit to Israel and the Palestinian territories earlier this month, but failed to break the peacemaking stalemate.

The process has been frozen since the radical Islamic movement Hamas, which refuses to accept Israel's right to exist and is listed as a terrorist organisation by Europe and in Washington, won legislative elections in January and gained control of the Palestinian government.

DOJ_NMG_0089054

The international "roadmap" to peace was designed by the so-called Middle East quartet of the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations.

It was announced in 2003, with the aim of establishing by 2005 a viable Palestinian state living alongside Israel in peace.

Bush To Meet US Sudan Envoy Tuesday (AFP)

AFP, October 31, 2006

US President George W. Bush will meet his special envoy for Sudan, Andrew Natsios, on Tuesday, to get an update on efforts to end violence in Darfur, the White House said.

Bush and Natsios were to meet in the Oval Office at 9:00 am (1400 GMT) to discuss the humanitarian crisis in the war-wracked Darfur region amid stalled attempts to bolster an international peacekeeping presence there.

"The president will meet with his special envoy for Sudan, Andrew Nastios, to receive a report from Mister Natsios and to discuss the way forward," said a spokesman for Bush's national security council, Gordon Johndroe.

The meet comes roughly one week after US national security adviser Stephen Hadley, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Natsios, and Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Jendayi Frazer held talks on Darfur at the White House.

Natsios recently returned from Egypt after a week-long visit to Sudan, his first since Bush named him his special envoy for Darfur in September.

The UN Security Council adopted a resolution on August 31 calling for the deployment of up to 20,000 peacekeepers to replace an embattled African Union contingent that has failed to restore peace and stability in Darfur.

At least 200,000 people have died as a result of fighting, famine and disease, and more than two million have fled their homes since rebels launched an uprising in Darfur in early 2003, prompting a scorched-earth response from the military and militia allies.

Sudanese President Omar al-Beshir has rejected deployment of UN forces, charging the plan was part of a US-engineered plot to invade and plunder resources.

Russian, U.S. Military Chiefs Ink Pact (AP)

AP, October 31, 2006

The top Russian and U.S. military officers signed a cooperation agreement Monday that lays out plans for joint activities for the coming year, officials said.

Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said he and Gen. Yuri Baluyevsky, his Russian counterpart, signed the document, but did not disclose details of the proposals.

"I came to listen and learn about ways we can do good military-to-military for both Russia and the United States," said Pace, who was making his first appearance in Moscow since becoming chairman of the joint chiefs.

Baluyevsky said the Russian and U.S. analysis of many issues was "very close" but he and Pace would discuss "problems to which ... we must find solutions and adopt these solutions as quickly as possible."

Pace said he had no doubt that "together we can find proper solutions."

"I am anxious for military-to-military cooperation to show through its transparency the potential for our two nations to walk into the future hand in hand," Pace said.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said the former Cold War foes bear the brunt of responsibility for 'supporting strategic security in the world.

"This is a unique responsibility, and other countries look to us with the hope that we will continue to support it," Lavrov said after meeting with Pace.

Earlier, Pace lay a wreath at the tomb of the unknown soldier and called the experience "a very poignant reminder to me of the very special relationship our two nations have had for many years."

Russia has been highly critical of the American-led campaign in Iraq, while the U.S. has criticized Russia's cooperation with Iran despite that country's alleged nuclear weapons program. Russia has also objected to U.S. plans to deploy missile defenses in NATO nations in Eastern Europe.

US And Russia Miss Deadline On Trade (FT)

By Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

The US and Russia are close to a bilateral trade agreement that would remove a big hurdle to Russia's entry into the World Trade Organisation, but Tuesday's self-imposed deadline will not be met, US trade officials said on Monday.

"Both sides believe we are close, and we fully expect to continue our close co-operation to reach an agreement," the US trade representative's office said. However, Russian media reports did not indicate the two sides were on the threshold of an agreement.

The two failed to complete the stalled trade accord in time for the Group of Eight summit in St Petersburg in July, and set an informal end-of-October deadline for their negotiating teams.

With relations under strain on a number of fronts – notably over Georgia, energy and Iran – Presidents George W. Bush and Vladimir Putin would like to salvage something from a once-close relationship by the time of their next meeting, in mid-November during the Asia Pacific Economic Co-operation summit in Vietnam.

US trade officials would not say what issues remained unresolved following a week of talks in Washington with Maxim Medvedkov, Russia's chief WTO negotiator.

Russia's weak enforcement of existing intellectual property laws, access to its financial markets and imports of US beef and pork had been among issues under dispute.

US businesses are lobbying the Bush administration to complete a deal as soon as possible, concerned they are losing out to European competition. A dozen US companies wrote to both presidents last week urging them to complete the talks.

Moscow's frustration over the delays is believed to have been a factor behind its decision this month to snub foreign partners and give its own Gazprom full control of the development of the Shtokman natural gas fields.

Even if the US and Russia do overcome the technical difficulties blocking a bilateral trade deal, the Bush administration has to persuade a sceptical Congress to exempt Russia from the Jackson-Vanik amendment for the trade deal to become law.

The amendment to the 1974 Trade Act denies normal trade relations to countries that do not have market economies or restrict emigration rights.

Although Russia meets the required conditions, Nikolas Gvosdev, editor of the National Interest in Washington, doubts that a weakened US president has the political capital to win over Congress, where many representatives have reservations over Russia's political direction.

"I see no effort by the administration to even begin prepping Congress to move forward on this," Mr Gvosdev said.

Report Puts Turkey's EU Hopes In Jeopardy (FT)

By Daniel Dombey In London And Fidelius Schmid In Brussels

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

Turkey's bid for European Union membership will be dealt a fresh blow next week when an official report will slate Ankara for failing to make enough progress on freedom of expression, curbing the use of torture and establishing civilian control over the military.

The draft European Commission report, obtained by FT Deutschland, the FT's sister paper, comes at a particularly sensitive time, with EU officials struggling to keep the accession talks alive.

Some EU member states, including the UK, fear that the pro-European consensus within Turkey may be fragmenting, and that the debate within the union on future enlargement has had the effect of alienating Turks, rather than encouraged reform.

"We would have hoped that Turkey would have delivered a lot more during the past 18 months, certainly since the beginning of negotiations in October last year," said one EU official. "If Turkey had been moving more, if there was greater freedom of expression, if there wasn't any torture, things would be a lot more promising."

Instead, the debate over Turkey's accession will come to a head at an EU summit in December, when Ankara will be judged both for its reaction to an EU deadline to open up its ports to ships from Cyprus – which so far it has refused to do – and to its broader reform record.

The Commission's report faults Ankara for failing to allow access to Cypriot ships, which it states infringes the EU's customs union agreement with Turkey. It is this issue that could formally halt negotiations, since as an EU member state, Cyprus wields a veto over Turkey's possible accession.

However, Turkey's reform record will also set the mood in December.

"Turkey needs to relaunch the reform process with full determination," Olli Rehn, the EU's enlargement Commissioner said last week, urging EU member states to focus on the issue.

The draft report, which Mr Rehn will present in its final form next week, says that "prosecutions and convictions for the expression of non-violent opinion...are a cause for serious concern." It cites the example of a journalist who was given a suspended six months prison sentence for articles he wrote on Armenian identity.

Recep Tayyip Erdogan, Turkey's prime minister, said at the weekend that he had no plans to change the article of the penal code used in such cases, which makes it a crime to insult the Turkish state. "On this matter, there is no work in hand," he said.

The Commisison draft adds that "cases of torture and ill treatment are still being reported, in particular outside detention centres," although it also notes a diminution in the incidence of torture.

"The armed forces have continued to exercise significant political influence," the report also says, citing statements made by senior military officials on Cyprus, secularism and the country's Kurdish minority.

The draft report faults Turkey for corruption, insufficient independence of the judiciary, and inadequate protection of minority rights.

However, it does commend Ankara for training the judiciary and for its steps towards establishing an ombudsman to help citizens win redress against the government.

Rumsfeld Hosts Turkish Defense Secretary For Wide-ranging Talks (IHT/AP)

International Herald Tribune/AP, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld thanked his Turkish counterpart Monday for NATO ally Turkey's support for the anti-terror operation in Afghanistan and the reconstruction effort in northern Iraq, the Defense Department said.

Navy Lt. Cmdr. Joe Carpenter, a Defense spokesman, said Rumsfeld and Turkish Defense Minister Vecdi Gonul discussed a variety of subjects in their Pentagon meeting, in which Rumsfeld's deputy secretary, Gordon England, participated.

Turkey, which is working hard to bring about changes in its system demanded by the European Union before it is brought into that grouping, already is an active NATO member. Besides its contingent of 475 troops in NATO's Afghanistan force, it has 400 troops with the NATO peacekeepers in Kosovo and 300 with Operation Active Endeavor, the alliance's Mediterranean naval arm.

It is the only country with a Muslim majority in NATO and has close ties not only with the United States but with Israel as well.

Other items on the Rumsfeld-Gonul agenda included Turkey's support for the U.S.-sponsored Proliferation Security Initiative against the spread of weapons of mass destruction; the NATO summit scheduled Nov. 28-29 in Riga, Latvia; regional security, including arms sales and defense cooperation; and other NATO issues.

Turkey has a major interest in the northern Iraq question, where Iraqis of the Kurdish ethnic group live. Even under former Iraq President Saddam Hussein, the Kurds lived in a near-autonomous system.

Those Kurds are cousins of the Kurds of eastern Turkey, where the Kurdistan Workers Party, or PKK, has waged since 1984 a rebellion for autonomy that has killed around 37,000 people.

Early this year the Turks accused the Iraqi Kurds of providing havens for PKK fighters on the run from Turkish pursuers and issued veiled threats to cross into Iraqi Kurdistan to destroy the rebels.

The situation became so touchy that the United States warned against Turkish movements into Iraq. Then President George W. Bush appointed a special envoy on the PKK problem, who made his first trip this month.

UK To Ease Issuance Of 'Islamic Bonds' (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0089057

By Gillian Tett In London

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

Britain looks set to become the first western country to introduce a regulatory regime to support the domestic issuance of sukuk – so-called "Islamic bonds", or those which do not pay overt interest.

The move is intended to ensure that companies in London can issue sukuk as easily as traditional corporate bonds, boosting the City of London's role in this fast-growing sector of the global capital markets.

"We are looking to place domestic sukuk on the same footing as conventional products," said Ed Balls, economic secretary to the UK Treasury. "Now that 85 per cent of all bonds issued in the [Gulf region] are sukuk, it is important that London is in a position to compete."

The UK hopes to introduce the new framework to support the issuance of sukuk in London next year, via parliamentary legislation.

The legislation would clarify that a sukuk can be treated as debt finance, so that issuers can set the interest payments against their profits for corporation tax purposes.

At present there is no guidance on how capital gains tax and capital allowances apply to sukuk – which has left UK companies nervous of issuing them in London, in case they would subsequently be liable for a large tax bill.

The move comes at a time of rapid growth in the global Islamic finance business, amid rising religious sentiment among Muslim investors and issuers and the growing oil-fuelled wealth of regions, such as the Gulf.

It also comes as the British government is eager to demonstrate its support for Islamic finance – and London's role in this sector.

This stance is a marked contrast to the attitude taken by the US authorities. However, the City's embrace of Islamic finance partly reflects hopes among senior British politicians that the sector could help build bridges with the Muslim world.

Meanwhile, City institutions are now scrambling to win lucrative business from the Middle East, including mandates from companies to issue sukuk.

London-based banks have already played a leading role in developing the sukuk market, which is now estimated to be worth $45bn globally, from almost nothing five years ago. But until now, all sukuk have been issued offshore, because the tax regime in London was unfavourable.

Separately, the Lord Mayor of London will on Tuesday unveil an initiative to create one of the first set of formal financial qualifications for Islamic financial scholars in the world. The study programme, which has been developed with the blessing of senior figures in the City and Lebanon's central bank, will train scholars in Islamic law and finance .

Pay Now Or Later For Warming, Study Says (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

London — A major study issued Monday concludes that without rapid and substantial spending, global warming will reduce worldwide productivity on the scale of the Great Depression, devastate food sources, cause widespread deaths and create hundreds of millions of refugees.

The report commissioned by the British government, which officials called the most comprehensive review of the economics of climate change, warns that failure to act could cost up to 20% a year in lost income worldwide. Acting now, however, could bring about meaningful control of greenhouse gases at an annual cost of 1% of global gross domestic product, it says.

The findings appear to counter the long-standing argument of the Bush administration that controlling greenhouse gases is costly and possibly ineffective.

However, the savings would occur only with the kind of rapid and comprehensive international cooperation on the issue that so far has proved elusive.

DOJ_NMG_0089058

British officials said they would take immediate action to legislate carbon-reduction targets, push expanded international carbon-trading programs and move toward reducing carbon emissions in Europe by 30% by 2020 and 60% by 2050. Carbon trading allows companies to exceed emission limits by buying credits from those that are below their emission targets.

Prime Minister Tony Blair, calling the report by senior government economist Nicholas Stern "a landmark in the struggle against climate change," warned that there was a limit to what Britain alone could do.

"Britain is more than playing its part," Blair said. "But it is 2% of worldwide emissions. Close down all of Britain's emissions and in less than two years, just the growth in China's emissions would wipe out the difference. So this issue is the definition of global interdependence."

But the report's findings show that "if the science is right, the consequences for our planet are literally disastrous," Blair said. "And this disaster is not set to happen in some science-fiction future, many years ahead, but in our lifetime."

In Washington, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the lead U.S. agency on global warming, had no immediate comment on the British report. Agency spokesperson Jana Goldman said officials could not react to the report until they had read it.

The report examines the consequences of acting — or failing to act — to control rising temperatures due to greenhouse gases from deforestation and fossil fuels.

The current level of greenhouse gases is already 54% higher than it was before the Industrial Revolution, and could be double that level as early as 2035, the report suggests. Such an increase could raise temperatures by more than 3.6 degrees Fahrenheit by mid-century and a disastrous 9 degrees by century's end, it says.

The result would be melting glaciers that trigger floods and reduce snowpacks that supply drinking water, threatening a sixth of the world's population, the report says. Other effects would include reduced crop yields, leaving hundreds of millions of people unable to produce or purchase sufficient food; an increase in vector-borne diseases; up to 200 million people displaced because of rising sea levels and drought; and the possible extinction of 15% to 40% of species.

"The report sets out I think very clearly that this is not just an environmental issue, or even just an economic issue, but it is a security issue," Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said. "There are some people all over the world who still believe there can be some kind of trade-off between economic and climate security. I think this report knocks [that notion] on its head."

Stern, a former chief economist for the World Bank, said the study found that it was still possible to achieve meaningful temperature controls at a cost equivalent to consumers paying an average of 1% more for everything they buy, and substantially less than the cost of failing to act.

"That's manageable," Stern said. "We can grow and be green."

The report calls for using taxes and regulations to make carbon use more costly, policies supporting low-carbon technology, and changing the public's attitude toward energy efficiency.

Air carriers and utilities could be among those hit hardest by any new emissions-reduction laws. Already, Britons are looking at a possible end to bargain-basement fares to the Continent and higher prices for out-of-season and exotic vegetables from the tropics.

Poor countries will bear the brunt of the effects of climate change, the report says, but it suggests that rich countries must bear 60% to 80% of the responsibility for emissions reductions.

"The conclusion of the review is essentially optimistic. There is still time to avoid the worst impacts of climate change if we act now and act internationally," Stern said. "But the task is urgent. Delaying action, even by a decade or two, will take us into dangerous territory. We must not let this window of opportunity close."

British Alarmed By Global Warming Financial Risks Cited; Gore Named Adviser (AJC)

By Shelley Emling

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089059

London — The British government warned Monday of an economic catastrophe if the United States and other large countries fail to quickly cut emissions of the gases blamed for global warming, and Britain named former U.S. Vice President Al Gore as its adviser on the issue.

"If the science is right, the consequences for our planet are literally disastrous," Prime Minister Tony Blair said in releasing the report. "This disaster is not set to happen in some science-fiction future many years ahead, but in our lifetime."

Highlighting the different path that Blair has chosen on climate change from that of President Bush, British officials announced Monday that Gore would offer advice on the issue.

A 600-page report by former World Bank chief economist Sir Nicholas Stern predicted that unchecked global warming would eventually cost the world between 5 percent and 20 percent of its gross domestic product each year, an impact comparable to that of the Great Depression of the 1930s.

It said the costs would come from effects such as rising sea levels, declining crop yields, drinking water shortages, higher death tolls from malnutrition and heat stress, and widespread outbreaks of malaria and dengue fever.

By contrast, taking the steps needed now to reduce greenhouse gas emissions would cost about 1 percent of global GDP each year, the report said.

Earlier, Blair and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California reached an agreement on a joint market for greenhouse gases that will lead to first-in-the-nation emissions caps being placed on California's utilities, refineries, and factories.

David Miliband, Britain's environment secretary, also announced Monday that the government soon would introduce a new global warming law that could include "green taxes," such as a new sales tax on airline flights.

He said families might also have to pay more to drive cars and run energy-wasting appliances.

Although Blair said disaster could be averted only if the world's major nations joined in "bold and decisive action," several British politicians expressed doubt that the U.S. government would be receptive to schemes designed to cut emissions that scientists blame for rapidly warming the planet.

UK Pushes For New Climate Change Treaty (FT)

By Christopher Adams and Fiona Harvey In London

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

A new European push for a successor international treaty to the Kyoto protocol was heralded on Monday with the publication in Britain of a government report calling for rapid action to tackle global warming while the economic cost of doing so was still manageable.

The report for the first time attempts to quantify the economic cost of taking action now – which it said would be just 1 per cent of world economic output by 2050 – against the cost of a failure to act, which it said would knock between 5 and 20 per cent off world consumption.

Tony Blair, British prime minister, is set to use the review by Sir Nicholas Stern, former World Bank chief economist, to announce a dramatic change to his stance on environment policy by calling for a new treaty that could set binding targets for carbon emissions.

In the past two years, Mr Blair has written off the prospect for signing a “Kyoto II” treaty, acknowledging strong US opposition to any attempt to impose emission targets.

But he will now try and inject fresh life into stalled talks on a post-Kyoto agreement, believing that George W. Bush, US president, could back proposals early next year for an international “cap and trade” market for carbon trading.

Mr Blair will press Angela Merkel, Germany’s chancellor, at a meeting in London on Friday to use her presidency of the Group of Eight richest nations next year to reach agreement on the key recommendations in the Stern report.

On Monday, Sigmar Gabriel, Germany’s environment minister, sounded a supportive note, saying climate change would rank high on its list of priorities when it takes over the presidency of the European Union and the chair of the G8 in January.

The report said establishing an international price for carbon, through tax, trading or regulation, was “an essential foundation” for tackling climate change.

Mr Blair said the report showed that the scientific evidence for global warming was “overwhelming” and its consequences “disastrous”.

The UK on Monday announced immediate plans for legislation that would give statutory force to projected cuts in greenhouse gas emissions. Sir Nicholas’s report said floods from rising sea levels could displace up to 100m people, melting glaciers could cause water shortages for one in six of the world’s population and droughts might create tens of millions of “climate refugees”.

In Britain, All Parties Want To Color The Flag Green (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 30 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair warned Monday that the world is heading toward "disastrous" and "irreversible" climate changes. Meanwhile, David Cameron, the popular leader of the opposition Conservative Party, vowed to install a wind-power generator and solar panels at the prime minister's residence if he wins the office.

Blair and Cameron are rivals, but their shared outspoken devotion to fighting global warming -- the subject of a stark British government report released Monday -- illustrates the unity among leaders across the political spectrum here on the dangers of climate change and, in the absence of U.S. leadership, their apparent determination to make Britain a world leader on the issue.

In a clear reference to President Bush, Blair used a column in the Sun newspaper Monday to say, "The case for action is the final piece of the jigsaw to convince every single political leader, including those in America, China and India, that this must be top of their agenda." While Bush has played down the dangers of climate change, Blair called the new findings "the most important report on the future which I have received since becoming Prime Minister" nearly a decade ago.

"There's consensus across the political parties on this," said Michael Cox, a professor of international relations at the London School of Economics. "And Blair genuinely believes that if the United States is not going to lead on this, then Britain will."

British politicians Monday enthusiastically embraced the conclusions of the report by Nicholas Stern, a senior British government economist and former World Bank chief economist. He found that the world will face catastrophic consequences without an urgent international effort to fight climate change.

Chancellor Gordon Brown, who commissioned the study and is Blair's likely successor as prime minister, said new economic opportunities would be created by finding alternative energy sources and other solutions. He said such moves would create "new markets, for new jobs, new technologies, new exports where companies, universities and social enterprises in Britain can lead the world."

Former U.S. vice president Al Gore, who has written a book and produced a film about the dangers of global warming, has become a symbol of Britain's nonpartisan commitment to climate change. He is advising Brown; during the Conservative Party's annual conference this month, Cameron attended a screening of Gore's film, "An Inconvenient Truth," and said, "I absolutely loved Al Gore's movie, and I think everyone here ought to see it."

Climate change is increasingly dominating British political discourse as leaders take to bicycles and hybrid cars in an effort to be more green than their opponents. The Conservatives recently adopted a tree as the party's logo, raising eyebrows among many in a party that is generally more committed to lowering taxes than raising trees. A political cartoon in Monday's Times newspaper here showed Blair, Cameron and Menzies Campbell, leader of the third-largest party, the Liberal Democrats, all hugging trees and pointing at each other, saying, "The other two are faking it!"

Peter Kellner, chairman of the Internet polling firm YouGov, said none of the major British parties has ever had the "intellectual hostility" to climate-change science that is often seen in political and business circles in the United States. He said political leaders are also reflecting public sentiment.

"The argument is won with the public about climate change," Kellner said. "There are very few people who take the Bush line of skepticism."

Polls have consistently shown the British public as supportive of measures such as higher taxes on sport-utility and other large-engine vehicles, Kellner said. Seventy-five percent of respondents supported such measures in a July 2006 poll, up from 69 percent a year earlier.

Tony Travers, a local government specialist at the London School of Economics, said British politics were a factor in the current emphasis on climate change. He said Blair needs to demonstrate "traditional left-of-center" values on issues such as the environment and African poverty to blunt criticism that he has led his party too far to the right. At the same time, he said, Cameron wants to emphasize his green credentials "to signal that he's not like the old Conservative Party."

Warming Poses A Fiscal Threat (USAT)

By Dan Vergano

USA Today, October 31, 2006

Pay now to fix global warming or risk a worldwide economic depression later, says a landmark British government report out Monday.

"The benefits of strong, early action on climate change outweigh the costs," concludes the 576-page Stern Review Report on the Economics of Climate Change. The report, authored by former World Bank chief economist Nicholas Stern, is called the most comprehensive projection of the economic impact of warming.

Failure to act carries the danger that rising temperatures will increase the likelihood of widespread drought, crop failure, sea-level rise and other economic calamities, the report warns.

"Our actions over the coming decades could create risks of major disruption to economic and social activity, later in this century and in the next, on a scale similar to those associated with the great wars and the economic depression of the first half of the 20th century," according to the report.

The report moves economic discussion of how humanity should deal with global warming to center stage, says Alden Meyer of the Union of Concerned Scientists in Washington, D.C., a science advocacy group. The report is endorsed by such economic heavyweights as Nobel Prize winner Joseph Stiglitz of Columbia University.

But critics, such as statistician Bjorn Lomborg of Denmark's Copenhagen Consensus Center, suggest ills such as disease and malnutrition are potentially more costly than global warming.

In 2001, an international science panel concluded levels of so-called greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide produced by burning coal and gasoline, likely would raise average global temperatures about 2 to 10 degrees by 2100. Letting them rise without levying financial penalties for the environmental impact would be a colossal failure, says economist Alex Bowen, a member of the Stern team.

The White House, in a statement responding to the report, said President Bush "has long recognized that climate change is a serious issue, and he has committed the U.S. to advancing and investing in the new technologies to help address this problem."

The report calls for spending 1% of global gross domestic product (GDP), about $600 billion yearly, by 2050 to shift the world to a "low carbon" economy that limits climate change in three ways:

•Research. Development of efficient and cleaner technology.

Waiting to act will cut 5% to 20% of the world's yearly GDP by 2050, lost to environmental degradation expected from global warming. (For perspective, the Great Depression cut U.S. GDP by 26% from 1929 to 1933, according to the Economic History Association.)

Past estimates have generally anticipated a lesser financial impact from climate change. For example, a 2000 Yale University report found temperatures rising 3.6 degrees by 2100 would cut global GDP less than 2%. Such reports underestimated the risk of big temperature increases and severe weather, Bowen says.

Lomborg, however, says the Stern report overestimates benefits and minimizes costs in its call to move to a low-carbon economy.

Warming Called Threat To Global Economy (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Failing to curb the impact of climate change could damage the global economy on the scale of the Great Depression or the world wars by spawning environmental devastation that could cost 5 to 20 percent of the world's annual gross domestic product, according to a report issued yesterday by the British government.

The report by Nicholas Stern, who heads Britain's Government Economic Service and formerly served as the World Bank's chief economist, calls for a new round of international collaboration to cut greenhouse gas emissions linked to global warming.

"There's still time to avoid the worst impacts of climate change, if we act now and act internationally," Stern said in a statement. "But the task is urgent. Delaying action, even by a decade or two, will take us into dangerous territory. We must not let this window of opportunity close."

Some economists questioned the British study's projections, however, saying they overestimated the impact of global warming on the world's economies, especially those of developed nations. At the same time, these critics said the report's assertion that it would cost only 1 percent annually of global GDP to curb climate change underestimated how much spending would be required.

"There's just a very small part of GDP" in industrialized nations "that's affected by weather in a direct or indirect way," said Jerry Taylor, a senior fellow at the libertarian Cato Institute, which accepts some contributions from fossil-fuel companies. "It's very difficult to sketch out this disaster scenario."

Yale University economics professor William Nordhaus, who has estimated that climate change will cost developed countries less than 1 percent of GDP over the next half-century, said the Stern report "appears to be an impressive effort to summarize the science and economics of climate change" despite the controversy surrounding its projections.

The report represents British Prime Minister Tony Blair's latest effort to enlist President Bush, a close ally, in his effort to make serious cuts in carbon dioxide emissions. Bush has declined to sign the 1997 Kyoto Protocol, which imposes mandatory reductions in greenhouse gases on most industrialized nations between 2008 and 2012, and yesterday his aides reiterated his commitment to fostering research and innovation rather than adopting federal emissions restrictions.

"The president has long recognized that climate change is a serious issue, and he has committed the U.S. to advancing and investing in the new technologies to help address this problem," said Kristen Hellmer, spokeswoman for Bush's top environmental adviser, James L. Connaughton. "His administration has already dedicated more than $29 billion to climate change sciences and technology programs and is working in strong partnership with nations around the world to accelerate progress. . . . The U.S. government has produced an abundance of economic analysis on the issue of climate change. The Stern report is another contribution to that effort."

In a telephone conference with reporters yesterday, Alex Brown, senior economic adviser for the Stern report, said the British government had conferred with Bush administration officials while drafting the study. But when asked whether these officials had indicated a willingness to shift course, Brown replied, "I don't think I can comment on that."

Still, several experts said the report could reshape the way policymakers consider the pros and cons of curbing carbon dioxide from power plants, automobiles and other sources.

"It's important for the people arguing for action to make the case that it's worth it, rather than the promise that it will be free," said Yale environmental law and policy professor Dan Esty, adding that the report puts "for the first time in stark relief, the costs and consequences of inaction and puts them on parallel with the known burdens of taking action.

The British government has also enlisted a prominent adviser to help promote its global warming message, by bringing on former vice president Al Gore as an unpaid consultant.

Even advocates of mandatory limits on greenhouse gases, however, said that to shift U.S. climate policy would entail policies that exact a price from politically influential and economically powerful industries.

"There are costs to addressing this problem," said Tim Profeta, who directs Duke University's Nicholas Institute for Environmental Policy Solutions. "This is only the beginning of the conversation."

Emissions Of CO2 Continue To Rise Despite Pledges (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

A United Nations agency said most industrial nations continue to increase their emissions of carbon dioxide and other so-called greenhouse gases thought to be warming the Earth's atmosphere, despite pledges under the Kyoto Protocol during the next six years to make a 5% cut.

While the shuttering of heavily polluting factories in the former Soviet Union and its satellites makes it appear as though industrial nations as a group reduced their emissions by 3.3% from 1990 to 2004, the agency said that without that statistical blip, the U.S. and most other industrial nations have increased their emissions by 11%.

"The rising trend is the worrisome part of it," said Yvo de Boer, executive secretary of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change. Since 2000, as their economies revived, countries in Eastern Europe also increased their emissions, rising by 4.1% according to the agency.

From 2000 to 2004, according to the U.N. data, the U.S., which isn't a party to Kyoto, had a slower increase in emissions (1.3%) than members of the European Union (2.4%). EU members have committed to drop their emissions by 8%, compared with 1990 levels, by 2012.

"This means that industrialized countries will need to intensify their efforts to implement strong [reduction] policies," Mr. de Boer said.

Spain and Austria had the highest increases -- 11.4% and 12.4%, respectively -- in Western Europe from 2000 to 2004. Canada, which has pledged a 6% reduction, saw its emissions rise by 4.6%. Germany's emissions dropped by 0.7% and the United Kingdom's emissions fell by 1%.

"The positive part of this is that across the board we're seeing emissions growing more slowly than economic growth," Mr. de Boer said. Parties to the Kyoto treaty meet next week in Nairobi, Kenya, to begin what is likely to be a multiyear debate on what emissions cuts will be required in the second round of the treaty's implementation, which starts in 2012.

The findings were released shortly after a report by Sir Nicholas Stern, head of the U.K.'s Government Economic Service. He estimated the cost of a nation's efforts to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions to avoid the worst effects of climate change would amount to about 1% of global domestic product each year. However, he calculated, the cost of "unabated climate change" including rising sea levels would be five times that much, or more. (See related article1.)

Scandal Below The Surface (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

The crucial issue this year is Iraq, and the most important issue this decade may be the risk that nuclear proliferation results in the incineration of Wall Street by terrorists. Both topics are spurring useful debate this campaign season.

But one of the more important issues this century is generating no serious discussion on the campaign trail. And, in place of a drumroll, let's look at the chemistry experiment in which we're all taking part.

If you think of the earth's surface as a great beaker, then it's filled mostly with ocean water. It is slightly alkaline, and that's what creates a hospitable home for fish, coral reefs and plankton — and indirectly, higher up the food chain, for us.

But scientists have discovered that the carbon dioxide we're spewing into the air doesn't just heat up the atmosphere and lead to rising seas. Much of that carbon is absorbed by the oceans, and there it produces carbonic acid — the same stuff found in soda pop.

That makes oceans a bit more acidic, impairing the ability of certain shellfish to produce shells, which, like coral reefs, are made of calcium carbonate. A recent article in Scientific American explained the indignity of being a dissolving mollusk in an acidic ocean: "Drop a piece of chalk (calcium carbonate) into a glass of vinegar (a mild acid) if you need a demonstration of the general worry: the chalk will begin dissolving immediately."

The more acidic waters may spell the end, at least in higher latitudes, of some of the tiniest variations of shellfish — certain plankton and tiny snails called pteropods. This would disrupt the food chain, possibly killing off many whales and fish, and rippling up all the way to humans.

We stand, so to speak, on the shoulders of plankton.

"There have been a couple of very big events in geological history where the carbon cycle changed dramatically," said Scott Doney, senior scientist at the Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution in Massachusetts. One was an abrupt warming that took place 55 million years ago in conjunction with acidification of the oceans and mass extinctions. Most scientists don't believe we're headed toward a man-made variant on that episode — not yet, at any rate. But many worry that we're hurtling into unknown dangers.

"Whether in 20 years or 100 years, I think marine ecosystems are going to be dramatically different by the end of this century, and that'll lead to extinction events," Mr. Doney added.

"This is the only habitable planet we have," he said. "The damage we do is going to be felt by all the generations to come."

So that should be one of the great political issues for this century — the vandalism we're committing to our planet because of our refusal to curb greenhouse gases. Yet the subject is barely debated in this campaign.

Changes in ocean chemistry are only one among many damaging consequences of carbon emissions. Evidence is also growing about the more familiar dangers: melting glaciers, changing rainfall patterns, rising seas and more powerful hurricanes.

Last year, the World Health Organization released a study indicating that climate change results in an extra 150,000 deaths and five million sicknesses each year, by causing the spread of malaria, diarrhea, malnutrition and other ailments.

A report prepared for the British government and published yesterday, the Stern Review on the Economics of Climate Change, warned that inaction "could create risks of major disruption to economic and social activity, on a scale similar to those associated with the great wars and the economic depression of the first half of the 20th century."

If emissions are not curbed, climate change will cut 5 percent to 20 percent of global G.D.P. each year, declared the mammoth report. "In contrast," it said, "the costs of action — reducing greenhouse gas emissions to avoid the worst impacts of climate change — can be limited to around 1 percent of global G.D.P. each year." Some analysts put the costs of action higher, but most agree that it makes sense to invest far more in alternative energy sources, both to wean ourselves of oil and to reduce the strain on our planet.

We know what is needed: a carbon tax or cap-and-trade system, a post-Kyoto accord on emissions cutbacks, and major research on alternative energy sources. But as The Times's Andrew Revkin noted yesterday, spending on energy research and development has fallen by more than half, after inflation, since 1979.

Melting glaciers and corroding pteropods aren't as sensational as a Congressional page scandal, or as urgent as the Iraq war. But they are just as scandalous. We have no responsibility greater than as stewards of our planet, and we're blowing it.

Two Forces Maintain Siege Of Oaxaca (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

OAXACA, Mexico, Oct. 30 -- The men who weave wool into boldly patterned rugs don't bother coming here anymore. The little shops that sold sweet, grainy chocolate are boarded up.

Oaxaca, Mexico's colonial-era jewel, was almost unrecognizable Monday, a barely functioning city befouled by smoldering trash and the charred hulks of burned-out buses. Five months after teachers launched a strike for better pay, and two days after the arrival of federal police, Oaxaca is a place under siege by equally determined opposing forces.

Police outfitted with gas masks control the town square. Masked protesters armed with rocks control the rest. No one seems to know what will happen next.

The police say they are determined to restore order. But the demonstrators have voted not to budge until the Oaxaca state governor, Ulises Ruiz, steps down. Some business owners are hopeful that local lawmakers will be able to persuade Ruiz to resign and end the crisis. But for now, the standoff is testing the resolve of a populist movement of poor Mexicans and bringing chaos to a town long known as a haven for tourists.

DOJ_NMG_0089065

Oaxaca got to this point in flashes of gunfire Friday that killed two protesters and an independent American journalist and activist, Brad Will, who came here to support the teachers' strike. The shootings prompted Mexican President Vicente Fox to send in 4,500 federal police officers, who were met by a hail of rocks as they smashed through barricades and drove demonstrators out of the town square on Sunday.

Fox declared Monday that "today in Oaxaca social order and peace has been restored." But the president's declaration seemed out of sync with events on the ground.

Streets teemed with sweaty young men, some carrying medieval-looking clubs with nails jutting out of ax handles. Others collected rocks, for later use as weapons, in shopping carts. The few visitors to come here were dumped at taxi stands on the outskirts of the town's historic center because airport van drivers were afraid of getting hijacked.

Demonstrators control the university radio station, broadcasting a stream of political invective, protest songs and slogans. "The People United Will Never Be Defeated," their anthem, plays constantly.

Thousands of demonstrators spent hours under a wilting sun Monday taunting police, who stood 10 deep alongside armored vehicles to block the many streets leading into the town square.

"It smells like dogs," one protester screamed, drawing laughter from hundreds clumped on Cinco de Mayo, a street named in honor of Mexico's revolutionary spirit. The police just glared back, protected by helmets and thick plastic shields. At their feet were wooden crosses, smudged red by protesters who pricked their arms and squeezed out the blood.

While the standoff began as a teachers strike, it has morphed into a political movement here in the second poorest of Mexican states. Even as some teachers seem to be wavering in their resolve -- a few returned to work in outlying villages in the state Monday -- an umbrella group with an ambitious mission of social and economic reform has taken over. The group, the Popular Assembly of the People of Oaxaca, or APPO, is also demanding the resignation of Ruiz, who infuriated teachers by using force to disband their annual protest five months ago.

On Monday, APPO activists waved their fists at the helicopters that constantly swept overhead, yelling, "Murderers." They said two comrades were killed Sunday and more than a dozen had died since the protest began.

"These hotel people, all they want is repression. They're in league with the governor," said the man, who declined to give his name for fear of repercussions in his small village.

Daniel Velasquez, the lone vendor in the once-bustling Plaza Antonio Labistida, watched it all and frowned.

"Oaxaca is hurting," he said. "Oaxaca is ugly."

On the wall to Velasquez's left, a sign invited people to a tour marking the Day of the Dead, an important Mexican holiday, on Wednesday. It was accompanied by a sign-up sheet. But there wasn't a single signature.

Protesters Vow To Retake Oaxaca Center (AP)

By Mark Stevenson

AP, October 31, 2006

Thousands of protesters driven from the city center by federal police after months of paralyzing demonstrations vowed to retake the main plaza on Monday, but strike-weary residents pleaded for a return to life as usual.

Oaxaca remained deeply divided between the protesters demanding Gov. Ulises Ruiz's resignation and those yearning for a return to the tranquil days when foreign tourists browsed shops and dined on the region's famous mole sauce.

"Fight, fight, fight! Don't stop fighting!" the protesters chanted before arriving at the central main plaza, the Zocalo, carrying anti-government banners.

Ignoring protesters who screamed "Sellout!" a group of about 20 residents and business owners waged earlier countermarches to thank federal police for clearing away the demonstrators, who had kept the city under siege since May, shutting down businesses and repelling the scores of national and international tourists who traditionally are drawn to the picturesque colonial city of 275,000.

"Let them stay," Edith Mendoza, a 40-year-old housewife, said of the police. "We were held hostage for five months."

The city resembled a battleground early Monday, its streets littered with charred cars and lines of federal police blocking entrances to the Zocalo.

Inside the central plaza, guarded by hundreds of uniformed police in riot gear and manning water cannons, workers labored feverishly to remove and paint over graffiti, rip down banners and clean up tons of accumulated trash. The kiosk in the heart of the plaza, covered with protest banners and graffiti during the demonstrations, had already been restored to its original state.

The protests began as a teacher's strike but quickly spiraled into chaos as anarchists, students and Indian groups seized the central plaza and barricaded streets throughout the city to demand Ruiz's ouster.

Police and state forces — often in plainclothes — have shot at protesters, setting off clashes in which at least eight people have died.

The federal government indicated that it had no intention of letting the protesters take back the city. Interior Secretary Carlos Abascal said the federal forces would stay until order had been established.

President Vicente Fox said "today in Oaxaca social order and peace has been restored."

Fox, who leaves office Dec. 1, had resisted repeated calls to send federal forces to Oaxaca until Saturday, a day after gunfire killed a U.S. activist-journalist and two residents.

The demonstrators said Monday they hoped to attract other sectors of society, mainly the state's restive Indian population, to join their fight.

"The government is angering the other regions and they are going to come and that way they won't stop us," said Flora Gutierrez, a university student who was among protesters.

Protesters also pointed out that while police controlled the Zocalo, the demonstrators were still in charge of other areas of the city, where they erected additional barricades made of trash and vehicles.

"There are more than 3,000 barricades in the working-class neighborhoods," said Flavio Sosa, a protest leader.

The federal government's decision to send forces into Oaxaca came after teachers agreed to return to work by Monday, ending a strike that kept 1.3 million children out of classes across the southern state.

But teachers union leader Enrique Rueda told The Associated Press that no students had returned to class in the capital on Monday, although some had in cities and towns outside of Oaxaca City.

"We are not willing to go back (to work) until we get written guarantees" for teachers' safety, said Daniel Reyes, one of the last of the striking teachers to leave the main square as police gathered around it Sunday night.

During the strike, some dissident teachers tried to open schools, and parents armed with sticks and pipes fought off protesters who tried to keep children from entering.

Public Safety Secretary Eduardo Medina Mora said seven police were injured in the weekend clashes. A few were hit by gasoline bombs thrown by protesters.

Protesters claimed two of their own were killed, but federal authorities said they could not confirm that.

A scattering of businesses, including the city's famous marketplace, reopened Monday. As shoppers browsed through the market's stalls, stocked with supplies of fresh marigolds to celebrate the upcoming Day of the Dead, others lined up at several automatic teller machines that had reopened. But most of the city remained shuttered.

The lower house of Congress on Monday called for Ruiz to resign, but he showed no signs of doing so. In a television interview, he said his departure "is not up for discussion."

Oaxaca Divided As Police Regain Control Of Plaza (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0089067

By Sam Enriquez

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

OAXACA, Mexico — The state capital remained divided Monday as thousands of residents marched in defiance and many others praised government forces that dislodged a protest encampment from the city center this weekend.

The recovery of the plaza by federal police late Sunday marked a symbolic end to the five-month occupation by striking teachers and leftist supporters who have demanded the resignation of the state governor. But exactly when the tourist capital will return to normal is in doubt.

Although at least two deaths were reported during the 12-hour invasion by more than 4,000 riot police and armored equipment, Fox described the operation as "bloodless" and conducted without the use of weapons.

Flavio Sosa, a leader of the leftist movement known by its Spanish-language initials APPO, said Monday the government had recovered only a single block, after protesters ceded it in the face of overwhelming force.

"The control of the rest of the city is in the hands of APPO," he said in a radio interview. "I want to tell you that we are not going to hand over control of the city. We are going to resist at every barricade."

Protesters converged on the central plaza in the early afternoon from three directions in a largely peaceful demonstration calling for the ouster of federal police and the resignation of Gov. Ulises Ruiz.

They chanted slogans denouncing Ruiz and cursed the federal police, who stood in single-line formation on every street entering the square, backed by armored vehicles with water cannons.

The protesters' many grievances stem largely from the desperate poverty in this southern state, especially among indigenous people who are among the poorest and least educated in Mexico. The opposition began with the striking teachers but quickly mushroomed. Teachers since have negotiated a 30 percent raise over several years and have agreed to return to the classroom. "All we want is work, hospitals, better schools and the military out," said Veralisa Flores, a teacher who marched with friends. "This is a peaceful movement."

But despite pleas, protest organizers could not stop the young men who tossed rocks and fired a sky rocket at one line of police on the east side of the square, drawing several rounds of tear gas canisters that dispersed the assailants.

Rogue elements of the conflict have damaged the image of the fledgling movement, as well as local government. Plain-clothes police allegedly have killed several protesters, including independent journalist Bradley Roland Will, of New York, who was shot Friday along with three Mexicans.

Local authorities over the weekend announced the arrest of five men in the slaying of Will, including the police chief and two of his officers from nearby Santa Lucia del Camino.

"These tragic and senseless deaths over the weekend, in addition to the nine deaths already caused by the civil unrest in Oaxaca in the past several months, of course, underscore the critical need for a return to lawfulness and order," he said.

Many residents who took early morning walks Monday to see the plaza expressed the same feeling. They, too, hope the arrival of federal police will be the first step in bringing Oaxaca back to normal.

"The majority of people are relieved the police are finally here," Gloria Crisantos said. "We've been held hostage in our own city. Look around. Ask anyone."

And, as if on cue, a crowd of passers-by quickly gathered, eager to voice their support of the police. They said they had lost business and jobs, and their children have been out of school since May. They agreed with protesters that Oaxaca needs help but bristled at their tactics, which has turned the popular destination into a ghost town.

Their anger extended to Ruiz, who they say failed to quell the unrest by ignoring teacher demands, and then trying to evict them from the plaza in a violent police attack in June.

A majority of congressmen in Mexico's lower house of Congress voted Monday to ask for Ruiz to take a leave of absence or resign. And the Senate voted unanimously to ask him to consider stepping down, with four years remaining in his six-year term.

Times staff writer Hector Tobar and Carlos Martinez of the Times' Mexico City bureau contributed to this report.

Mexican Protesters Try To Protect Their Rallying Cry (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

OAXACA, Mexico, Oct. 30 — As federal riot police hunkered down in Oaxaca's main square today, protesters sought to protect their not-so-secret weapon in their five-month-long siege of the city: the pilfered radio transmitter they use to mobilize the population.

"We are in a red alert, a red alert!" a nervous-sounding announcer said over and over from inside the bullet-scarred university station, which was ringed by sand bags and protected by masked supporters on the roof equipped with handmade mortars. "The police are moving in!"

The cry was premature but it drew hundreds of supporters from across this city in southern Mexico. They prepared Molotov cocktails and reinforced the barriers around the gates of Oaxaca University in anticipation of a raid.

"We will transmit until the last minute," an announcer who described himself as a law professor but declined to provide his name said in an interview. "We will not run. We are like the captains of the ship and we'll go down with the ship."

Oaxaca's beleaguered governor, Ulises Ruiz, was also hunkered down, on his own turf, facing increased pressure to resign.

Although the governor insisted in a television interview today that he was staying put, his support appeared thin as the Congress passed a nonbinding resolution urging him to cede power for the good of the state and the nation. Only Mr. Ruiz's Institutional Revolutionary Party and another small allied party stuck by the governor, and even their backing seemed lukewarm.

Emilio Gamboa, the leader of his party in the Chamber of Deputies, told reporters that it was up to Mr. Ruiz to make a decision of conscience as to "whether he can continue or not governing Oaxaca."

Members of the Oaxaca People's Popular Assembly, which has been coordinating the protests, have clearly made up their minds that he cannot, as their frequent anti-Ruiz messages over the radio make clear.

If the diffuse movement that has laid siege to Oaxaca has a nerve center it is the trash-strewn conference room where the people's assembly advocates broadcast regular updates to their comrades.

It is over the renegade station that announcers called on supporters to provide diesel fuel the other day to gas up some protest vehicles. Over the same airwaves, they informed the population that the police were moving in on the city Sunday afternoon. Today, the radio called people into the streets for three protest marches that drew thousands.

Even after the federal raid managed to take back the symbolic Zócalo, or central square, which had been the protesters main stage, the station kept the movement against Mr. Ruiz alive.

The protest began as a teachers strike but a deal was reached to raise their salaries. Some teachers returned to classes today, although it appeared that many were not yet sure it was safe enough to do so — especially since continued clashes between protesters and police appeared likely. Local residents have said the issue is less a people's movement than old political rivalries and patronage.

"It's strange but I'm not afraid," Alejandra Canseco Martinez, 22, a student who frequently sends out updates over the air waves, said from inside the radio station. "Maybe I should be afraid because we don't know what will happen and the police are only a few blocks away."

It is not the first time that the station has been under siege.

The current standoff began on June 14, when the police broke up a teachers' protest and smashed the transmitter that teachers were using to broadcast their messages from the main square. The following day, as supporters joined forces with the teachers, university students took over the campus station.

On July 22, gunmen opened fire on the station, sending workers ducking for cover and eventually knocking the signal off the air. But listeners heard the attack and converged on the station in support.

Then, on Aug. 8, someone sneaked into the station and poured acid onto the transmitter, again killing the signal. But by that time, protesters had taken over another station. Within weeks, a dozen public and private stations around Oaxaca were controlled by protesters.

The university station, with its transmitter repaired, remains the chief source of information for the protesters, though. Its messages are dismissed as revolutionary propaganda by critics, but supporters relish the hard-edge words that fly across the colonial city.

"The other stations only say things in support of Ulises," said Sal Lozano, 43, a farmer, speaking of the governor. "We're going to defend this station with everything with have."

Crisis As Sri Lanka Talks Go Nowhere (FT)

By Joe Leahy

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

No one was expecting much – at best an agreement on a schedule for more talks rather than any serious discussion of the main issues.

But relations between the Sri Lankan government and the rebel Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam have deteriorated so much that the two sides could not agree even on this modest goal when they met in Geneva at the weekend.

For the long-suffering people of Sri Lanka, the news could hardly have been worse. There is little to stop the two sides intensifying their slide back towards full-scale hostilities under the guise of the island's four-year-old ceasefire agreement, a situation that is already leading to an humanitarian crisis in the country's north-east. Heavy shelling resumed in the north only hours after the talks collapsed.

"It's back to war," says Paikiasothy Saravanamuttu, executive director of the Centre for Policy Alternatives. "The next lot of serious negotiations will come only after one side or the other feels it has got a decisive and consolidated military advantage or they're mutually exhausted and feel they can't proceed on the battlefield any further."

The talks were always going to be tough going. Since the two sides, which signed a ceasefire agreement in 2002 after nearly two decades of fighting, last met in Geneva in February, there has been a steady escalation of violence.

Starting with naval battles, air strikes and bomb blasts, the conflict had intensified by July into land battles on the northern Jaffna Peninsula. In the week preceding the talks, a suspected rebel suicide bomber rammed an explosive-laden truck into a navy convoy, killing more than 100 people in the worst attack since the ceasefire agreement and bringing the toll of combatants and civilians killed this year to 2000.

On the flipside, there were also more reasons for hope this time around. Last week, the opposition United National Party signed an unprecedented agreement with President Mahinda Rajapaksa's ruling Sri Lanka Freedom Party pledging to co-operate on economic affairs and security, including the peace process.

The talks were meant to be unconditional. But each side arrived in Geneva with an agenda that was bound to be unacceptable to the other.

The government wanted to discuss human rights, including the Tamil Tigers' alleged use of child soldiers, the re-establishment of multi-party democracy in the north and east, and a development programme for the area. The Tigers wanted the government to allow a referendum in the rebel-held areas.

But the talks faltered on the Tigers' demand that the government reopen the A-9 highway, a strategic road connecting the LTTE-controlled Jaffna peninsula to the rest of the island. The Tigers argue the closure of the road constitutes a new "Berlin Wall" and is leading to shortages of food and supplies on the peninsula.

The government refuses to reopen the road, which it says is used by the rebels for the smuggling of weapons and child soldiers. It offered to supply the peninsula using ships if the rebels would guarantee their security, which they have so far refused to do.

Palitha Kohona, one of the government negotiators, accused the rebels of using the road as an excuse to hamstring the talks.

"They came here unconditionally but all of a sudden the conditions emerged as an excuse to walk away. It's very difficult to come to the conclusion that they are interested in resolving this conflict in a peaceful manner," he told the Financial Times from Geneva.

DOJ_NMG_0089070

Some analysts doubt the sincerity of both sides going into talks. They argue that the government should have anticipated the LTTE's demands regarding the highway and that it should reopen the road for humanitarian reasons.

And they suspect that the rebels' heart is not in the talks. The LTTE's dream is of an independent Tamil state, a proposal that has little international support and is unlikely to be achieved through the current negotiations.

Jehan Perera, director of the National Peace Council, said he was concerned that the situation in Jaffna would deteriorate further, with food shortages driving the price of rice there to five times its levels in Colombo amid daily assassinations and killings.

The only hope was that the new alliance between the ruling party and the UNP, headed by former Prime Minister Ranil Wickremesinghe, will help drive pressure for an accord.

"The UNP leader has said very categorically that he's supporting the government for peace, not for war," says Mr Perera.

Leaders Struggle To Repair Polish-German Ties (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

BERLIN, Oct. 30 -- It had already been a bad year for German-Polish relations, but things really soured this month when naval warfare between the two countries nearly broke out on the Baltic Sea.

On Oct. 17 , the Polish Coast Guard fired warning shots at a German tourist ship after it tried to evade inspection in the Polish port of Swinoujscie and made a run for the German border with three Polish customs officers on board. Polish officials accused the vessel, the Adler Dania, of hiding a cargo of tax-free cigarettes and booze; the German captain accused the Poles of overreacting. "Are Our Neighbors Insane?" blared Bild, Germany's largest newspaper.

No one was wounded or killed, but the incident only added to a string of diplomatic slights, political insults and other indignities that have left Germany and Poland feeling more raw about each other than perhaps at any time since the end of World War II.

Poles have been smarting for more than a year over Germany's decision to bypass their energy-dependent country by routing a major gas pipeline to Russia under the Baltic. The Polish defense minister, drawing on a painful history that is never far from the surface, compared the move to the secret agreement between Adolph Hitler and Joseph Stalin to carve up Poland in 1939.

Poles are also sore about efforts by some Germans to sue for monetary compensation for property their families were forced to abandon after the defeat of the Third Reich, when borders were redrawn and Germany ceded some of its eastern territory to Poland.

At times, Poland's leaders have made matters worse by displaying thin skins. In July, Polish President Lech Kaczynski canceled an official visit to Germany after a Berlin newspaper mocked him as "a little potato" who thirsted to rule the world . Polish officials demanded, unsuccessfully, that the German government take legal action against the journalists.

On Monday, Kaczynski's twin brother, Jaroslaw, Poland's prime minister, came to Berlin -- for the first time -- to meet with German Chancellor Angela Merkel in an attempt to repair some of the diplomatic damage. While the pair tried to put on a good face and held a joint news conference, they didn't report any breakthroughs.

Merkel rejected Poland's demand to sign a deal forswearing any private German property claims from the war. Although she acknowledged the "unease" the issue had caused in Poland, she said government intervention "would make things more complicated than they are."

Kaczynski said he welcomed Merkel's comments but added that Poland still wasn't satisfied. "In the Polish view, this issue is not resolved," he warned.

Germany and Poland are the two biggest countries in central Europe and share a long border, but polls show a widespread lack of familiarity between the two neighbors' people.

DOJ_NMG_0089071

Two of every three Germans have never set foot in Poland, according to a survey commissioned last spring by the Institute of Public Affairs in Warsaw. Public views of Poles are also not favorable. When asked what they most associated with Poland, the top answer was "car theft and crime," followed closely by "illegal workers" and "poverty, backwardness."

Many Poles harbor skeptical views of Germany as well. In a similar poll conducted by the institute last March, 49 percent of Poles questioned said they feared Germany could pose "an economic threat" to Poland in the future, even though Germany is Poland's largest trading partner.

Also ruffling feathers in Poland are recent historical exhibits in Berlin that highlighted the hardships faced by millions of German refugees after World War II. Many Poles saw the exhibits, which closed just before Kaczynski's arrival, as an attempt to portray Germans as victims of a war that they started -- and that left 6 million people dead in Poland.

Sponsors of the exhibit, titled "Forced Paths," said they took pains to include the experiences of other political refugees in Europe throughout the 20th century and questioned whether Polish leaders were seeking to score political points at home.

"I also think politicians in Poland are trying to use the issue to divert attention from massive domestic problems," said Erika Steinbach, a member of the German Parliament and head of a group called the Federation of Expellees, which has drawn the ire of the Polish government. "I am an optimist and I think the differences can be resolved. If they are not, it certainly will not be the fault of the German expellees."

So far, Poland's government has shown little willingness to forgive and forget.

When the Forced Paths exhibit opened in August, the mayor of Warsaw canceled a visit to Berlin in protest. Kaczynski, the prime minister, trashed the event and responded with a historical lesson of his own: a visit to a former Nazi concentration camp in northern Poland.

Berlusconi And Former Lawyer To Stand Trial (FT)

By Adrian Michaels In Milan

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

Silvio Berlusconi, the former Italian prime minister, and David Mills, his former lawyer, were on Monday ordered to stand trial on corruption charges by a judge in Milan.

In a further deepening of the pair's legal woes, the judge accepted the prosecutors' request for a trial into allegations that Mr Berlusconi paid Mr Mills at least $600,000 after the lawyer had given favourable testimony at other trials of Mr Berlusconi in the 1990s.

The two men are already committed to trial in a separate case that starts this month.

The affair adds considerably to the embarrassment of the two men.

Mr Mills's reputation has taken a considerable beating and also created problems for his estranged wife, Tessa Jowell, the UK culture secretary who is a close ally of Tony Blair, the UK prime minister. Ms Jowell was forced to defend herself against accusations that she breached the ministerial code of conduct governing disclosure of financial arrangements.

Mr Berlusconi, who is Italy's richest man, has been beset by allegations of wrongdoing in his business empire for years.

He has been convicted on some occasions but the convictions have either been overturned on appeal or annulled by statutes of limitations.

Mr Berlusconi says that he has done nothing wrong and that sections of Italy's judiciary are targeting him to generate political advantage for his leftwing opponents.

Mr Mills also says he has done nothing wrong. He at first admitted to prosecutors that the money had come from Mr Berlusconi and later retracted that statement, saying it was related to business with another client.

Prosecutors allege that Mr Mills entangled the affairs of his clients so as to make it difficult to follow the trail of money.

Whatever the outcome of the trial, people close to the Milan prosecutors admit that it is very unlikely that a conviction will stand and that either man will go to jail.

The last part of the crimes of which the two are accused is alleged to have taken place in February 1998 and legal proceedings have 10 years to be completed.

DOJ_NMG_0089072

The trial is at the moment scheduled to start in March, meaning the case and any subsequent rounds of appeal have 11 months to finish. People close to the case said on Monday that Milan prosecutors had the chance to ask a judge to bring forward the trial date but that no decision had yet been made.

Mr Berlusconi is hoping once again to be Italy's prime minister and is agitating for an early collapse of the government of Romano Prodi, his successor.

In the separate trial starting this month Mr Berlusconi, Mr Mills and 11 others are embroiled in allegations of money laundering, tax evasion and improper accounting.

Berlusconi To Face Corruption Trial (AP)

By Colleen Barry

AP, October 31, 2006

Berlusconi is accused of ordering the payment in 1997 of at least $600,000 to his co-defendant British lawyer David Mills, a close friend, in exchange for the lawyer's false testimony in two trials against Berlusconi. Both deny the allegations.

Mills is married to British Culture Secretary Tessa Jowell. They formally separated in March.

Prime Minister Tony Blair's office declined to comment on the decision, and a spokesman in Jowell's office also declined to comment.

Judge Fabio Paparella issued the ruling after refusing a defense motion to remove himself from the case because he is presiding over a separate case charging Berlusconi and Mills with false accounting, embezzlement and tax fraud in the purchase by Berlusconi's Mediaset empire of TV rights for U.S. movies.

The new case is set to go to trial March 13. If convicted, Mills and Berlusconi could be sentenced to between three and eight years in prison, according to prosecutors.

Berlusconi's lawyer, Niccolo Ghedini, said the decision to open another trial against Berlusconi was expected, but he expressed disappointment the judge didn't wait for a higher court to decide on whether he should step aside.

"Everything went as we thought it would. It is like scripted," Ghedini said outside the courtroom.

He noted that two requests were pending to higher courts for Paparella to step aside in the case — leaving open the possibility if one or the other succeeds that the charges will supersede their statute of limitations, which runs out in February 2008. "This is not what we want. We want an acquittal," Ghedini said.

Mills' Italian lawyer, Federico Cecconi, said there was no evidence to support the charges.

"In the trial we will highlight that there is no evidence that there has been illicit payments on the part of Mediaset group," Cecconi said.

Berlusconi has a long history of legal troubles linked to his business interests based in Milan.

In past cases, he was either acquitted or cleared of the charges because the statute of limitations had expired. He has always maintained his innocence.

Pinochet Is Placed Under House Arrest (AP)

AP, October 31, 2006

Former dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet was placed under house arrest and indicted for the first time on torture charges for abuses at a secret detention center where President Michelle Bachelet and her mother were once held, the judge handling the case reported Monday.

Two court officials notified Pinochet at his suburban Santiago mansion of the decision by Judge Alejandro Solis, who on Friday had charged Pinochet with one homicide, 35 kidnappings and 24 cases of torture at Villa Grimaldi, one of the most infamous detention centers in the early years of his 1973-1990 dictatorship.

Pinochet's chief defense lawyer, Pablo Rodriguez, had said he will appeal Solis' ruling "all the way to the Supreme Court if necessary. We will use all the legal means at our disposal."

Rodriguez insisted the 90-year-old former military ruler is unfit to stand trial because of poor health. Pinochet has been diagnosed a mild dementia, has sustained several minor strokes, suffers from diabetes and arthritis and needs a pacemaker.

Pinochet has been indicted on human rights charges several times before, but this is the first time he faces torture charges.

Chile On Trial (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

VILLA GRIMALDI, in a suburb of Santiago, Chile, was where in the mid-1970s enemies of dictator Augusto Pinochet were sent to disappear. Thousands of his political opponents — including Chile's current president, Michelle Bachelet — were interned and tortured there by the secret police; many were never seen outside its walls again.

On Monday, the 90-year-old Pinochet was placed under house arrest for allegedly ordering the horrific human rights abuses that took place at Villa Grimaldi. It was his fifth arrest since 1998, but this is the first time he has been indicted on torture charges. Pinochet is in poor health, is believed to suffer from mild dementia and has repeatedly been ruled unfit to stand trial. But a judge has determined that Chile's ex-ruler is fit to face justice in this case.

Whatever happens in these proceedings, it is clear that Pinochet, at this late stage in his life, is unlikely to be held accountable for his actions. What is more dismaying is the degree to which many in Chile continue to defend the general's brutal actions when he ran the country from 1973 to 1990.

Indeed, it has taken accusations of financial improprieties to taint Pinochet, once hailed as an austerity-embracing, selfless anti-communist, in the eyes of Chilean conservatives. Reports in recent years that the general had stashed millions of dollars in a secret account at Washington-based Riggs Bank were more devastating to his legacy, bizarrely enough, than the illegal disappearance of thousands of dissidents.

Last week, documents allegedly showing that Pinochet had stashed nine tons of gold valued at $160 million in a Hong Kong bank were dismissed as cheap forgeries. But the episode may be another distressing sign of how even Pinochet's opponents feel as though they need to accuse him of corruption in order to forge a consensus against him. We can only hope that the latest round of proceedings against Pinochet will allow some of his victims to testify against him, and thus may offer up a mirror for all of Chilean society to come to terms with its dark past.

Call For Caution Over By Migrants' Cash (FT)

By Richard Lapper, Latin America Editor

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

The World Bank will on Tuesday urge policymakers to take a more cautious approach towards the development potential of remittances, the multi-billion dollar financial flows sent home by migrant workers in North America, Europe and Asia.

In a report analysing their significance in Latin America and the Caribbean, bank economists argue that remittances are not "manna from heaven", that the benefits have been "overestimated" and that associated social and economic costs in developing countries have not been taken into account.

"Remittances are an engine for development but they are not a substitute for sound national policies in the countries," said Humberto López, World Bank senior economist for Latin America and the Caribbean, and co-author of the report. "Although positive, the impact of remittances on poverty and inequality is in most cases quite modest."

Remittances have risen sharply in recent years, reaching $167bn (€131bn, £88bn) worldwide in 2005 and accounting for roughly a third of all financial flows to developing countries. They help poor families meet basic food, education and health needs. In Latin America – one of the regions most benefiting from the trend – there has been growing interest in their potential as a source of investment capital. A report published this month by the Inter-American Development Bank showed that a growing number of recipient families were using remittances to invest in homes and small businesses.

The World Bank highlights the macro-economic impact of remittance flows, especially in the small economies of Central America and the Caribbean where they typically equal more than 10 per cent of economic output, and in Haiti amounted to 52.7 per cent of GDP in 2004.

But it suggests that the impact of these flows on development is limited. In a detailed analysis of the 1991-2005 period, it found that for each 1 per cent increase in the ratio of remittances to GDP the fraction of the population living in poverty was reduced by about 0.4 per cent. In addition, the 1.6 per cent jump of these flows as a share of GDP from 1991 to 2005 is estimated to have led to an increase of 0.27 per cent in per capita GDP growth.

Although these benefits are real, the report argues that more needs to be done to increase the positive economic impact. For example, it would be beneficial to increase the access of migrant families to the financial system. Relatively few recipients have bank accounts (although the number tends to be larger than for the population as a whole) and even fewer have access to credit, for example.

At the same time, the report says policymakers must be alert to the negative consequences of high rates of migration and remittance flows. Remittances in some cases simply replace earnings that migrants would have made had they stayed at home. Migration can also lead to labour shortages.

Some parts of the region are suffering from a "brain drain". In Haiti and the English-speaking Caribbean countries, 80 per cent of college graduates are living abroad, the report says.

To End Uganda's Nightmare (WP)

By John Edwards

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

At a moment of tremendous global hardship -- from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan to the killing fields of Darfur -- it is rare to find hope. So when there is the possibility for peace, we must seize it. That's why one of the world's great tragedies, the conflict in Northern Uganda, deserves our attention.

It is perhaps the worst humanitarian catastrophe to have gone practically unnoticed by most of the world. The two decades of violence in Northern Uganda have had devastating consequences -- nearly 2 million people have been run out of their homes and forced to live in overcrowded, squalid camps; tens of thousands have died; 30,000 children have been abducted by an organization called the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) and forced to fight as child soldiers or used as sex slaves. Hundreds of villages have been abandoned and destroyed.

To witness the ravaging of Northern Uganda is searing. But meeting its people inspires hope. During a recent visit, I went to the Palabek-Kal camp, where thousands have been crammed into a makeshift village. Hearing their stories of suffering and survival made two points abundantly clear: They are praying for peace every moment, and they expect the world community to do everything possible to help them achieve it. Their yearning was deeply moving, and their collective intensity and faith to build a better future in the midst of such hardship was powerful.

In areas where security is improving and people are beginning to go home, the challenges are just beginning. First among them is the need for adequate access to clean water and sanitation. The rehabilitation and reconstruction of schools, health clinics and other basic infrastructure are equally critical.

Yet before people will feel safe to go home, there must be peace. The talks between the government of Uganda and the LRA offer an unprecedented opportunity to secure a lasting peace in this long and deadly conflict. A cease-fire was signed at the end of August, but as was made clear during my discussions there, it is very fragile. As these African-led negotiations continue, the United States and the international community must step forward to support the talks -- not stand on the sidelines and hope for the best.

First, the United States and the United Nations should offer whatever support outside mediators, led by the government of southern Sudan, require. In particular, assistance in monitoring the cease-fire and the assembly of LRA fighters at two agreed-upon sites in southern Sudan would be critical to boosting the confidence of both sides -- while also holding them accountable to their commitments.

Second, the United States should publicly voice its support of the peace talks and encourage the Ugandan government and the LRA to maintain their commitment to the process. It's understandable that Uganda's government is skeptical of the LRA's intentions, given the atrocities that organization has committed. Yet this is the closest the two sides have ever come to a comprehensive agreement. Uganda needs to know that Washington stands behind the drive for peace and will be a supportive ally after an accord is signed.

Third, the key donors -- the United States, European countries and the United Nations -- must come together and make clear their commitment to providing the financial assistance necessary to help victims rebuild their homes and villages. This will create incentives for both sides and, just as important, lay the foundation for long-term reconstruction and reconciliation -- not only in Northern communities that have been terrorized by the LRA but also between Northern and Southern Uganda. Once the agricultural breadbasket of Uganda, the North has been marginalized and impoverished for decades. It must be integrated more fully into the country.

Finally, the United States and the international community must fulfill their pledges to help southern Sudan recover after more than 30 years of its own war. Peace and reconstruction in Northern Uganda have to be supported by reconstruction and development in neighboring southern Sudan, which is critical for regional economic recovery and cross-border trade.

In a world of unending troubles for the United States, few would argue that Northern Uganda's future is among the most urgent strategic challenges. But our actions in coming weeks will be a critical test of our global leadership. How we act -- and if and how we lead -- will send a message throughout Africa and the rest of the world about what America stands for. We must not sit idly by as Uganda's people strive for peace.

The writer, a former Democratic senator from North Carolina and the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee, traveled to Uganda recently with the International Rescue Committee.

Victory For Lula (WP)

LUIZ INACIO Lula da Silva overcame some formidable negatives to win reelection as Brazil's president on Sunday, including a squalid series of corruption scandals and a lackluster record of growth during the past four years by Latin America's largest economy. But the reasons for his victory are mostly positive. The former metalworker and union leader, universally known simply as Lula, has been able to mobilize millions of Brazil's poor, who previously were largely excluded from the country's developing economy and democracy. Many of those people have seen tangible improvement in their lives thanks to Lula's policies, which have lifted some 8 million people out of poverty in a country of 185 million.

Lula's achievements have come without the populist trappings, irresponsible fiscal policies or erosion of democracy seen in other Latin American countries -- most notably, neighboring Venezuela. Brazil's often precarious finances are in better shape today than four years ago. International Monetary Fund loans have been paid off, inflation is a mere 4 percent and the country has $60 billion in foreign reserves. Poverty reduction has come about largely because of an innovative program under which the government provides poor families with a monthly cash subsidy if they meet certain requirements, such as sending their children to school and having them vaccinated.

With four more years to work with, Lula's challenge will be finding ways to tackle the big problem he failed to address: Brazil's sluggish growth. Redistribution of wealth is important in one of the world's most economically unequal societies, but Brazil can't prosper when it is growing at a rate below 3 percent, or less than half the rate of other emerging economies. Economists in and outside Brazil largely agree about what is needed: reductions in the sprawling state bureaucracy and runaway government spending, and in Latin America's highest taxes.

Unfortunately, the president hasn't shown much inclination to tackle these tasks. During his runoff campaign against a centrist former state governor, Lula ranted against what he said was the danger that Brazilian state companies and banks would be privatized. In fact, such privatizations are needed, as are more steps to liberalize trade and encourage foreign investment.

Lula campaigned against Brazil's foreign creditors four years ago, then surprised them by adopting orthodox fiscal policies after he took office. He would be wise to take the same course now and tackle the reform of the state, even while continuing programs for the poor. He has the opportunity to propel himself, and Brazil, into a position of leadership in Latin America by demonstrating how poverty can be addressed by sensible and sustainable policies rather than ruinous populism.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Suspect And A Setback In Al-Qaeda Anthrax Case (WP)

By Joby Warrick

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Scientist With Ties To Group Goes Free

In December 2001, as the investigation into the U.S. anthrax attacks was gathering steam, coalition soldiers in Afghanistan uncovered what appeared to be an important clue: a trail of documents chronicling an attempt by al-Qaeda to create its own anthrax weapon.

The documents told of a singular mission by a scientist named Abdur Rauf, an obscure, middle-aged Pakistani with alleged al-Qaeda sympathies and an advanced degree in microbiology.

Using his membership in a prestigious scientific organization to gain access, Rauf traveled through Europe on a quest, officials say, to obtain both anthrax spores and the equipment needed to turn them into highly lethal biological weapons. He reported directly to al-Qaeda's No. 2 commander, Ayman al-Zawahiri, and in one document he appeared to signal a breakthrough.

"I successfully achieved the targets," he wrote cryptically to Zawahiri in a note in 1999.

Precisely what Rauf achieved may never be known with certainty. That's because U.S. officials remain stymied in their nearly five-year quest to bring charges against a man who they say admitted serving as a top consultant to al-Qaeda on anthrax -- a claim that makes him one of a handful of people linked publicly to the group's effort to wage biological warfare against Western targets.

Rauf, 47, has been under scrutiny in Pakistan since he was detained there for questioning in late 2001, according to U.S. and Pakistani officials who agreed to talk about the case for the first time. But officially he remains free, and Pakistan now says it has no grounds for arrest. Last year, in an acknowledgment of the impasse in its four-year joint investigation with Pakistan, the FBI officially put the case on inactive status.

"We will never close the door, but the chances of getting him into the United States are slim to none," said one U.S. intelligence official, who, like others, agreed to discuss the case on the condition that he not be identified by name.

The documents that first revealed Rauf's role were part of a large stack of papers discovered in a house after coalition forces overran an al-Qaeda base in Kandahar, in southern Afghanistan. He emerges from documents and interviews as one of the most intriguing, and in some ways most troubling, figures in an international investigation into al-Qaeda's biological weapons program.

With the evidence against Rauf, some U.S. officials say they are perplexed about why Pakistani authorities have refused to further pursue him, while acknowledging that the case presents both legal and political difficulties for Pakistan.

To terrorism experts, Rauf is a symbol of a dangerous convergence: a marriage of militancy and technical expertise that could someday yield new kinds of highly lethal weapons to be used against civilians.

"He was someone who at least understood the professional procedures and methods," said Milton Leitenberg, an expert on biological weapons with the University of Maryland's Center for International and Security Studies who reviewed the seized documents. "In theory, if he went in the laboratory and tried and tried, maybe he could have gotten it right."

Exactly how far al-Qaeda progressed with Rauf's help is not publicly known. No one has turned up any links between his work and the U.S. anthrax attacks, in which spores were mailed in letters to news organizations and U.S. Senate offices. Coalition forces discovered rudimentary laboratories in Kandahar but no evidence of bioweapons production. Yet both the White House and a presidential commission have hinted at additional findings suggesting that the terrorists were much further along than was first thought.

Last year's presidential commission on intelligence failures, led by retired judge Laurence H. Silberman and former senator Charles S. Robb (D-Va.), described al-Qaeda's biological program as "extensive" and "well-organized," particularly with regard to "Agent X," a pathogen that terrorism experts say was almost certainly anthrax.

"Al-Qaeda had acquired several biological agents possibly as early as 1999, and the necessary equipment to enable limited, basic production of Agent X," the commission said.

U.S. officials are even more reticent in discussing possible links between al-Qaeda's anthrax program and the 2001 U.S. attacks, which killed five people and briefly shut down the U.S. Capitol. Privately, FBI officials doubt that such a link exists. They note that the attacks came with an explicit warning -- a letter advising the victims to take penicillin, resulting in a far lower death toll -- but without an explicit claim of responsibility. "It doesn't fit with al-Qaeda's modus operandi," one intelligence official said.

Yet U.S. officials have been unable to rule out al-Qaeda or any other group as a suspect. Earlier this month, FBI officials acknowledged that the ultra-fine powder mailed five years ago was simply made and could have been produced by a well-trained microbiologist anywhere in the world.

Several leading bioterrorism experts still contend that the evidence points to al-Qaeda or possibly an allied group that coordinated its attack with the Sept. 11, 2001, strikes on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. These experts point to hijacker Mohamed Atta's inquiries into renting a crop-duster aircraft and to an unexplained emergency-room visit by another hijacker, Ahmed Ibrahim A. Al Haznawi, for treatment of an unusual skin lesion that resembled cutaneous anthrax.

Whether or not al-Qaeda was involved, U.S. officials and bioterrorism experts agree on this: The alliance between the terrorist group and a little-known Pakistani scientist could have yielded disastrous results in time.The Quest for Anthrax

For all his expertise, Rauf was hardly the ideal candidate for helping al-Qaeda realize its ambition of making biological weapons.

The tall, thin and bespectacled scientist held a doctorate in microbiology but specialized in food production, according to U.S. officials familiar with the case. He had to learn about anthrax and other bioterrorism agents as he went along, slowing his progress considerably.

"He could potentially do a great deal of harm because of his knowledge and skills," said one U.S. intelligence expert connected with the case. "On the other hand, he lacked the specific knowledge and training al-Qaeda needed most."

Exactly how he became acquainted with Zawahiri remains unclear. Rauf worked at the prestigious Pakistan Council of Scientific and Industrial Research in his home town of Lahore, and officials speculate that he may have crossed paths professionally with Zawahiri, a physician.

In any case, captured documents suggest a close collaboration between the two men as they sought equipment for a bioweapons lab.

"I hope my letter will find you in the best of health and circumstances by the God Almighty," Rauf writes to Zawahiri in one of three intercepted notes.

The heavily redacted notes and other documents were obtained from the Defense Department through the Freedom of Information Act after they were first described in the journal Science in a 2003 article by three researchers at the National Defense University. Rauf's name was redacted, but U.S. and Pakistani officials confirmed his authorship in interviews with The Washington Post. Rauf's name was first publicly associated with the documents by Ross Getman, a New York lawyer who maintains a Web site devoted to the 2001 anthrax attacks.

Rauf was a member of the Society for Applied Microbiology, an international professional organization based in Britain, and he appears to have used his membership to make contacts and arrange visits related to his quest. One note from Rauf was handwritten on the group's stationery, apparently while he was attending a 1999 scientific conference at Porton Down, Britain's premier biodefense research center in the southern city of Wiltshire.

Rauf, who writes to Zawahiri in occasionally faltering English, admits in one note to several setbacks. For starters, he had found a supplier who could sell him Bacillus anthracis -- the bacterium that causes anthrax -- but it was a harmless strain incapable of killing anyone.

"Unfortunately, I did not find the required culture of B. anthrax -- i.e., pathogenic," he writes to Zawahiri. He then describes a new attempt to acquire a lethal strain from a different lab.

In a later note he is more upbeat, telling his patron he had "successfully achieved the targets" and had "tried to solve technical problems of our work." He ticked off a list of items he had acquired or arranged to purchase, including respirators, a fermenter used for growing bacteria and vaccines to protect lab workers against accidental exposure.

Rauf also describes an unusual visit -- apparently as the guest of another scientist -- to a high-containment biological lab where dangerous pathogens such as anthrax are kept.

"I visited along with [the host] all the units . . . including the special confidential room in which thousands of cultures are placed," the note reads.

Another handwritten note includes a crude diagram of a biological lab, identifying how space should be allocated for major tasks such as animal testing and growing bacteria.

A recurring theme in the notes is money, or Rauf's apparent lack of it. He complains in one note that his salary was cut while he was on leave from his job for postdoctoral research. "This is highly objectionable, unaffordable and unpracticable with me," he writes.

Rauf's money demands may have led to a falling-out with Zawahiri, who appears to have decided to explore other options for obtaining bacteria and lab equipment, said Rohan Gunaratna, an al-Qaeda expert with the Institute of Defense and Strategic Studies in Singapore.

Gunaratna said al-Qaeda leaders also collaborated with Yazid Sufaat, a member of an allied Southeast Asian group called Jemaah Islamiyah, in purchasing equipment for the Kandahar lab. Sufaat, who once studied chemistry at California State University at Sacramento, has been in custody since late 2001.

"Rauf was financially driven, and al-Qaeda didn't entirely trust him," Gunaratna said.Investigation Breaks Down

"There was great cooperation at the start," said one U.S. intelligence official who closely followed the case.

The FBI's New York office took the lead U.S. role, and its agents worked closely with the CIA and bureau officials in Pakistan in carrying out interrogations. Though not formally charged with any crimes, Rauf consented to questioning and provided useful leads, U.S. and Pakistani officials said. But problems began when the U.S. side sought to expand the investigation with the goal of pursuing criminal charges, including possible indictment and prosecution in the United States, officials from both countries confirmed.

In earlier cases, the Pakistani government incurred the wrath of Islamic leaders when it sought to prosecute professionals for alleged ties to al-Qaeda.

In 2003, the Pakistanis shut off U.S. access to Rauf. According to Pakistani officials familiar with the case, there simply was not enough evidence showing that he succeeded in providing al-Qaeda with something useful.

Since then, Rauf has been allowed to resume his normal life. Whether he has returned to his former workplace is unclear; officials at the research council declined to respond to requests for information about the scientist. Attempts to contact Rauf in Lahore were unsuccessful.

"He was detained for questioning, and later the courts determined there was not sufficient evidence to continue detaining him," said Tariq Azim Khan, Pakistan's information minister. "If there was evidence that proved his role beyond a shadow of a doubt, we would have acted on it. But that kind of evidence was not available."

Special correspondent Kamran Khan in Karachi, Pakistan, contributed to this report.

The Terror Suspect Who May Go Free (TIME)

By Bruce Crumley

Time, October 31, 2006

On the face of it, Abu Doha would appear to be the sort of case for which the U.S. offshore detention system was created. The 40-year-old Algerian militant is alleged by counter-terror officials to be a Qaeda-aligned terror kingpin and suspected of involvement in a number of plots around the world, including the "Millennium Bomb" plot aimed at Los Angeles International airport in 2000. Yet, as things stand, Abu Doha looks set to be freed from prison in Britain and deported on immigration violations, after the U.S dropped its bid to extradite him over the LAX plot.

The prospect of his going free troubles security officials on both sides of the Atlantic, and leaves some bewildered by Washington's decision to drop its case against him. British authorities say they don't have sufficient evidence to try Doha, and plan instead to deport him to his native Algeria. What happens then? "Either Doha is left free to do as he pleases, and probably one day vanish to resume his plotting work," says a French counter-terror official. "Or the Algerians cite some pretext for arresting and jailing him, and ensure he's not a threat to anyone."

Doha (a.k.a. "The Doctor," Rachid, Amar Makhlolif, and Didier Ajuelo) was arrested in February 2001 while trying to travel from London to Saudi Arabia on a fake passport. Six months later, the U.S. filed an extradition request after a Federal grand jury indicted Doha as a co-conspirator in the LAX plot, based on evidence and an affidavit signed by would-be bomber Ahmed Ressam that Doha had overseen the attempted attack. "[Doha] actually moved Ressam from Afghanistan back to Canada" to plan and execute the Millennium bombing, explains a senior U.S. intelligence official. But after initially sharing his knowledge of terror networks, Ressam ceased cooperating with prosecutors sometime in 2003 — and even after two years of coaxing and cajoling, claims to have "forgotten" the information he'd earlier provided.

In August, 2005 — shortly after Ressam was sentenced to 22 years in prison — U.S. officials withdrew the Doha indictment, explaining that "Ressam's testimony would have been an essential part in the Government's evidence at trial against Abu Doha."

Even though Ressam refused to testify in court, the fact that he had spilled the beans on Doha and evidence pointing to Doha's role as a Qaeda recruiter raises questions over the U.S. decision to drop the extradition request — particularly if the consequence of doing so is that Doha will go free. With no terror related charges pending, Doha faces an immigration hearing in early 2007 that may end with his deportation from Britain. In Washington, officials at the U.S. Departments of State and Justice, as well at the CIA, refused to comment on Doha's case. (Each referred TIME to the other departments for an answer as to how the U.S. could lose its purchase on such a major alleged terror suspect.) Says one European security official with long involvement in the investigation of Doha's activities, "There is something strange about this case."

U.S. officials are certainly aware of the danger of Doha being turned loose. "There's concern about what he'll do," says the U.S. intelligence official. "After he's released, he'll probably return to his old friends. Anybody who's been engaged in a potential plot against us — and who we believe will return to being engaged with the same group that he was beforehand — would cause some problems."

French and U.S. officials concur on a picture of Doha's activities during the 1990s that included serving as al Qaeda's coordinator for Europe, and recruiting scores, perhaps hundreds, of young Muslims into clandestine network, sending many for training in Afghanistan at a specially designated camp,

Although France, Italy and Germany had evidence tying Doha to specific plots, they refrained from making their own extradition requests once the U.S. had signaled its intention to put Doha on trial. But now that the U.S. case has been dropped, it's too late for the Europeans to step in, because the cases in which they would have charged Doha have already been tried, and can't legally be reopened without new evidence against him.

The French are incredulous at the prospect of Doha going free. "How can you have Abu Zubaydah, Khaled Sheikh Mohammed, and who knows how many low-level fighters in secret camps and let someone of Abu Doha's stature free by deporting him?" the French counter-terrorism official asks. "It's incomprehensible that someone with his profile will be deported to freedom and allowed to resume his activities."

So incomprehensible, in fact, that some suspect it won't be that simple. In light of Algeria's traditionally ruthless treatment of Islamist militants, Amnesty International warns that Britain may be sending him home to face abuses. "If Abu Doha is deported as planned, he faces grave danger of detention and torture in Algeria," says an Amnesty spokesman in London, who says at least 12 specific cases of alleged secret detention and torture in Algeria have been reported to his group since 2002. In August, a British court ruling struck down challenges to such deportations on human rights grounds, citing Algeria's recently-applied Charter For Peace and Reconciliation — which offers pardons to security force members and surrendered radicals responsible for violent crimes — as a guarantee of fair treatment for deportees. Amnesty mocks that decision and its application in the Doha case, given British officials' own description of Doha as an active security threat rather than the repentant jihadist that Algiers might pardon.

Doha's attorneys are fighting his deportation, but did not respond to multiple requests to comment on the allegations made against their client by counter-terror officials. British Home Office officials would not comment beyond confirming that Doha's deportation case is based on an "immigration violation." Amnesty International fears a darker agenda. "The government claims Abu Doha is a security threat, yet can't convict him of anything here — so they send this dangerous man to what one might presume would be freedom in Algeria," the Amnesty spokesman says. "It's very difficult not to wonder if this is being done with the prior knowledge that Algeria will be interning and perhaps interrogating Abu Doha on behalf of the U.S. or U.K."

Padilla: Dismiss Charges (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, October 31, 2006

Jose Padilla, the former enemy combatant now accused of joining a suspected South Florida terror cell, says a federal judge should throw out an indictment against him because he was ``tortured by the United States government without cause or justification."

Padilla -- a U.S. citizen who called Fort Lauderdale home during the 1990s -- claims he was so mistreated in military detention by interrogators that prosecutors should be barred from trying him on terrorism charges in Miami federal court.

On Monday, the U.S. attorney's office was given until Nov. 13 by the presiding judge to respond to Padilla's allegations.

Padilla claims he was isolated in a tiny cell around the clock, deprived of sleep on a steel bunk with no mattress, shackled and manacled for hours on end, and threatened with being cut with a knife and having alcohol poured on the wounds. He also claims he was given drugs against his will -- believed to be LSD or PCP -- ``to act as a sort of truth serum during his interrogations."

Padilla's allegations in court papers mark the first time he has given his account of his detention in a U.S. Navy brig in South Carolina from June 2002 until December 2005. Padilla, 36, had been in the Middle East allegedly training with the al Qaeda terrorist group before his arrest by the FBI in the United States on May 8, 2002.

NO EVIDENCE CITED

Padilla provides no evidence to support the allegations contained in a federal court motion filed this month, though his legal team has gathered details of his military detention. He was transferred to the Federal Detention Center in downtown Miami in January.

President Bush dropped Padilla's designation as an enemy combatant almost a year ago after administration officials accused him of plotting to detonate a radiological "dirty bomb" on U.S. soil. No formal charges were filed. Padilla's bid to challenge his military detention was not taken up by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Now that Padilla is in federal custody, he is trying to prove to U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke that the government's conduct during his military detention was so "outrageous" that his constitutional rights were violated. That should be grounds for dismissing the Miami indictment against him, he argues.

The indictment alleges that he and two other Muslim men were part of a North American terror cell that conspired to provide material support -- money, recruits and other resources -- for terrorist activities abroad.

APPEAL POSSIBLE

The government's prosecution of Padilla and his two co-defendants has not gone as smoothly as first envisioned by Bush administration officials. The trial, set for Jan. 22, might be delayed while Miami prosecutors appeal Cooke's dismissal of the first count in the indictment, which alleged that Padilla and two others ``conspired to murder, kidnap and maim persons in a foreign country . . . to advance violent jihad."

Cooke's ruling -- if it stands -- effectively eliminates the possibility of life sentences for the three defendants. If Padilla, Adham Amin Hassoun and Kifah Wael Jayyousi are convicted on the remaining terror charges, they could face up to a maximum 15 years in prison.

Hassoun, the alleged ringleader, got to know Padilla at Fort Lauderdale-area mosques during the 1990s and is accused of recruiting him for jihad overseas.

NYC Terror Trial Likely In Spring For Musician, Doctor, 2 Others (AP)

By Larry Neumeister

AP, October 31, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — A judge on Monday refused to toss out charges against a musician, a doctor and two other men accused of supporting terrorists, even though defense lawyers argued they had been unfairly targeted for prosecution.

U.S. District Judge Loretta A. Preska rejected claims that the men were snared through entrapment and outrageous conduct by an overzealous government beginning in late 2001.

She said evidence in the case could be viewed as showing the men had made statements and taken actions making them "predisposed to commit these crimes" even before the government sent a confidential informant to record their conversations and gather evidence.

The judge said a trial will begin in April or June for Dr. Rafiq Abdus Sabir, of Boca Raton, Fla., jazz musician and martial arts expert Tarik Shah, of New York, bookstore owner Abdulrahman Farhane, of Brooklyn, and Washington, D.C., cab driver Mahmud Faruq Brent, of Gwynn Oak, Md.

An indictment in the case accuses Farhane and Shah of conspiring in 2001 to help an FBI cooperating witness send money to aid Islamic militants fighting Americans in Afghanistan.

Brent was accused of conspiring to help Lashkar-e-Taiba, which the United States designated a terrorist organization in December 2001. Prosecutors said Sabir, who was educated in the Ivy League, agreed to treat holy warriors, or jihadists, in Saudi Arabia.

All the defendants have pleaded not guilty and are being held without bail. Prosecutors, who had no comment on the judge's ruling Monday, have said evidence in the case includes information taken from the computers of the defendants, firearms, videotapes and taped conversations.

Sabir's lawyer, Edward Wilford, said the doctor only promised to provide medical treatment and there was no difference between what he wanted to do and what volunteers for Doctors Without Borders or the American Red Cross do.

"He's willing to provide medicine; that's what a doctor does," said Wilford, who also filed a motion to dismiss the charges against his client based on that argument.

The judge said she would rule later on that motion.

Families for the defendants attended the morning-long proceeding and brought along some of their small children, who made enough noise in the courtroom to attract smiles and laughter from the defendants, who sat handcuffed in the jury box.

As the defendants entered and left the courtroom, they waved, smiled and called out to friends and family members, who did the same.

Doctor's Alleged Pledge Is Crux Of Terror Case (NYS)

DOJ_NMG_0089084

By Joseph Goldstein
New York Sun, October 31, 2006

Rafiq Sabir, a Columbia University-trained doctor, has been kept in solitary confinement since he was arrested last year on charges that he swore fealty to Osama bin Laden in the presence of an undercover FBI agent.

Yesterday, in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, attorneys debated whether the unusual pledge Dr. Sabir allegedly made — an offer to treat wounded jihadists in Saudi Arabia — constituted a crime. The argument covered topics ranging from the Hippocratic Oath to the statute on material support of terrorism.

Dr. Sabir, of Boca Raton, Fla., is one of four men charged in a wide-ranging conspiracy to aid Al Qaeda and send money to jihadists in Afghanistan and Chechnya. The case is scheduled for trial sometime next year.

Dr. Sabir's attorney, Edward Wilford, told the judge, Loretta Preska, that the defendant should not be prosecuted over the alleged pledge because a doctor has a right to help patients recover.

"It's not as though he's setting up a laboratory somewhere trying to find a way to make jihadists stronger," Mr. Wilford said. "Does it make sense to have a statute that stops doctors from treating people?"

Judge Preska said a ruling on whether to dismiss the charges against Dr. Sabir would come later. She expressed skepticism at Mr. Wilford's criticism of the law.

Judge Preska also did not seem swayed when Mr. Wilford pointed out that the material support of terrorism statute contains a specific exemption for providing medicine. Judge Preska seemed to interpret the exemption as pertaining only to pills and drugs, not medical care.

"It says medicine," Judge Preska said. "It doesn't say medical support or personnel."

The prosecutor in the case, Karl Metzner, said Dr. Sabir's pledge to aid wounded Al Qaeda operatives "was a completely different scenario" than the example of a doctor on call who treated a wounded jihadist who came to him looking for medical attention.

Sens. Look For Supermax Fix (DENP)

By Erin Emery, Denver Post Staff Writer
Denver Post, October 31, 2006

The funding for the prison housing terrorists and other notorious criminals is the focus of Allard and Salazar.

Florence - Colorado's two U.S. senators have vowed to seek solutions to understaffing and security concerns at Supermax, home to the nation's most dangerous criminals.

Sen. Wayne Allard visited the prison Monday, and Sen. Ken Salazar visited Saturday. Both agree that increases in staffing and security measures are needed at the prison, which holds such notorious criminals as al-Qaeda member Zacarias Moussaoui and Oklahoma bombing conspirator Terry Nichols.

Salazar said he plans to talk this week to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, and Allard said he will talk to Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin on Nov. 13 about the need for more funding for security upgrades.

"The key issues are No. 1 staffing and whether or not the staffing levels are as high as necessary in order to ensure the public safety as well as the security of the guards working in the prison," Salazar said.

Salazar said the federal government should also look at technology upgrades and building a perimeter fence to deter people from approaching the prison from the outside, which he said was a bigger threat than escape.

Earlier this month, the Department of Justice's inspector general reported that the federal prison system does not read all the mail or effectively monitor phone calls of prisoners.

Allard said the notorious criminals and terrorists housed at Supermax who are in isolation are not communicating with outsiders. The inspector general report addresses those criminals who have certain privileges, and not all of their communications are monitored, he said.

Also this month, a federal arbitrator found that job hazards at Supermax had increased because of low staffing. Joseph Lazar ordered the Federal Bureau of Prisons to boost safety for correctional officers at the prison.

Lazar found that assaults and threats by inmates increased after the Bureau of Prisons implemented a "mission-critical roster" - the lowest level of staffing needed to run a safe and secure institution - in March 2005. Since then, the number of correctional officers has dropped by about 12 percent.

"They've actually been going below those staffing levels," said Mike Schnobrich, a union official. "What the correctional officers in (Supermax) and across the Bureau of Prisons are saying is that right now, something in the system is broke. It's not been run as safe as it can be."

In a meeting Monday between Fremont County and Florence leaders, officials expressed concerns about radio incompatibility between the region's first responders and between Bureau of Prisons officers. They also raised concerns about transporting prisoners who land at the Fremont County Jail and the well-being of officers who work in the prison and have families in the community.

Fremont County Sheriff James Beicker expressed frustration that the process to receive money from the Department of Homeland Security had been mired in bureaucracy.

State Rep. Buffie McFadyen, whose district includes Supermax, said: "I'm hoping by educating our own Colorado delegation to the job at Supermax that they in turn will educate others around the country as to why this facility deserves funding and why the mission of this facility is no less important to the homeland security to this country than the Department of Defense."

Federal Fire Grants Shown To Vary Widely (AP)

By Ben Evans

AP, October 30, 2006

Georgia has twice the population of neighboring Alabama, yet Alabama agencies received more than double the amount of federal firefighting grants last year for trucks, gear and uniforms.

The disparity was not an aberration. Alabama has been among the top grant winners in the Homeland Security Department's program for several years — apparently because it does a good job asking for the money.

Statistics for the Assistance to Firefighters Grant program — the nation's largest firefighting grant initiative — show that states get widely varying shares of a $600 million federal pool. States that submit applications in large numbers, rather than those with the largest populations or highest risk factors, have more success in winning federal dollars.

For example, Alabama departments were awarded $21.7 million in grants in 2005, or $4.76 per person, in a state with a population of about 4.5 million.

Georgia, with about 9 million people, received $10.4 million, or $1.15 per person. Alabama departments submitted 677 applications, while Georgia submitted 342.

"All we do is work to be as aggressive as we can," said Alabama's director of homeland security, Jim Walker. "It's really a matter of reading the guidelines and ... getting the word out."

Pennsylvania has topped the list in recent years. Submitting 1,939 applications in 2005, the state's local departments won $41.3 million in grants, or about $3.32 per person. Agencies in California, which sent 524 applications, got $26.3 million, or about 73 cents per person.

Nevada submitted just 44 applications and got $2.1 million, or about 88 cents per person, while Montana submitted 224 applications and received $6.8 million, or $7.25 per person.

Homeland Security officials emphasize that while other federal grants are focused on potential terrorist attacks in large urban areas, the firefighting grants — as designed by Congress — were established before the Sept. 11 attacks and are aimed at building basic capabilities at local departments. The applications are scored by industry peers and grants are awarded largely based on those reviews, the officials said.

"A lot of this comes back to the fact that some states have taken a very active role," said George Foresman, undersecretary for preparedness at Homeland Security, noting that Pennsylvania is known for its vast, tight-knit network of small departments. "It just differs from state to state."

The geographical discrepancies, however, are evidence of the debate about whether Homeland Security dollars should be spent on what traditionally has been a local responsibility, said Paul Light, a New York University professor of public service who focuses on organizational performance.

The Bush administration, which has sought to cut the program's budget, and other critics say the money should be targeted toward higher-risk areas.

Firefighting professionals say the money is critical for building a nationwide emergency network, noting for example that thousands of firefighters poured into Louisiana after Hurricane Katrina.

They also point out that demand for the grants overall has far exceeded available funding. The Homeland Security Department typically gets some 20,000 applications a year and rejects two-thirds of them.

Rich Duffy, assistant to the general president at the International Association of Fire Fighters union, said the grant application process is relatively easy and some departments are simply more attuned to the program.

"We've done our best to alert our members to the availability of funds," Duffy said. "It's not just the fire departments, though. It's the cities. You're dealing with a bureaucracy on a city level as well that probably just doesn't understand it."

First authorized in 2000, the program lets local departments apply for money to be used on clothing, tools, training equipment, vehicles and other needs. Most grants are less than $300,000, although cities can get as much as $2 million.

Larger departments, in cities with populations of 50,000 or more, are required to provide a 20 percent funding match, compared with just 5 percent for smaller agencies.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Student Searched Over Fake Boarding Pass (HC/AP)

By Ryan Lenz, Associated Press Writer

Houston Chronicle, October 31, 2006

— FBI agents searched the home of an Indiana University computer security student over the weekend after learning his Web page included a feature to print fake Northwest Airlines Corp. boarding passes, officials said Monday.

Wendy Osborne, a spokeswoman for the FBI's Indianapolis office, said agents on Saturday searched the apartment of Christopher Soghoian, a 24-year-old doctoral student, in Bloomington, Ind. Osborne would not discuss what, if anything, was uncovered or taken as evidence.

"Obviously we have a concern for passenger safety and security," she said.

Soghoian, who has not been charged or detained, declined to comment on the FBI investigation when reached by The Associated Press by e-mail Monday, but referred to his Web journal for information on the case.

Soghoian said last week that the boarding pass generator he created was intended to illustrate flaws in airport security. The passenger name on the fake boarding pass was "Bin Laden/Osama," though users were able to input a different name, he said.

According to Soghoian, no one could use the fake pass to actually board a flight _ so long as the airline's computers were working _ because the bar code would not match other information on the pass.

On his Web journal "slight paranoia," Soghoian posted the FBI's sealed search warrant, dated Oct. 28, and said the FBI had "ransacked" his home and taken his computers.

"I didn't sleep at home last night. It's fair to say I was rather shaken up," Soghoian wrote Saturday after an FBI visit. "I came back today, to find the glass on the front door smashed."

In recent posts, Soghoian asked for lawyers to contact him, and established a legal defense fund through PayPal, which manages Web-based money transfers.

Soghoian said he built his Web site to mimic Northwest Airlines boarding passes because he had one handy after flying the Minneapolis-based carrier on a recent flight.

DIY Boarding Pass Site Gets Shut Down (CNET)

By Joris Evers, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News.com, October 31, 2006

A Web site that let anyone with an Internet connection and a printer create fake airline boarding passes has been shut down after federal agents visited the creator.

FBI agents raided Christopher Soghoian's home over the weekend, seizing computers and other equipment, Soghoian wrote on his blog. They first visited him Friday afternoon with a request to take the site down, but when he got online, he found that the site had already been removed, he wrote.

Soghoian, reached via e-mail on Monday, declined to comment for this story, citing advice from his lawyers to lie low.

Wendy Osborne, a spokeswoman for the FBI's Indianapolis office, confirmed that agents had searched Soghoian's home as part of a joint investigation with the Transportation Security Administration. "We will conduct a thorough and complete investigation," Osborne said. "We are certainly concerned with any potential breach in security, particularly at the airports."

Soghoian, a computer security student at Indiana University Bloomington built the Web site to underscore an airport security weakness, he wrote. The site was spotlighted late last week after Wired News and ABC News reported on it. U.S. Rep. Edward Markey, a Massachusetts Democrat, called for Soghoian's arrest, but then backed off on Sunday.

The FBI will present the findings of its investigation to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Indiana, which will determine whether Soghoian violated any federal laws, she said. At this point, the student has not been charged and he has not been arrested, Osborne said.

Soghoian's "Northwest Airlines Boarding Pass Generator" let people create boarding passes that look virtually identical to the ones printed from the Northwest Airlines Web site. They could be used to get past airport security, but not to get on an airplane, because the airline would have no record of the reservation, Soghoian said.

"I have not flown, or even attempted to enter the airport with one of these fake boarding passes," Soghoian wrote Friday. "I haven't even printed one out. All I have done is create PHP script, which highlights a security hole made public by others before me."

The Web site went online last Wednesday and immediately attracted attention. Bruce Schneier, a noted security expert, linked to it from his blog on Thursday. Schneier highlighted the same issue with the print-at-home boarding passes on his mailing list more than three years ago. U.S. Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, warned of the same security issue last year and again in April this year.

Flight To Ft. Lauderdale Diverted Due To Disruptive Passenger (BRAH)

The Bradenton Herald, October 31, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. - JetBlue flight from Boston to Fort Lauderdale was diverted to Orlando after a passenger became disruptive, authorities said.

David Collyer, 30, was taken off flight 457 and into FBI custody Sunday after a "possible altercation with flight crew," FBI spokesman Kevin Farrington said.

Collyer, of Sharon, Mass., had to "be physically restrained by flight crew and passengers" a JetBlue employee told an officer who arrived on scene, according to an Orlando Police Department report. Neither Collyer nor the 156 passengers and 6 crew members were injured. Details of the incident were not being released pending an investigation, Farrington said.

Collyer, who was charged with flight interference, appeared in court Monday, he said. He was released on $10,000 unsecured bond, according to the South Florida Sun-Sentinel.

A telephone call placed to his public defender was not immediately returned Monday.

The Airbus A320 departed Boston Logan International Airport at 5:08 p.m. and was scheduled to land at Fort Lauderdale International Airport at 7:35 p.m. Flight crew members decided to take a precautionary measure and land at Orlando International Airport where Collyer was taken into custody for questioning, said Sebastian White, a spokesman for JetBlue.

"We don't have details of exactly what was happening, but our flight crew take whatever precautionary measures were necessary," White said.

After a two-hour delay, the flight continued to Fort Lauderdale without the passenger. It landed in Fort Lauderdale at 11:05 p.m.

Unruly JetBlue Passenger Apologizes To Magistrate (ORS)

By Pedro Ruz Gutierrez, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, October 31, 2006

A passenger who was arrested Sunday night after authorities say he became disruptive on a Boston-Fort Lauderdale JetBlue flight was released after appearing before a magistrate in Orlando's federal court.

Magistrate James Glazebrook ordered David Collyer released from custody on a $10,000 unsecured bond. The incident aboard Flight 457 forced the crew to make an unscheduled landing at Orlando International Airport. Collyer said he was "sorry" and then had no more comment as he left the federal building in downtown Orlando this afternoon.

The Airbus A320 departed Boston Logan International Airport at 5:08 p.m. and was scheduled to land at Fort Lauderdale International Airport at 7:35 p.m. Flight crew members decided to take a precautionary measure and land at OIA.

After a two-hour delay, the flight continued to Fort Lauderdale without the passenger. It landed in Fort Lauderdale at 11:05 p.m.

Democrats Wait In The Wings With Subpoenas (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089088

Both political parties say America's safety requires the next Congress to improve mass-transit security and intelligence efforts, but Democrats think it must immediately address fraud and waste at the Department of Homeland Security.

Democrats vow to flex their subpoena and investigative muscles if elected to lead Congress next month and will take on President Bush's use of wiretaps.

"We have not had significant issues addressed from an oversight standpoint -- we've not issued one subpoena," said Rep. Bennie Thompson, the Mississippi Democrat who as ranking member of the House Homeland Security Department is in line to lead the panel.

"Leadership, in agreement with the chairman, just decided that it [investigations] was not a priority," Mr. Thompson said. "That will not be a problem with the new Congress."

Democrats have an outside chance of taking complete control of Congress, but a better chance of winning one chamber, and in this series, The Washington Times will look at how such a transfer of power will affect U.S. policy and politics.

Both of the Democratic Capitol Hill leaders, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, have said Mr. Bush is threatening civil liberties in the name of war and pledged to force the administration to obtain court orders before issuing wiretaps of terror suspects.

Democrats say that Mr. Bush's wiretaps without court orders violate the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) -- created in 1978 to ensure court oversight -- and that they will legislate allowances to obtain the subpoenas in a speedy manner.

"We will pass tough and smart legislation to deal with this important legislation," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Mr. Reid.

Probing deeper

Mr. Bush had fought to conduct the war on terror on his own terms but recently sought congressional authority for the most contentious programs, including the National Security Agency's (NSA) wiretapping without court orders.

The House passed a bill allowing the NSA to listen to phone calls between the United States and overseas, but the Senate did not pass legislation before adjourning for the elections.

Mr. Bush uses the issue on the campaign trail, holding up House Democrats' votes against the program as a reason they should not be trusted with control of Congress.

"The American people must fully understand that the vast majority of Democrats opposed the right of this administration to have a tool necessary to protect you," he said while campaigning last week. "We just have a different view. They must not think we're at war."

Democrats say Republicans have been negligent in overseeing various departments and programs related to the nation's security. They say investigations would lead to subpoenas and oversight hearings of waste, fraud and abuse within emergency, immigration and transportation safety agencies.

Mr. Manley said there is a need for increased oversight "because there has been none for the last six years, especially in homeland security."

"Mr. Reid is a strong supporter of the need for proper and adequate oversight and feels this Congress has utterly failed on oversight of the administration's programs, and that's one thing he intends to push for," Mr. Manley said.

Brian Darling, a former Senate staffer and director of Senate relations for the Heritage Foundation, says the Bush administration should prepare for an onslaught of subpoenas from the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

"It will be two years of investigations, just short of impeachment hearings," Mr. Darling said. "You will see two years of subpoenas to investigate Bush."

Mrs. Pelosi has promised multiple investigations but has said "impeachment is off the table."

"It is a waste of time," Mrs. Pelosi said. "Making them lame ducks is good enough for me."

Besides wasting money, Democrats say Republicans have consistently failed to properly fund port and mass-transit security, improperly distributed first-responder money without regard to a jurisdiction's threat level and failed to implement recommendations from the September 11 commission.

Actions, not words

Republican staffers say a Democrat-led Congress would devolve into a constant fight over increasing spending levels for security -- and possibly over the structure of the Republican-created DHS.

One staffer for the House Homeland Security Committee called the agenda "Pelosi talking points" and says Congress has implemented 39 of 41 of the September 11 commission's recommendations.

"Democrats have stood in the way of several of the most important reforms, and just last month, 162 House Democrats voted against the terrorist tribunals bill, another key recommendation of the commission," the staffer said, including in the count an independent legislator who caucuses with the Democrats.

Republicans point out that they not only created a department to protect the homeland, but also pushed through legislation to ramp up border security, port security and the tracking of terrorist finances.

Republicans note that every Democrat voted against making the House Homeland Security Committee a permanent panel, and that, if in control, Republicans would continue to prepare the U.S. for another attack and work to identify vulnerabilities and threats against critical infrastructure.

"Since September 11, 2001, Republicans in Congress have worked hard to strengthen our national security and have several accomplishments to show for it," said Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican and House Homeland Security Committee chairman.

"These accomplishments include: stronger port security, improved chemical plant security, reforms to FEMA, over $30 billion in federal funding and enhanced interoperable communication systems for first responders, and sound border security reforms."

Mr. Bush rejected the two remaining September 11 commission recommendations to declassify the top-line intelligence budget and give to the Defense Department lead responsibility for directing and executing paramilitary operations, whether clandestine or covert.

Democrats say they are also frustrated by a lack of leadership from Mr. King, who Mr. Thompson said failed to protect the panel's authority in committee turf wars.

Authority over the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and the Coast Guard, once held by the homeland-security committee, is now in the purview of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee chaired by Rep. Don Young, Alaska Republican.

"We have ceded power by our inaction," Mr. Thompson said.

Common ground

In comparison, the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee is one of the most amicable, bipartisan panels on Capitol Hill. It is led by Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican and chairman, and ranking member Joe Lieberman of Connecticut.

Reached by phone for an interview on Oct. 20, Miss Collins was in Connecticut campaigning for Mr. Lieberman, who lost the Democratic primary after siding with Mr. Bush on the war in Iraq and is running as an independent.

"I have a great relationship with Joe Lieberman, and although I very much want to remain chairman, I think the committee would continue to produce bipartisan consensus legislation under his leadership," Miss Collins said.

Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg, New Jersey Democrat, is threatening to challenge Mr. Lieberman's ascension to committee chairman, and other Democrats have suggested that Mr. Lieberman's support for the war would impede his ability to investigate the administration.

"Most of the committee Democrats are people whom I work very well with, but there are a couple who have been extremely partisan in their approach," Miss Collins said. "If one of them were able to somehow bump Lieberman, then it would change the nature of the committee, and my prediction is it would be far less productive."

"It would be a contentious committee," Miss Collins said.

Mr. Darling says the current Senate committee is "consensus-oriented."

"They don't have much conflict on that committee, and they have passed some significant port-security legislation because there is no partisan [rancor]," he said.

The Senate committee has conducted active oversight and investigations and issued subpoenas, including on the government's response to Hurricane Katrina.

Hundreds of interviews with witnesses and more than 800,000 pages of evidence were reviewed in 23 hearings, and lead to the FEMA reorganization legislation. Miss Collins and Mr. Lieberman also authored the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act and Chemical Facility Anti-Terrorism Act.

Leslie Phillips, Mr. Lieberman's committee spokeswoman, said the senator has not indicated what his agenda might be should Democrats take over the Senate.

"But as the ranking member, he has demonstrated a willingness to aggressively investigate government accountability and the failure of government to adequately regulate various industries," said Miss Phillips, citing the Enron investigation, FEMA, and September 11 investigations.

"It is fair to say his agenda would include more resources for homeland security and vigorous oversight of the department and FEMA," Miss Phillips said.

WAR NEWS:

Cheney: Iraq Violence Linked To Election (AP)

AP, October 31, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney said Monday the increase of violence in Iraq is linked with efforts to influence the outcome of midterm elections in which Republicans are struggling to keep control of Congress.

"It's my belief that they're very sensitive of the fact that we've got an election scheduled and they can get on the Web sites like anybody else," Cheney said. He said al-Qaida and other elements were trying to "break the will of the American people" because "they think we don't have the stomach for the fight long-term."

Asked if the attacks were timed to influence the U.S. elections, Cheney said, "That's my belief."

Eight days before the elections, Cheney sat down for interviews for Fox News Channel's `Your World with Neil Cavuto' and CNBC's "Kudlow & Company."

Now in its fourth year, the Iraq war is a political liability for Bush and Republican allies. The U.S. death toll for October alone exceeds 100 — the fourth deadliest month for U.S. troops since the war began in March 2003. Over the course of the war, more than 2,800 Americans have died.

Cheney, who 17 months ago said the insurgency was in its last throes, said that "there's going to be probably a continued level of violence for some considerable period of time in Iraq." He said that unlike other wars, it was unlikely there would be some dramatic turning point that signals progress.

"There is progress," Cheney said. "It's just — you're not going to see the kind of thing ... a victory like Midway in World War II where we sank all the enemy carriers, or a surrender ceremony at the end of the war. It's the kind of thing where you have to keep grinding it out day after day after day. It's tough."

USA Today, October 31, 2006

Vice President Cheney said Monday that the increase of violence in Iraq is linked with efforts to influence the outcome of the elections Nov. 7 in which Republicans are trying to keep control of Congress.

“It's my belief that they're very sensitive of the fact that we've got an election scheduled and they can get on the websites like anybody else,” Cheney said of insurgents in Iraq during an interview with Fox News.

He said al-Qaeda and other elements were trying to “break the will of the American people” because “they think we don't have the stomach for the fight.” The U.S. death toll for October has topped 100, making it the fourth-deadliest month since the war began in 2003.

Bush blasts ‘activist judges,' gay marriage

President Bush decried gay marriage and “judicial activism” at a campaign stop in Statesboro, Ga. “For decades, activist judges have tried to redefine America by court order,” Bush said. “Just this last week in New Jersey, another activist court issued a ruling that raises doubt about the institution of marriage. We believe marriage is a union between a man and a woman.” The line earned Bush sustained applause at a rally for former GOP congressman Max Burns' effort to unseat Democratic incumbent John Barrow. The New Jersey Supreme Court ruled that same-sex couples must be given the benefits of married couples.

Calif. congressman aims for presidency

Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., said he will form an exploratory committee to begin raising money and organizing supporters for a possible 2008 presidential bid. “This is going to be a long road, (and) it's a challenging road; there's going to be some rough and tumble, but I think it's the right thing to do for our country,” Hunter, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said at a news conference in San Diego.

Hunter, 58, is a familiar face on Capitol Hill and at the Pentagon as chairman of the panel that oversees military policy. Carl Luna, a political science professor at San Diego's Mesa College, said Hunter may be preparing himself for losing his chairmanship of the committee if Democrats take control of the House. “He doesn't want to have to go from being chairman of a powerful committee to just another back-bencher,” Luna said.

Michael J. Fox: ‘I'm not going to go away'

Actor Michael J. Fox campaigned in Ohio for Democratic Senate candidate Sherrod Brown, saying the country needs leaders who support scientific research. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, has been campaigning across the nation for candidates who favor federal funding for research using embryonic stem cells, which he says could lead to a cure. Brown, an Ohio congressman, is challenging GOP Sen. Mike DeWine, who opposes federal money for such research.

DOJ_NMG_0089091

In a speech to 150 supporters, Fox responded to criticism from radio talk-show host Rush Limbaugh, who suggested Fox was “off his medication or acting” in a political ad. “I had a run-in with a less-than-compassionate conservative,” Fox said. “I guess I'm not supposed to speak with you until my symptoms go away. Or maybe I'm just supposed to go away. But I'm not going to go away.”

12 accused of voter registration fraud

Twelve people have been charged with tricking voters in Orange County, Calif., into registering as Republicans, prosecutors said. The defendants, ranging in age from 19 to 52, were accused of fraudulently registering 37 voters as Republicans between August 2005 and February 2006. The suspects were hired to register new Republicans by private firms paid by the Orange County Republican Party, prosecutors said. No charges were filed against the companies or the party.

The recruiters were paid $10 a head for newly registered Republicans in a district represented by U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a Democrat. Voters were asked to sign petitions for lower taxes or stricter sex-offender laws, then tricked into signing voter registration cards, county prosecutor Anthony Rackauckas said.

Hadley On Visit Asserts U.S. View (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

BAGHDAD -- National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley huddled with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his security chief, Mouwafak al-Rubaie, during an unannounced visit to Baghdad, telling them he "wanted to reinforce some of the things you have heard from our president."

Mr. al-Rubaie said last night that Mr. Hadley had discussed the work of a five-man committee that Mr. al-Maliki and Mr. Bush agreed to set up during a telephone conversation on Saturday. Mr. Hadley also presented proposals concerning the training and equipping of Iraqi security forces as well as security plans.

"It was a useful visit," Mr. al-Rubaie said, but he refused to give any details, saying only that Mr. Hadley's meetings were limited to Mr. al-Rubaie and Mr. al-Maliki.

The meetings came as the American death toll for October rose past 100. A member of the 89th Military Police Brigade was killed in east Baghdad yesterday, and a Marine died in fighting in insurgent-plagued Anbar province the previous day, raising to 101 the number of U.S. service members killed in October, the fourth-deadliest month of the war.

At least 81 other persons were killed across Iraq, including 33 who died when a suspected Sunni insurgent bomber detonated his device among a group of day laborers in Sadr City. The blast tore through food stalls and kiosks shortly after 6 a.m. The blast wounded 59.

According to an Associated Press count, October has produced more Iraqi civilian deaths -- 1,170 so far -- than any other month since the AP began keeping track in May 2005.

The White House said Mr. Hadley was not on a mission to repair ragged relations, accounts of which it said had been "overblown" by the press.

"Absolutely not," said Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the National Security Council in Washington. "This is a long-planned trip to get a firsthand report of the situation on the ground from the political, economic and security fronts."

Last week Mr. al-Maliki issued a string of bitter complaints -- at one point saying he wasn't "America's man in Iraq" -- after U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad announced adjustments in America's Iraq strategy.

The ambassador announced that the prime minister agreed to implement a set of timelines, prompting Mr. al-Maliki to accuse the White House of infringing on his government's sovereignty and say that he was not consulted.

By week's end, Mr. al-Maliki and President Bush held a hastily convened video conference call and agreed to speed the training of Iraqi forces and the return of control over all territory to the Iraqi army.

The case of a kidnapped American soldier, meanwhile, took a curious turn when a woman claiming to be his mother-in-law said the soldier was married to her daughter, a Baghdad college student.

She said the soldier was with the young woman and her family when hooded gunmen handcuffed him and threw him in the back seat of a white Mercedes last week. The marriage would violate U.S. military regulations.

U.S. Envoy Arrives In Iraq As Tough Options Loom (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And John F. Burns

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 30 — President Bush’s national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, arrived in Baghdad on Monday on an unannounced trip to discuss how to pull the country back from the brink.

DOJ_NMG_0089092

Though American officials would describe Mr. Hadley's talks only in the vaguest of terms, one option widely discussed in Washington and Baghdad in the days before his arrival, according to American and Iraqi officials, is a substantial increase in the number of American and Iraqi troops patrolling Baghdad. It would signal yet another effort to reassert control over the Iraqi capital, which officials in both governments said remains their top priority.

Those officials cautioned that no decision had been made about that option, which would amount to a third effort this year to contain the spreading violence in Baghdad. On Monday evening, J. D. Crouch, the deputy national security adviser, said Mr. Hadley was in Iraq to express support for the Iraqi government and warned, "He is not preconfiguring military options." Mr. Crouch added that he was "not aware" of anyone proposing an increase in American troops.

Other American officials said that such options have been informally discussed. They said that before any American forces in Baghdad could be increased, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq would have to deliver more Iraqi troops, who would patrol the streets of the capital along with the Americans and take the lead whenever possible.

Other proposals now being discussed inside and outside the two governments range from how to permit greater autonomy for Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish sections of the country without splitting the country apart; how to share oil revenues among Iraq's population; and an amnesty for those who attacked Iraqi or American troops.

Many of these options may not be dealt with for months, because Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds within the "unity government" in Baghdad are still far apart on issues touching on Iraq's division of power and wealth.

In an interview Friday evening, Mr. Hadley said that "I wish you could find a silver bullet that could solve this in 30 days," but that "I doubt it."

He described a series of American goals, including a new effort to get more financial and other support from neighboring states, saying that "given the risks of chaos in Iraq, and given the threat and aspirations of Iran," each country in the region has "a huge stake" in a stable Iraq. But such appeals have failed in the past.

Mr. Hadley faces critics — many in his own party — who say that the Bush administration's effort has devolved to picking the least bad of a dismal set of options, and that the administration must lower its sights for a democratic Iraq and simply regain a semblance of stability there.

"It is folly to think we can win in Iraq the way some of us thought possible in 2003," Eliot A. Cohen, the director of the Center for Strategic Studies at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies, wrote this month in The Wall Street Journal.

Speaking in Baghdad on Sunday as Mr. Hadley headed to Iraq to meet him, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, seemed to set out a Shiite vision when he said that while Shiites "have the numbers" in Baghdad, Sunnis who joined in building the new Iraq could look forward to "sharing the wealth" in oil.

But he implied that Sunnis were having difficulty reconciling to the new political realities. "Some of these politicians are not prepared, mentally or psychologically, to make the compromises necessary for us to live cohabitively," he said.

More Troops

In the interview on Sunday, Mr. Rubaie declined to discuss specifics of recent conversations with Washington over increasing troop levels. But he said, "Baghdad is the core of the issue." When it comes to turning the tide of the war, he said, "It's Baghdad, Baghdad, Baghdad."

American officials in Washington and Baghdad who discussed changes in the Baghdad security plan, including possible troop increases, said it was unlikely that any announcements would be made until after the elections on Nov. 7. Bush administration officials have said that any major changes in American policy will require bipartisan support, and they are clearly waiting to see which party will control the House, and possibly the Senate, before proceeding. A week ago, General George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, said that if he needed more troops, "I will ask for the troops we need, both coalition and Iraqi."

In Washington, the debate over whether to increase troops comes as the White House seems to be groping for new ideas. The administration has resisted efforts to increase the overall number of American troops in Iraq. At times, tours have been extended for individual brigades, which amount to about 5,000 troops, for 90 days or so. But recent history suggests that any plan to significantly increase the American deployment in Baghdad would require more sweeping changes, by keeping 10,000 to 30,000 troops in Baghdad beyond their scheduled rotations home, even as new troops rotate in.

In the interview on Friday evening, Mr. Hadley declined to discuss internal deliberations. Still, he said: "Everyone says there is no military solution to the problem. That's true. But you also have this Catch-22 element to the problem. You can't have security without political and economic progress, but it's hard to have political and economic progress without security. There is some minimum element of security you need."

Outside experts who favor an American withdrawal say that almost all the options now being considered would be doomed to failure.

DOJ_NMG_0089093

"It's not going to make any difference," said Peter W. Galbraith, the author of "The End of Iraq" (Simon & Schuster) and a scholar at the Center for Arms Control and Non-Proliferation. "It's not a country, and you can't build an army in the midst of a civil war. And elements of the Iraqi army are partisans in the civil war. You can't use the combatants as if they were neutral players."

Regional Governments

In Washington, Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the top Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has called for the establishment of three regional governments — one Kurdish, one Sunni, one Shiite — responsible for administering their own regions. The idea is adapted from one first proposed by Leslie H. Gelb, the former president of the Council on Foreign Relations.

So far the Bush administration has opposed solutions that would give the regions too much autonomy for fear that could ultimately lead to partition. In Washington on Monday, [a news wire] reported, the Saudi ambassador to the United States, Prince Turki al-Faisal, said any partition of Iraq would lead to "ethnic cleansing on a massive scale, sectarian killing on a massive scale."

This month, Iraq's new Parliament approved a law that empowers the country's 18 provinces to assemble into regions, but that delays, for 18 months, any practical steps toward forming those regions, in a bid to defuse the explosive political tensions that underlie the debate.

Nearly a year after national elections, the Sunnis, and not just the insurgents, remain unreconciled to the loss of primacy they enjoyed for generations — and to the loss of revenue they enjoyed under Saddam Hussein. "The problem is that in 2003 the Sunnis got 70 percent of the oil, and now they are being asked to take 20 percent," Mr. Galbraith said.

Meanwhile, the Shiites, or at least the leaders of the religious parties that control the government, have become increasingly strident in insisting that after generations of Sunni domination, it is now their turn to rule. While a process of ethnic and religious separation is already under way in cities including Baghdad, Mosul and Kirkuk — with tens of thousands of people from the three principal communities fleeing to safer havens in those parts of the country where they are in the majority — any policy that explicitly espoused this kind of separation would be likely to ignite an even fiercer struggle.

The subtext for the debate is the struggle for control of the country's oil and gas revenues. The Iraqi Constitution, narrowly adopted last year, envisages a formula for dividing the revenues among provinces or regions proportional to the populations in each area, with some adjustments. Though the timetable set by the American and Iraqi governments calls for legislation to be passed on the issue by the end of October, there is now little chance it will happen before the end of the year.

Reconciliation and Amnesty

When he took office in May, Mr. Maliki made national reconciliation a centerpiece of his policy. But today it is foundering.

At the dispute's heart is the issue of a possible amnesty. It would cover both those responsible for the repressive violence during Mr. Hussein's 24 years in power, and the killing that has ensued, by insurgents and sectarian militias, since his fall.

Shiite politicians, in particular, have adamantly opposed any amnesty that would cover the decades of Shiite suffering under Mr. Hussein, or the widespread killing of Shiites by Sunni insurgents since the American-led invasion in 2003. As Shiite death squads have killed Sunnis over the past year, Sunni politicians, too, have hardened their stand. American officials, eager to promote Iraqi reconciliation, have still balked at any provision to spare insurgents or sectarian militiamen who have killed American soldiers.

Iraqi officials designated by Mr. Maliki to lead the reconciliation effort now seem to be despairing.

"Iraq has only two options, fragmentation or civil war," Sayed Ayyad Jamaluddin, a secular Shiite who is a member of the Maliki-appointed Higher Council for National Reconciliation, said last month. "And civil war," he added, "will be a catastrophe, because it will be fought on the basis of religion."

A Strongman

Some American experts have suggested that the Bush administration should abandon the effort to create a Western-style democracy and throw its weight behind a stronger Iraqi government. Mr. Cohen, in the Wall Street Journal article, which the White House e-mailed to reporters because it concluded that a withdrawal of American troops would be disastrous, wrote that "a junta of military modernizers might be the only hope of a country whose democratic culture is weak, whose politicians are either corrupt or incapable." But he also highlighted the downsides of returning to a strongman government.

Iraqi newspapers have adopted the theme of a government change, speculating on the possible composition of a "national salvation government," backed by the United States, that would wrest power from the Shiite alliance that chose Mr. Maliki for prime minister. Iraqi officials have said that Mr. Maliki has been deeply shaken by rumors that he might be forced from office by year's end. However, President Bush, in two conversations over the past two weeks, has assured him of support.

RESISTANCE TO DEADLINES FOR IRAQ IS WEAKENING (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes And Doyle Mcmanus, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089094

More U.S. officers doubt insurgents would gain, and believe that Baghdad must be pushed.

WASHINGTON — Growing numbers of American military officers have begun to privately question a key tenet of U.S. strategy in Iraq — that setting a hard deadline for troop reductions would strengthen the insurgency and undermine efforts to create a stable state.

The Iraqi government's refusal to take certain measures to reduce sectarian tensions between Sunni Arabs and the nation's Shiite Muslim majority has led these officers to conclude that Iraqis will not make difficult decisions unless they are pushed.

Therefore, they say, the advantages of deadlines may outweigh the drawbacks.

"Deadlines could help ensure that the Iraqi leaders recognize the imperative of coming to grips with the tough decisions they've got to make for there to be progress in the political arena," said a senior Army officer who has served in Iraq. He asked that his name not be used because he did not want to publicly disagree with the stated policy of the president.

Former Pentagon official Kurt Campbell said more officers are calling for deadlines after concluding that the indefinite presence of U.S. forces enables the Shiite-run Iraqi government to avoid making compromises.

"There is a new belief that the biggest problem that we face is that our forces are the sand in the gears creating problems," said Campbell, coauthor of a book on national security policy. "We are making things worse by giving the Iraqis a false sense of security at the governing level."

For months, the Bush administration has been politely prodding the Iraqis on political and security reforms including the sharing of oil revenue, a crackdown on Shiite militias and constitutional changes. The discussions so far have yielded little, prompting experts to question whether the Iraqi government will ever compromise if there is no penalty for failing to make hard choices.

Over the last week, Bush administration officials have spoken about possible timetables for progress in Iraq, but softened their suggestions after talks with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

Although top administration officials are still steering clear of discussing the timing of American troop withdrawals, the officers' comments come alongside public statements by prominent Republicans who have begun talking about the need to establish a date that the U.S. will begin to draw down, whether or not the Iraqi government takes steps toward political compromise.

President Bush and other administration opponents of hard deadlines have argued that telegraphing troop departures would help the insurgents.

Once the U.S. sets a withdrawal date, the Sunni-led guerrillas know how long they must hang on before American troops are gone, the administration has argued.

Opponents of timetables also fear that small drawdowns will unleash public demand for more dramatic withdrawals, allowing violence fomented by Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias to erode whatever political advances have been made.

Military officials generally have agreed with the civilian leadership that a deadline would strengthen insurgent and militia groups. But the failure of the Iraqi government to move forward on key political and security measures has left senior military leaders frustrated.

Although U.S. military leaders remain wary of the consequences of imposing deadlines, increasingly officers say they are starting to look more attractive. The shift in opinion is a sign that gridlock in the Iraqi government is seen as a greater threat to achieving stability in Iraq than the insurgency itself.

John Batiste, a retired major general who commanded a division in Iraq and has been critical of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, said that setting a date for a drawdown of combat brigades must be considered. Before the deadline, Batiste said, the U.S. also needs to step up its effort to advise and train the Iraqi military and police.

"Holding the Iraqi government accountable is important, and that has everything to do with setting expectations and timelines," Batiste said. "It also has everything to do with doing all we can to ensure they are capable completing the task they are trying to do."

Some officers who have served in Iraq believe that much of the Iraqi government is not functioning effectively. Finding ways to force the sectarian factions to put aside their differences and focus on improving security and basic services must be the top priority in Iraq, these officers say. Without government reform, the Iraqi security forces are unlikely to ever be strong enough to take on the insurgency or the sectarian militias.

"It's basic counterinsurgency," said a military officer who has served in Baghdad and did not want to publicly disagree with the president's stated policy. "You have to have a trusted, capable government."

Some in the military argue that publicizing a timetable for reducing forces is far less damaging to a counterinsurgency campaign than the administration has suggested.

DOJ_NMG_0089095

Many officers, particularly those who adhere to the military philosophy of former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, a retired Army general who served as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, believe that deadlines are necessary to avoid getting mired in an endless war fueled by enmity between Iraq's long-subjugated Shiite population and the Sunni Arabs who ran the government under Saddam Hussein.

"The Powell Doctrine is all about overwhelming numbers of troops with specific missions, with specified end-states, for specified durations with — go figure — an exit strategy," said the officer who has served in Baghdad. "To not mention this stuff is actually counter to the contemporary military mind-set."

Although Democrats like Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the ranking minority member of the Armed Services Committee, have long argued that a deadline is the best way to move development of the Iraqi security force forward, opponents of the administration are no longer the only ones making the argument.

A number of Republicans now have either explicitly endorsed timelines for troop drawdowns or voiced support for considering a strategy shift.

Sen. John W. Warner, the Republican chair of the Armed Services Committee, has called for a new approach if the security situation does not improve.

"The key to this thing is impressing upon that government that they've got to come to grips with what is causing this increase in violence and killing both Iraqis and our own armed forces," Warner said this month on Fox News.

Without a deadline, Maliki will not tackle the difficult problem of bridging Sunni and Shiite political disagreements, said Michael Rubin, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute and a former Coalition Provisional Authority official.

"Maliki will not hit the benchmarks, but that doesn't mean we shouldn't give them," said Rubin, who does not favor troop withdrawals as a penalty. "Iraqis approach deadlines by doing nothing until two days before, and then locking themselves in smoke-filled rooms and only then do they … try to hash out a solution."

Nevertheless, with the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad drafting a series of benchmarks for the Maliki government, there were signs last week that the administration had eased its opposition to timetables and might take a tougher stance with the Iraqi government.

Former Pentagon official Campbell said that military officers would not be discussing their change of heart over timetables if administration officials had not signaled a new willingness to shift positions.

"Even though there are deep reservoirs of unhappiness in the military about certain aspects of administration policy, active-duty guys are very reluctant to publicly disagree with the leadership," he said.

"But the signals are clear from the administration that it is acceptable to talk about timetables. They are taking their cues from their civilian masters."

In Baghdad, A Force Under The Militias' Sway (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The signs of the militias are everywhere at the Sholeh police station.

Posters celebrating Moqtada al-Sadr, head of the Mahdi Army militia, dot the building's walls. The police chief sometimes remarks that Shiite militias should wipe out all Sunnis. Visitors to this violent neighborhood in the Iraqi capital whisper that nearly all the police officers have split loyalties.

And then one rainy night this month, the Sholeh police set up an ambush and killed Army Cpl. Kenny F. Stanton Jr., a 20-year-old budding journalist, his unit said. At the time, Stanton and other members of the unit had been trailing a group of Sholeh police escorting known Mahdi Army members.

"How can we expect ordinary Iraqis to trust the police when we don't even trust them not to kill our own men?" asked Capt. Alexander Shaw, head of the police transition team of the 372nd Military Police Battalion, a Washington-based unit charged with overseeing training of all Iraqi police in western Baghdad. "To be perfectly honest, I'm not sure we're ever going to have police here that are free of the militia influence."

The top U.S. military commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., predicted last week that Iraqi security forces would be able to take control of the country in 12 to 18 months. But several days spent with American units training the Iraqi police illustrated why those soldiers on the ground believe it may take decades longer than Casey's assessment.

Seventy percent of the Iraqi police force has been infiltrated by militias, primarily the Mahdi Army, according to Shaw and other military police trainers. Police officers are too terrified to patrol enormous swaths of the capital. And while there are some good cops, many have been assassinated or are considering quitting the force.

"None of the Iraqi police are working to make their country better," said Brig. Gen. Salah al-Ani, chief of police for the western half of Baghdad. "They're working for the militias or to put money in their pocket."

U.S. military reports on the Iraqi police often read like a who's who of the two main militias in Iraq: the Mahdi Army, also known as Jaish al-Mahdi or JAM, and the Badr Organization, also known as the Badr Brigade or Badr Corps.

One document on the Karrada district police chief says: "I strongly believe that he is a member of Badr Corps and tends to turn a blind eye to JAM activity." Another explains that the station commander in the al-Amil neighborhood "is afraid to report suspected militia members in his organization due to fear of reprisals."

American soldiers said that although they gather evidence of police ties to the militias and present it to Iraqi officials, no one has ever been criminally charged or even lost their jobs.

Among the worst of the suspected Mahdi Army members is Lt. Col. Musa Khadim Lazim Asadi, station commander of the Ghazaliyah patrol police. "He has stated to us that he does not believe the Mahdi Militia is a bad organization," a military report said. "He had a picture of Sadr in his vehicle until we said something about it."

"He is a cancer to the station and the people of Ghazaliyah," the report concluded.

On a recent visit to the blue-and-white facility, located in one of the most violent parts of the city, even other police officers in the building complained that Asadi and his subordinates are corrupt and tied to the militias. "They steal vehicles and kill people," said 1st Lt. Sarmad Sabar Dawood, assistant commander for the local police, which is independent of the patrol police. "In fact, we are investigating Colonel Musa and the patrol police for criminal behavior."

But when U.S. military officials visited Asadi on a recent afternoon, he not only denied that his men were involved in the militias or crime but refused to acknowledge that there had been any killings in the area at all. Although scores of tortured bodies are often found in the neighborhood, Asadi said the murders all took place somewhere else.

Shaw, 32, of Alexandria, turned the conversation to the confusing division of Iraqi police forces into three autonomous parts: patrol police, regular police who investigate cases, and traffic police. The U.S. military has proposed reorganizing the force so that there is one commander in each neighborhood responsible for all the police. So far, Shaw said, Iraqi officials have not been receptive.

The problems with the tripartite division were evident in Sholeh. Sitting in Asadi's second-floor office, Shaw asked him if he worked with the regular police on the ground floor.

"Of course not," Asadi replied brusquely. "Why do we need to coordinate with them?"

Visibly exasperated, Shaw and Bridges quickly left and headed for a police station in Mansour, a relatively safe neighborhood in central Baghdad, to meet with a police major they described as one of the better cops they'd encountered.

When Shaw asked what the police in Mansour were doing to reduce the violence, the major said: "There is nothing the police can do. The only solution is to create a government that will take away the militias. Then everything will be fine."

The major, who asked to be identified as Abu Ahmed because he feared for his safety if his full name was published, sat in a closet-size room that he hardly ever leaves. Orange-and-brown sheets covered a tiny bed next to his desk.

"I can't go home or I'll be killed," said Abu Ahmed, who sees his children only when police officers can bring them to the station. He sighed as he looked at photographs of two recently assassinated officers. "And it's getting worse. So much worse."

"I think I must quit soon," he said quietly.

Arabi Araf Ali, a police officer in the southern neighborhood of Dora, said police do little more than pick dead bodies up off the street. In the station's parking lot nearby, a colleague washed off a police truck that had just been used to retrieve the corpses of five Shiite men slaughtered that morning. Brain matter littered the ground.

"Some parts of Dora are so dangerous," Ali added, "that we cannot even pick up the bodies there without Americans. We are just too afraid."

The Iraqi police are not the only ones who feel unsafe. The American soldiers and civilians who train the Iraqis are constantly on guard against the possibility that the police might turn against them. Even in the police headquarters for all of western Baghdad, one of the safest police buildings in the capital, the training team will not remove their body armor or helmets. An armed soldier is assigned to protect each trainer.

DOJ_NMG_0089097

"I wouldn't let half of them feed my dog," 1st Lt. Floyd D. Estes Jr., a former head of the police transition team, said of the Iraqi police. "I just don't trust them."

Jon Moore, the deputy team chief, said: "We don't know who the hell we're teaching: Are they police or are they militia?"

The trainers agree that Ani, the new police chief for western Baghdad, is an honest cop who is trying to get the police force in order. But Ani acknowledged in a meeting with U.S. officials that he does not plan to root out and fire militia members.

"I don't have that power," he said. "There are people higher than me that control that."

Among Ani's bosses are the police chief for all of Baghdad, who has been linked to the Mahdi Army, and the minister of the interior, who is a member of Sadr's political bloc.

"I think he's trying to do the right thing," said Lt. Col Aaron Dean, the battalion commander, as he walked to his Humvee after the meeting with Ani. "But I know they're all under certain influences. If you take a big stand against the militias, they're going to come after you."

The difficulty of eliminating corruption and militias from the Iraqi police forces can be exasperating for the American soldiers who risk their lives day after day to train them. "We can keep getting in our Humvees every day, but nothing is going to work unless the politicians do their job and move against the militias," Moore said.

Sitting in the battalion's war room with four other members of his team, Moore estimated it would take 30 to 40 years before the Iraqi police could function properly, perhaps longer if the militia infiltration and corruption continue to increase. His colleagues nodded.

"It's very, very slow-moving," Estes said.

Reprisals Feared After Blast (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood And Said Rifai

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

Baghdad — Yousef Badr stood among dozens of fellow laborers who rose early and gathered on a grimy street corner in the Sadr City neighborhood with their battered hand tools and hopes for a day's pay.

The bomb blast that shattered their morning ritual, killing 31 people and injuring more than 50 on Monday, was the first large-scale attack on the predominantly Shiite Muslim neighborhood in more than a month, and stoked fears that a wave of retaliatory killings would soon follow.

"It was a huge explosion," said the 30-year-old Badr, who described being thrown to the ground by the blast in the heart of the neighborhood of 2.5 million.

Shrapnel ripped through the crowd and peppered ramshackle kiosks where laborers bought tea and hot soup as they waited to be hired for $8 to $10 a day. Among the dead was a tea seller known to regular customers by her nickname, Um Hattab.

Iraqi officials said the explosives were packed in a car. But witnesses said the bomb appeared to have been hidden in a bag left at the site, where a crater was hard to distinguish from the numerous potholes.

Several residents said the attack was revenge for a neighborhood protest a day earlier against a days-long U.S. military operation that has severely restricted movement in and out of Sadr City. The neighborhood is a stronghold of the Shiite militia led by anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr.

"They're trying to quiet us down so that we won't hold any more demonstrations," said Ouda Gumar, a 50-year-old plasterer, as residents collected strewn tools and bloody scraps of clothing into separate piles nearby.

Five car bombs exploded elsewhere in the capital Monday, killing at least a dozen other people and injuring more than 30. Fifteen bodies were discovered throughout the city.

The attacks came as the U.S. military reported the deaths of two troops. An unidentified member of the 89th Military Police Brigade died of wounds from small-arms fire Monday in eastern Baghdad, and a Marine died in combat Friday in Al Anbar province. The Marine was identified as Sgt. Luke J. Zimmerman, 24.

The deaths brought military fatalities to at least 101 in October, according to the website icasualties.org, which tracks casualties in the Iraq conflict.

Early today, the military announced two more Monday deaths, taking the monthly toll to 103. Gunfire hit one soldier during combat operations in western Baghdad, and a roadside bomb killed the other south of the capital.

The rising U.S. death toll and persistent sectarian violence have fed widespread misgivings about the Bush administration's handling of Iraq as Americans prepare to vote in midterm congressional elections next week.

DOJ_NMG_0089098

At the same time, U.S. and Iraqi leaders have sought to smooth differences over how to cope with the back-and-forth violence by Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militias, including Sadr's Al Mahdi army, believed responsible for many of the hundreds of killings and kidnappings in recent months.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, who is Shiite, has urged President Bush to give Iraqi security forces more leeway to deal with armed groups. But some of the main Shiite militias are tied to groups that make up Maliki's power base, raising questions about his ability and willingness to combat them.

Amid tense exchanges between the two administrations, U.S. national security advisor Stephen Hadley made an unannounced visit to Baghdad on Monday to meet with his Iraqi counterpart and Maliki on military coordination.

The Iraqi government issued a brief statement afterward saying the officials worked on details of a joint commission on security, training and reconciliation that Bush and Maliki agreed to Saturday.

In other developments, Maliki blamed "the dirty hands of terrorism" for the fatal shooting Monday of Issam Rawi, a prominent Sunni politician and leading member of the hard-line Muslim Scholars Assn.

In Sadr City, residents quickly sought to resume their routines. Few seemed to believe it would be the last attack. A bombing in the neighborhood last month killed more than 30 people.

Sadr released a statement criticizing what he called an American embargo on Sadr City and the Karada neighborhood in central Baghdad, where U.S. forces have imposed a series of roadblocks since the apparent kidnapping last week of an Iraqi American soldier.

The soldier was secretly married to an Iraqi woman and was abducted when he visited her in Karada, the New York Times reported Monday, citing people who said they were his in-laws. Those people identified the soldier as Ahmed Qusai al-Taei, 41. The military has not identified the missing soldier.

Bombs Sweep Baghdad; Cleric Faults US (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 30 — A spasm of violence seized the capital on Monday. Forty-six Iraqis were killed in six bombings across the city and a moderate Sunni Arab figure was gunned down by two men on motorcycles.

The American toll for October rose to 102, the highest since January 2005, with the military's announcement of three more deaths.

In a single deadly strike, 33 Shiite laborers gathered around food stalls in a Sadr City square were killed when a bomb in a bag exploded at 6 a.m., scattering glasses of tea and remains of breakfasts. The workers had been waiting for offers of $10-a-day jobs.

The attacks continued as the American national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, met in Baghdad with Iraqi officials. He came to discuss the work of a committee set up by the leaders of the two governments on Sunday, whose aim includes giving Iraqis more control over their troops.

The attack in Sadr City came despite the American Army cordon that has been in place for a week in a search for a missing soldier, whom the military believes was taken there. It was the fifth bomb in the area, Al Mudhafar Square, where poor workers line up to seek work, said Haidar Said, a police captain on duty when the bomb exploded.

"Please deliver this message," said Officer Said. "This city has suffered a lot. These are poor people. We want to reach our voice to the world."

It is attacks like the one in Sadr City, a Shiite slum, that anger Shiite leaders and put pressure on Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, a Shiite, to press for more of a hand in security, which is controlled almost exclusively by the American military.

The security cordon has caused major traffic jams and cut off much of the movement in and out of the area, drawing the ire of Iraqis. The district is the center of support for Moktada al-Sadr, a radical cleric who called on his followers to fight American troops twice in 2004. In a statement on Monday, Mr. Sadr threatened action if the American cordon continued.

"If this siege continues for long, we will resort to actions that I will have no choice but to take, God willing, and when the time is right," he said, according to The Associated Press.

Less than an hour after the bomb struck, two men on motorcycles shot and killed Issam al-Rawi, a geology professor, on his way to class. Two associates were wounded. Born in 1949, Mr. Rawi was one of the most moderate voices among Sunni Arabs. But the violence here has radicalized many Iraqis, and moderates who refuse to yield to the militants are either being killed or driven out of the country.

"They murdered one of the few burning candles," said Abdul Mahdi Talib, dean of the Science College at Baghdad University. "We considered him a man for all."

In the Green Zone, a walled area where the Iraqi government and American Embassy are located, Mr. Hadley met with his opposite number, Iraq's national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie. In a statement, Mr. Rubaie said the men discussed the work of a committee established by Mr. Maliki and President Bush to speed training for the Iraqi Army.

The talks felt far away to Officer Said, the police captain, who spent most of the morning gathering bodies in the square in Sadr City. He described a horrific tableau of staggering wounded victims and of bodies missing limbs. Some families lost several members. In one Sadr City hospital, four brothers were being treated. Two died and two others were wounded, with one losing his leg, said a visitor at the hospital.

A politician who supports Mr. Sadr, Nasir al-Saidi, was at the hospital and he spoke angrily against the American military and the Iraqi government as victims were rushed in.

Officer Said said the cordon actually hindered the authorities' ability to move the victims to hospitals outside.

One of the wounded blamed the cordon for blocking the Mahdi Army, the grass-roots fighting force of Mr. Sadr's supporters, and in turn making the neighborhood less safe.

The cordon "forced Mahdi Army members who were patrolling the streets to vanish," said Ali Abdul Ridha, who was lying next to his brother in a hospital bed, The A.P. reported.

Others, though, said the militia was the reason why the bomb was planted.

The bombs kept exploding, killing Iraqis in small but steady numbers. Some of the Sadr City victims were taken to Yarmouk Hospital, and there a bomb went off around 2:30 p.m., killing one person and wounding five more. In the Bayaa neighborhood, 4 people were killed and 15 wounded. In Amel, a mixed area, three were killed and six wounded.

In another assassination, Raad Naem al-Jeheshi, a Shiite who led an organization of former Iraqi prisoners, was gunned down in Dora, a Sunni suburb that American troops had swept.

The militants' use of government uniforms for deception continued in a particularly grim way on Monday, when a suicide bomber dressed as a police officer passed through two checkpoints in the police headquarters in Kirkuk, north of Baghdad. Three people were killed, including a 5-year-old, the child of a woman who works as a cleaner. Thirteen were wounded.

Total Iraqi deaths reported for the day was 81, The A.P. said, including bodies found in rivers near Baghdad.

Violence in Baghdad was also responsible for an American's death, when a member of the 89th Military Police Brigade was killed Monday in the eastern part of the city. Another soldier died when the vehicle in which he was riding was struck by an explosive device south of Baghdad.

The other American whose death was tallied on Monday was a marine who was killed in fighting in Anbar Province the day before.

At Least 26 Killed By Market Blast In Sadr City (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 30 -- A bustling market in Baghdad's Sadr City became the capital's latest killing ground early Monday when a bomb hidden amid trash and clutter exploded in a fiery inferno, killing at least 26 people and wounding 60, a spokesman at Iraq's Interior Ministry said.

The explosion occurred about 7 a.m. at the busy Circle 55 intersection, a popular gathering point in the Shiite slum for construction laborers looking for a day's work. The blast spewed shards of metal, blew up three nearby cars and left a huge crater in the pavement.

U.S. and Iraqi forces had previously established a cordon around the teeming slum, which is controlled by the Mahdi Army militia, in an attempt to find a kidnapped U.S. soldier and a man known as Abu Deraa, who is considered Iraq's most notorious death squad leader.

Shiite leaders seized on that U.S. operation Monday to accuse the Americans of complicity in the market blast, saying that because they were in charge of searching all vehicles going in and out of the area, they must have allowed in the bomb that was detonated at the market.

"The entrances and exits in and out of Sadr City are still under the control of the Iraqi and occupation forces," said Mohammed al-Kaabi, a spokesman for Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, leader of the Mahdi Army and head of a strong political bloc in Iraq's government. "Since the entrances to the city are in the hands of the Americans, they let it in and slaughtered the people."

Some residents of Sadr City, home to 2.5 million Shiites, also blamed U.S. forces for the carnage, saying that the search for the missing soldier -- which began six days ago -- has forced the Mahdi Army underground, weakening the area's defenses. But this week, some Mahdi Army members were visible with weapons on the streets.

A U.S. military spokesman, Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, denied that coalition forces were responsible for the explosion, saying it occurred "despite our security efforts."

Meanwhile, the U.S. military reported that a Marine was killed Sunday in Anbar province west of Baghdad and that a member of the 89th Military Police Brigade was killed Monday in the eastern part of the capital. In addition, the Pentagon reported the death of a Marine on Friday in Anbar. So far, 101 U.S. troops have been killed in Iraq this month, making October the deadliest month for American forces since January 2005, when 107 soldiers were killed.

Across the country, at least 81 Iraqis were killed Monday, according to an Associated Press count.

At least 12 people were killed and 41 were wounded in five car bombings in the capital, and three were killed and six injured in two roadside bombings there, according to local police, Interior Ministry officials and wire service reports.

Elsewhere in Iraq, at least 21 people were killed in bombings and other violence, including three people who died when a suicide bomber wearing an explosives belt walked into a local police headquarters in the northern city of Kirkuk and detonated himself, according to Kirkuk police Capt. Emad Khider. He said a 5-year-old girl was among those killed in the blast. Ten people were injured.

Dozens Killed In Baghdad Blast (MCT)

By Jay Price

McClatchy Newspapers, October 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — An explosion in Baghdad's Sadr City neighborhood on Monday killed at least 28 people, stoking tension between U.S. forces and followers of Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is suspected in the kidnapping of a U.S. soldier.

Residents in Sadr City charged that American forces, who've had the Shiite Muslim area virtually surrounded for four days, must have allowed the attacker into their community as part of an effort to win the release of the kidnapped soldier. U.S. officials rejected the accusation.

The explosion came as the number of U.S. service members killed this month reached 101, making October the deadliest month for the American military in nearly two years. Military officials said the latest American killed was shot by a sniper at about 9:30 a.m. in eastern Baghdad. He wasn't identified, pending notification of his family.

The explosion that rocked Sadr City struck just before 8 a.m. in an area popular with day laborers looking for work. Initial reports said the blast came from a bomb hidden under garbage, but a spokesman for the Interior Ministry later said a car bomb was responsible. At least 60 people were wounded.

Many of the dead and wounded were buying breakfast from a woman selling tea and cheese, said Fa'ez Thani, 36, who was about 100 yards away. Thani, a former soccer player, sprinted to the smoking crater debris. Hours later, his voice still trembled.

"I found a real massacre, legs, hands and heads scattered everywhere," he said. "I and my friends were carrying the bodies not knowing who was alive and who was dead."

Then he helped gather scraps of flesh from the blood-covered pavement and put them in bags. "I will never forget this in my life," he said.

Anger had already been rising in the sprawling Shiite district of more than 2 million, a stronghold for Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia.

U.S. and Iraqi troops have all but closed off Sadr City since the kidnapping of the soldier last week, and residents have had to wait hours to pass through checkpoints to enter or leave the neighborhood.

Adding to the anger were raids on at least nine offices of Sadr's political wing - apparently part of the search for the missing soldier - and a raid last Wednesday by Iraqi and U.S. forces seeking a top Shiite death-squad leader. That raid left at least 10 people dead and sparked criticism from Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, whose refusal to disarm Sadr's militia has rankled U.S. officials.

After Monday's bombing, hundreds of people milled in the streets around the carnage. Some carried rifles and rocket-propelled grenade launchers.

A spokesman for Sadr's political wing pledged there would be no violence, however.

"The Sadrists are committed to what Sadr told them, and he ordered them to stay quiet and this is what they do," said Sheik Naser al-Sa'edi.

Haider Mahdi, 26, a university student who was about to leave his house to run an errand when the blast shook his windows, said Sadr City was more secure before the Americans surrounded it last week.

"We used to secure our own neighborhood," he said. "Volunteers like me and other young guys would search vehicles and strangers to protect our own neighborhood. Because there is no presence of security forces here, we have to protect ourselves."

DOJ_NMG_0089101

U.S. spokesmen provided few details of the 101st U.S. military death, saying only that the soldier belonged to the 89th Military Police Brigade and that he'd been shot by a sniper.

Earlier, the military confirmed the 100th death - a Marine assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5 who died Sunday in Anbar Province.

There were at least five other car bombs in Baghdad on Monday, killing 13 civilians and wounding 43 more, according to police. Another car bomb just north of the capital killed two more and injured three.

At least 15 bodies were recovered in southern Baghdad - all were handcuffed and bore signs of torture - and a top Sunni politician, Issam Rawi, was assassinated near his home.

There were also reports of violence in southern Iraq, where the British government announced the evacuation of its consulate in Basra, apparently in response to mortar and rocket attacks on the heavily fortified compound. Employees of the consulate were to take cover at a British air base eight miles away or return to London.

Three people were killed just north of Basra when a convoy guarded by private security contractors was targeted by a roadside bomb, a police spokesman said. It was unclear whether the dead were contractors.

October U.S. Death Toll In Iraq Hits 101 (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, October 31, 2006

The American death toll for October climbed past 100, a grim milestone as a White House envoy turned up unexpectedly in Baghdad on Monday following a rough patch in U.S.-Iraqi ties. At least 81 people were killed across Iraq, including 33 in a bombing targeting workers.

A member of the 89th Military Police Brigade was killed in east Baghdad on Monday, and a Marine died in fighting in insurgent-plagued Anbar province the day before, raising to 101 the number of U.S. service members killed in a bloody October, the fourth deadliest month of the war. At least 2,814 American forces have died since the war began in March 2003.

According to an Associated Press count, October has also recorded more Iraqi civilian deaths — 1,170 as of Monday — than any other month since the AP began keeping track in May 2005. The next-highest month was March 2006, when 1,038 Iraqi civilians were killed in the aftermath of the Feb. 22 bombing of an important Shiite shrine in Samarra.

The war and the rising American casualties have produced a huge drag on Republican candidates as the U.S. midterm election approaches. The vote is seen in many cases as a referendum on the war, which has stretched into its 44th month. The Bush administration has invested heavy attention on Iraq in recent weeks, trying to put a new face on the conflict with mixed results.

Upon arriving for an unannounced visit, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley went straight into meetings with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his security chief, Mouwafak al-Rubaie, telling them he "wanted to reinforce some of the things you have heard from our president."

Al-Rubaie told the AP late Monday that Hadley was here to discuss the work of a five-man committee that al-Maliki and Bush agreed to Saturday. Hadley also presented some proposals concerning the training and equipping of Iraqi security forces as well as security plans.

"It was a useful visit," he said, but refused to give any details, saying only that Hadley's meetings were limited to al-Rubaie and al-Maliki.

The White House said Hadley was not on a mission to repair ragged relations, accounts of which it said had been "overblown" by the news media.

"Absolutely not," said Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the National Security Council in Washington. "This is a long-planned trip to get a firsthand report of the situation on the ground from the political, economic and security fronts."

But the timing of the visit argued otherwise.

The ambassador announced that the prime minister agreed to implement a set of timelines, prompting al-Maliki to accuse the White House of infringing on his government's sovereignty and say that he was not consulted.

By week's end, al-Maliki and President Bush held a hastily convened video conference call and agreed to speed the training of Iraqi forces and the return of control over all territory to the Iraqi army.

DOJ_NMG_0089102

With American voter support for the war at a low point as the Nov. 7 congressional election approaches, a top aide to al-Maliki said the Iraqi leader was using the GOP's vulnerability on the issue to leverage concessions from the White House — particularly the speedy withdrawal of American forces from Iraqi cities to U.S. bases in the country.

Al-Maliki has said he believes that the continued presence of American forces in Iraq's population centers is partly behind the surge in violence.

The case of a kidnapped American soldier, meanwhile, took a curious turn when a woman claiming to be his mother-in-law said the soldier was married to her daughter, a Baghdad college student, and was with the young woman and her family when hooded gunmen handcuffed him and threw him in the back seat of a white Mercedes last week. The marriage would violate military regulations.

The soldier's disappearance has prompted a massive manhunt in Baghdad, with much of it focused on Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite slum of 2.5 million people in extreme northeastern Baghdad.

The military still had checkpoints surrounding the district Monday when a suspected Sunni insurgent bomber slipped in and set off a bomb among day laborers. There were conflicting reports as to whether the explosion was caused by a suicide bomber or a device concealed amid debris by the roadside. The blast tore through food stalls and kiosks shortly after 6 a.m., killing at least 33 and wounding 59.

Sadr City is a stronghold of the Mahdi Army, a militia loyal to radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. The district has witnessed repeated bomb attacks by suspected al-Qaida fighters in what were seen as attempts to incite Shiite revenge attacks and drag the country into full-blown civil war.

Al-Sadr, in a statement addressed to supporters in Sadr City, warned of unspecified action if the "siege" continues and criticized what he called the silence of politicians over actions by the U.S. military in the district.

"If this siege continues for long, we will resort to actions which I will have no choice but to take, God willing, and when the time is right," he said in the statement, a text of which was obtained by the AP.

Ali Abdul-Ridha, wounded in the head and shoulders, said he was waiting for a job with his brother and about 100 others when he heard the massive explosion and "lost sight of everything."

He said the area had been exposed to attack because U.S. and Iraqi forces had driven into hiding the Mahdi Army fighters who normally police the district.

"That forced Mahdi Army members, who were patrolling the streets, to vanish," Abdul-Ridha, 41, said from his bed in al-Sadr Hospital, his brother lying beside him asleep.

However, Falih Jabar, a 37-year-old father of two boys, blamed the militia for provoking extremists to attack civilians in the district.

"We are poor people just looking to make a living. We have nothing to do with any conflict," said Jabar, who suffered back wounds. "If (the extremists) have problems with the Mahdi Army, they must fight them, not us," he added.

The last major bombing in Sadr City took place Sept. 23 when a bomb hidden in a barrel blew up a kerosene tanker and killed at least 35 people waiting to stock up on fuel for the Muslim holy month of Ramadan.

Elsewhere in the capital Monday, gunmen killed hard-line Sunni academic Essam al-Rawi, head of the University Professors Union, as he was leaving home. At least 156 university professors have been killed since the war began. Hundreds, perhaps thousands, more are believed to have fled to neighboring countries.

Police and security officials throughout Iraq reported that at least 47 other people, many of them police, were killed in sectarian violence or found dead Monday, many of them dumped in the Tigris River and a tributary south of the capital.

The AP count that found a record number of Iraqi deaths in October includes civilians, government officials and police and security forces, and is considered a minimum based on AP reporting. The actual number is likely higher, as many killings go unreported.

US Death Toll In Iraq Tops 100 In October (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Steve Negus

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

An announcement by the US military on Monday that a marine had been killed in the western province of Anbar sent US military fatalities in Iraq in October over the 100 mark, making the month the fourth-deadliest for the US military since the 2003 invasion. Ask the expert

This month's death toll is surpassed only by those of April and November 2004, during the first and second assaults on the Sunni stronghold of Falluja, and in the run-up to the elections at the end of January 2005.

The holy month of Ramadan, which coincided with much of October, traditionally sees an upswing of violence, and US officials have suggested that insurgents may also have stepped up the violence prior to the November 7 US Congressional elections.

US troops have also taken a higher profile role as part of their campaign to secure Baghdad, taking on both Sunni insurgents and Shia militias. At least 42 of this month's deaths happened in or around the capital.

At least another 33 were killed in the western province of Anbar, where cities like Ramadi and Haditha have been centres of guerrilla activity for over two years.

In addition to US forces' higher profile, some insurgent groups are reported to have obtained sophisticated armour-piercing explosives, possibly supplied from Iran. US officers have also said that insurgent snipers have become more effective, and sniper attacks more numerous.

· A bomb blast ripped through a crowd of labourers in a square inBaghdad on Monday, killing 28 people and wounding 60, Iraqi Interior Ministry sources said. The bombing occurred as Shia labourers were lining up for day jobs in a square in Sadr City, a stronghold of radical Shia cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who heads the powerful Mehdi Army militia.

Warner Says Iraqis Need Time To Curb Violence (NVP)

By Tom Holden

Norfolk Virginian Pilot, October 31, 2006

U.S. Sen. John Warner said Monday that Iraqi leaders need more time to contain worsening violence in their country, but that "every single day counts" when measured against the loss of American lives.

Speaking after a political appearance in Virginia Beach, Warner said that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki believes violence can be contained through continued diplomacy and not escalating military force.

"Let's give him that opportunity," said Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Warner touched off an intense debate on Oct. 5 when he said that Iraq was "drifting side-wise" and that Iraq's government "was not living up to, or not able to meet just the fundamental responsibilities of a government."

His comments came amid a barrage of car bombs, kidnappings, murders and military operations that this month claimed 101 American troops, the deadliest month since January 2005, when 107 died.

Last week, a l-Maliki issued a series of complaints, saying at one point he wasn't "America's man in Iraq" after the U.S. ambassador to Iraq revealed changes to American strategy. Al-Maliki said the White House was infringing on his government's sovereignty.

By week's end, al-Maliki and President Bush held a video conference and agreed to speed up the training of Iraqi forces and return control of all territory to the Iraqi army.

Warner said his remarks "started a good deal of very constructive dialogue across America and, most importantly, within the administration."

He praised Bush for calling al-Maliki to straighten out their differences, "so that we have a strong, working relationship with that government. I think it's essential that we keep 'em running, keep 'em up."

Warner has visited Iraq eight times and has become increasingly measured in his assessment of the situation. Asked whether al-Maliki can contain the various factions that now control large portions of some cities, Warner said, "That's the question."

IED-resistant Vehicles Speeding To War Zones (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — The military is rushing armored vehicles with specially designed hulls to Iraq and Afghanistan to limit the damage from roadside bombs, the No. 1 killer of U.S. troops.

The bombs, which the military calls improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, have killed or wounded thousands of troops and shredded conventional military vehicles. The new vehicles have a V-shaped hull, which disperses the force of an explosion and helps keep the vehicle from flipping over.

"It's just going to be the standard for any vehicle on the battlefield over the next 10 years," John Pike, a military analyst at GlobalSecurity.org in Alexandria, Va., said of the V-shaped hull.

Not only are lives at stake, but also millions — and potentially billions — of dollars.

The Pentagon's Joint IED Defeat Organization is spending nearly $3.5 billion this year to combat IEDs. Pentagon records show that since the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq began, 1,074 troops have been killed and 11,513 others wounded by insurgent bombs.

A major Pentagon supplier of V-shaped vehicles is 9-year-old Force Protection of Ladson, S.C. The Pentagon says the number of the company's Buffalo and Cougar V-shaped vehicles in Iraq is classified, but public records show the military has bought almost 300. That compares with more than 35,000 Humvees, the military's main multipurpose vehicle, in Iraq. The Buffalo vehicles cost $750,000 apiece, about five times the cost of an armored Humvee, which is smaller.

Force Protection says nobody inside a Buffalo has been killed in Iraq or Afghanistan despite encountering thousands of IED blasts.

Retired general Montgomery Meigs, head of the anti-IED organization, said the Buffalo's armor and shape make it “a lot more robust than the Humvee.”

Foreign companies, many of them in South Africa, have been the leaders in developing the vehicles. Some of the Pentagon's largest contractors are marketing V-shaped vehicles with foreign partners. They include:

·AM General, the maker of the Humvee, is pitching to the Pentagon a V-shaped armored car called the Cobra. It is made by Otokar, a Turkish company, and uses a Humvee drivetrain.

·Oshkosh Truck, which makes many of the military's trucks, has partnered with ADI of Australia to market the Bushmaster armored vehicle.

·Blackwater, a private security firm that protects U.S. diplomats in Iraq, developed is own vehicle, the Grizzly, which it will send to Iraq soon.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican and a member of the Armed Services Committee, pushed the Pentagon to buy the Buffalo and Cougar.

Graham said the Pentagon has acted quickly to deploy the vehicles, without the kind of delays seen in sending body armor and armored Humvees to Iraq.

Auditors Want Rules For Iraq Aid (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, October 30, 2006

Federal auditors are recommending that the Iraqi government meet specific milestones of progress to receive any future aid for reconstruction, according to a report released Monday that echoes a message the Bush administration has delivered to Iraqi leaders.

The study, issued by the special inspector general who audits U.S. work in Iraq, also concluded that reconstruction is being blocked by violence, and efforts to empower Iraqis to do more are fraught with problems 3 1/2 years after the U.S. invaded the country.

The Iraqis should "meet concrete milestones and political and economic benchmarks as a condition of future aid," the report recommended. It said U.S. relief and reconstruction aid could be provided through conditional loans and be tied to specific actions by the Iraqi government.

During the past two weeks U.S. officials have pressed the Iraqis to begin to meet milestones of progress, an effort that has revealed rifts in the relationship between the two governments.

Last week Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki complained publicly after U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said the Iraqis had agreed to meet specified benchmarks for progress. Bush later voiced confidence in al-Maliki, but warned that the U.S. will not have "unlimited patience" with the Iraq government's failure to quell sectarian violence.

The strains have surfaced in the run-up to the Nov. 7 elections for control of Congress, a campaign in which voters' dissatisfaction with Bush administration policy in Iraq has become a significant weak point for Republicans.

The quarterly audit report by the inspector general said the "deteriorating security situation across Iraq continues to impede progress," causing construction project delays, increasing costs and preventing repairs to critical power supplies.

The report underscores the persistent problems faced by the Iraqi government as it struggles to rebuild and take control of its own security in the face of a stubborn insurgency and a populace on the brink of civil war.

"The U.S.-funded phase of Iraq's relief and reconstruction has entered its concluding stages," the report said. "The government of Iraq's success in building on the foundation established by the U.S. relief and reconstruction program will now depend in part on (Iraq's) ability to attract more support from other donors and the private sector."

A consistent theme in the audits is that the escalating violence in Baghdad is stalling reconstruction. For example, auditors found that "repairing power lines is nearly impossible because of sniper attacks and death threats to repair crews." As a result, on one day earlier this month there was only enough power to generate a few hours of electricity.

The audit also said corruption continues to exist in a number of the Iraqi government ministries, and that building up a system of inspectors general is the most important initiative to fight such wrongdoing.

It said the Iraqi government must improve its ability to spend and manage its own money on capital projects, or international aid could dry up. The budget available for capital projects is about $6 billion, the audit said.

Auditors Say Shift Of Rebuilding To Iraqis Appears 'Broken Down' (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Ten months into a year-long effort to transfer control of Iraq's reconstruction to the Iraqis, federal auditors say, the government there is spending very little of its own money on projects, while the process for handing off U.S.-funded work "appears to have broken down," according to findings released yesterday.

The fledgling Iraqi government, in power since May, has about $6 billion this year to devote to major rebuilding projects, representing about 20 percent of its overall budget. But auditors with the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction found that beyond paying employee salaries and administrative expenses, only a small amount of money is being spent on actual work. Auditors blamed "bureaucratic resistance within the Ministry of Finance, which traditionally has been slow to provide funds."

Auditors also found fault with the way the Finance Ministry is keeping track of U.S.-built projects as they are handed over to the Iraqis and said some of the U.S. data on the subject are "incomplete or inaccurate."

The findings speak to the difficult path that lies ahead as the United States attempts to turn over a decidedly incomplete reconstruction effort to an Iraqi government that remains beset by corruption and has had huge problems exercising authority amid rising violence.

At the beginning of the year, Inspector General Stuart W. Bowen Jr. labeled 2006 "the year of transition" as the U.S. winds up its dominant role in the reconstruction. But in yesterday's report, his office said the year is already into its fourth quarter and the transition remains "fraught with challenge."

Among the obstacles: a "deteriorating security situation across Iraq," pervasive corruption in Iraqi ministries, and possible problems raising funds from international donors unless the Iraqi government can prove it is willing to spend the money it already has on roads, health clinics, power plants and other much-needed infrastructure.

"I don't think the Iraqi government is prepared to take over the reconstruction," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who has been overseeing the U.S.-led effort as chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee. "But I don't know that continuing to pour our money and manpower into these projects is the answer, either."

The United States has devoted more than $38 billion to relief and reconstruction in Iraq since the 2003 invasion, and yesterday's report does point to some successes. Electric capacity nationwide passed prewar levels in recent months, though in Baghdad it remains lower than before the war. Oil exports, at 1.66 million barrels a day, met Iraqi goals.

Overall, 88 percent of U.S. projects have been completed, with only a small minority yet to begin. Out of the $18 billion reconstruction package Congress passed in November 2003, about three-quarters has been spent.

In some areas, however, results have fallen well short of expectations. Of 142 primary health clinics funded by the United States, just six are operational.

In the past week, Bowen's office has exposed new problems. Auditors found, for instance, that on some of the biggest contracts with major U.S. firms, anywhere from a third to more than half of the costs were administrative overhead.

On Sunday, meanwhile, auditors revealed that thousands of weapons that the United States had provided to Iraqi security forces could not be accounted for. The total number of missing weapons -- including semiautomatic pistols, assault rifles, machine guns and rocket-propelled grenade launchers -- was 14,030, or roughly 4 percent of the weapons the United States has supplied to Iraq since 2003. Auditors also found that spare parts and repair manuals were not available for many other weapons.

Bowen's office is slated to close on Oct. 1 next year. But Collins said yesterday that she is working with members of both parties to keep it open longer so it can continue overseeing the reconstruction. "I think it's a huge mistake to prematurely terminate the special inspector general's office," she said.

The Untracked Guns Of Iraq (NYT)

About the last thing the United States ought to be doing in Iraq is funneling weapons into black-market weapons bazaars, as sectarian militias arm themselves for civil war. Yet that is just what Washington may have been doing for the past several years, thanks to an inexplicable decision that standard Pentagon regulations for registering weapons transfers did not apply to the Iraq war.

Of more than 500,000 weapons turned over to the Iraqi Ministries of Defense and Interior since the American invasion — including rocket-propelled grenade launchers, assault rifles, machine guns and sniper rifles — the serial numbers of only 12,128 were properly recorded. Some 370,000 of these weapons, some of which are undoubtedly being used to kill American troops, were paid for by United States taxpayers, under the Orwellian-titled Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund.

This chilling information comes to us from the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, which has distinguished itself as the most vigilant agency monitoring the money spent on the Iraq conflict. The agency, led by a Republican lawyer who once worked in the Bush White House, has previously reported on the contracting lapses and failures of supervision that allowed billions of taxpayer dollars to be wasted instead of being used to rebuild Iraq.

The latest special inspector general's report came in response to a request from Senator John Warner, another conscientious Republican. As chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator Warner wanted to be sure that the Iraqi security ministries had the skills and resources necessary to make good use of the huge quantities of arms that Washington has been turning over to them.

It turns out that the Pentagon not only failed to register the weapons, but also failed to provide the spare parts, repair manuals and maintenance technicians needed to keep them in working order. The agency found that Iraqi security forces are still heavily dependent on Washington's support for the most basic military functions. And with America planning to scale back much of that support over the next year, it is far from clear whether Baghdad is preparing to pick up the slack.

Separately, the inspector general's office also found insecurity so rampant in six Iraqi provinces — five of them in the predominantly Shiite south — that America's joint military and civil reconstruction teams could not operate there effectively.

These findings go a long way toward explaining why Iraq appears to be ever more violent, with no clear plans yet coming from Baghdad or Washington that seem likely to restore a semblance of order.

British Civilians Being Moved From Basra (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

Baghdad — The British government said Monday that it was moving most civilian staff members out of its compound in the southern Iraqi city of Basra because of rocket and mortar attacks by militias.

Officials said the move was temporary. But the decision underscored the fraying security climate in southern Iraq, a largely Shiite Muslim region under the sway of various militias, such as that controlled by anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr.

British officials said some of the employees would be moved to the Basra airport and others would be sent to Kuwait or London.

"In recent weeks the threat from mortar and rocket attacks on our office in Basra has increased. Given the threat to the safety of civilian staff, we have decided temporarily to reduce the number of staff at our compound," the government said in a statement.

A spokesman for the British Foreign Office said the consul general would remain in Basra with a small support staff.

"We will stay in Iraq until the job is done," the government statement said. "We have adapted because we remain committed to the people of Basra and the elected Iraqi government."

The British compound, a former palace, has been staffed by about 200 employees, according to British media reports.

Though it is under heavy guard, it has come under daily attack.

Don't Worry. Just Back Off. (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Go ahead, people, you have your orders from Napoleon Bonaparte, I mean Donald Rumsfeld. "Back off" and "relax." Book a cruise to Chillsville. Don't worry your pretty little heads about the debacle in Iraq, because "it's complicated, it's difficult." Are mere mortals going to be able to get their minds around a problem that even Albert Einstein, I mean Donald Rumsfeld, finds complicated? Let's be realistic here.

We should all thank our lucky stars that "honorable people" are willing to do all this super-advanced thinking for us. Aristotle, I mean Donald Rumsfeld, was kind enough to phrase it that way rather than spell out what he really meant, which was "people who are smarter than you."

I realize that a few news cycles have come and gone since the secretary of defense held that stunning news conference at the Pentagon last week, but it was such a telling moment -- such a revealing glimpse behind the curtain -- that it deserves to remain fresh in our minds, even amid the distracting cacophony of eleventh-hour electioneering. There, in just two words, you have the Bush administration's approach to the war in Iraq. Indeed, you have the Republicans' theory of government:

Back off.

Could anyone else have summed it up so efficiently? Maybe Tony Soprano, but his vocabulary can't be printed in a family newspaper. The basic style of leadership is the same, though. I'm the boss, so shut up and do as I say.

Republicans who have to face the voters next week, especially those who find themselves trailing badly in the polls, have been going AWOL from Rummy's brigade. Some, such as Maryland senatorial candidate Michael Steele, explicitly disown the Pentagon czar; others avoid mentioning his name and, when pressed, speak of him as if he were some kind of daffy uncle. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) made news Sunday when he ventured that "Donald Rumsfeld is the best thing that's happened to the Pentagon in 25 years." Boehner would be hard-pressed to find professional soldiers who agree with that assessment, but maybe blind loyalty in the face of overwhelming evidence will turn out to be a winning strategy. I have my doubts.

At least Boehner isn't trying to pretend that the disaster in Iraq is all Rummy's fault. Alexander the Great, I mean Donald Rumsfeld, may have authored the mistakes that have cost nearly 3,000 American lives, including more than 100 in October alone -- sending too few troops, disbanding the Iraqi army, failing to plan for an extended occupation, training Iraqi "security forces" that promptly turned into sectarian militias. But George W. Bush, Dick Cheney, Condoleezza Rice and the rest of the Vulcans were with him every step of the way, and the Republican majority in Congress sang hosannas of praise like an amen chorus.

Now that most Americans oppose the war and want to bring the troops home before more young men and women die needless deaths, Republicans can't blame Democrats, because they froze them out of all the decision making.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert's immutable rule -- that any legislation brought to the floor had to be supported by a majority of the Republican caucus -- effectively muffled any concrete expression of the public's growing doubts about the war. What if substantial numbers of Democrats and moderate Republicans, enough to constitute a majority of the House, had questions about Iraq, or about torturing detainees, or about the whole course of this incoherent "war on terror"? Tough.

Back off.

The Republican majority came to Washington claiming a populist mandate but has ended up governing with the same breathtaking arrogance that Genghis Khan, I mean Donald Rumsfeld, let slip the other day. Congress is all about lobbyists, earmarks and pork. Democrats aren't immune to these depredations, of course, but if you aren't allowed to participate in any meaningful decisions, you can't be held responsible.

And at the White House and the Pentagon, fantasy reigns. President Bush famously pledged to stay the course in Iraq even if Laura and Barney the dog are his only supporters. Last week he said U.S. forces constantly change tactics to "stay ahead" of the Iraqi insurgents. Excuse me, but when have we ever been ahead of the insurgency? "We're winning" the war, Bush insists. Excuse me, but could you elaborate? In what sense are we winning in Iraq? Where are you seeing anything that resembles victory?

Silly me. Ordinary Americans just aren't smart enough to think about such things. Thank you, Sir Isaac Newton, I mean Donald Rumsfeld, for reminding us of our patriotic duty: Back off.

Pakistani Attack On Al-Qaida Kills 80 (AP)

By Habibullah Khan

AP, October 31, 2006

Pakistani troops and helicopters firing missiles killed as many as 80 militants training at a religious school used as an al-Qaida training center near the Afghan border, officials said.

Local leaders said all those slain when the school, or madrassa, was destroyed were civilians.

Army spokesman Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan said initial estimates based on intelligence sources on the ground indicated that the attack killed about 80 suspected militants, who appeared to be in their 20s and were from Pakistan and other countries.

"These militants were involved in actions inside Pakistan and probably in Afghanistan," Sultan told The Associated Press.

The bodies of 20 men killed in the attack were lined up in a field near the madrassa, in Chingai village near Khar, the main town in the Bajur tribal district, before an impromptu burial attended by thousands of local people, according to an Associated Press reporter at the scene.

Dozens of villagers sifted through the rubble of the madrassa, shifting blocks of smashed concrete and mud bricks aside to try to find survivors. Some picked up body parts scattered across the area and placed them in plastic bags normally used for fertilizer.

"We heard helicopters flying in and then heard bombs," said one of the villagers, Haji Youssef. "We were all saddened by what we have seen."

Among the dead was Liaquat Hussain, a local Islamic cleric who ran the madrassa, locals said. Several of his aides also died, they said.

The attack came two days after 5,000 pro-Taliban tribesmen held an anti-American rally in the Bajur area near Damadola, a village close to the site of an alleged U.S. missile attack that killed several al-Qaida members and civilians in January.

"We received confirmed intelligence reports that 70-80 militants were hiding in a madrassa used as a terrorist-training facility, which was destroyed by an army strike, led by helicopters," Sultan said.

An Associated Press reporter living in the area said he saw several helicopters hovering near his house early Monday before hearing a series of explosions, apparently caused by missiles being fired into the madrassa compound.

Helicopters fired four to five missiles into the madrassa, Sultan said.

The strike came on the day a peace deal was expected to be signed between Bajur tribal leaders and the military, similar to an accord signed earlier this year in nearby North Waziristan.

"This attack is very strange as we were told Sunday that the peace agreement would be signed today," local lawmaker Mohammed Sadiq said.

Sultan declined to say if an accord was scheduled to be signed Monday, but added that militants cannot hide behind peace deals. He said the purported militants using the madrassa had rejected orders to end their activities.

A senior intelligence official in Bajur also said a local al-Qaida leader, Faqir Mohammed, who led Saturday's rally, was believed to have been inside the madrassa.

It was unclear if Mohammed was among those killed, said the official, who declined to be identified further because he was not authorized to speak to the media.

Siraj ul-Haq, a Cabinet minister from the North West Frontier Province, condemned the attack and announced he would resign from the government in protest.

"The government has launched an attack during the night, which is against Islam and the traditions of the area," ul-Haq told the AP during the funeral. "They (the victims) were not given any warning. This was an unprovoked attack on a madrassa. They were innocent people."

Ul-Haq, who belongs to the powerful Islamic political party, Jamaat-e-Islami, said protests would be staged throughout the northern tribal region on Tuesday to denounce the attack.

Pakistan has been trying to defeat militants along its porous border with Afghanistan since the U.S.-led invasion of that country in 2001 fanned increased terrorist activity on the Pakistan side of the frontier.

Pakistan became a key U.S. ally in its war on terror after the Sept. 11 attacks in the U.S., and has deployed about 80,000 soldiers to flush out Taliban and al-Qaida members hiding in the mountainous frontier tribal region.

Raid Kills 80 At Pakistani School (WT/AP)

By Paul Garwood

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan -- Pakistani helicopter gunships yesterday destroyed a religious school that the military said was fronting as an al Qaeda training camp, killing 80 persons in the country's deadliest military operation targeting terrorism suspects.

Islamic leaders and al Qaeda-linked militants blamed the United States for the air strike and called for nationwide demonstrations to condemn the attack that flattened the school -- known as a madrassa -- and ripped apart those inside. Furious villagers and religious leaders said the pre-dawn missile barrage killed innocent students and teachers.

Among those killed in the attack in the remote northwestern village of Chingai, two miles from the Afghan border, was a cleric who had sheltered militants and was thought to be associated with al Qaeda's deputy leader, Ayman al-Zawahri.

The raid threatens efforts by President Pervez Musharraf to persuade deeply conservative tribesmen to back his government over pro-Taliban and al Qaeda fighters, who have strong support in many semiautonomous regions in northern Pakistan. The planned signing of a peace deal between tribal leaders and the military was canceled yesterday in response to the air strike.

Gen. Musharraf has been under intense pressure, particularly from the United States and Afghanistan, to rein in militant groups, particularly along the porous Pakistan-Afghanistan border, where al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and al-Zawahri are thought to be hiding. The Pakistani leader, as well as Afghan President Hamid Karzai, met with President Bush in Washington last month to address the issue.

Protests were held from the northwestern city of Peshawar to the southern city of Karachi, the largest occurring in Chingai and the Bajur district's main town of Khar, where 2,000 tribesmen and shopkeepers chanted, "Death to Musharraf. Death to Bush."

Fearing unrest, Britain's Prince Charles, who arrived in Pakistan on Sunday for a five-day stay, canceled a visit planned for today to Peshawar.

The raid was launched after the madrassa's leaders, headed by cleric Liaquat Hussain, rejected government warnings to stop using the school as a training camp for terrorists, said army spokesman Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan.

"These militants were involved in actions inside Pakistan and probably in Afghanistan," Gen. Sultan told the Associated Press.

Militant groups in Bajur are thought to ferry fighters, weapons and supplies to Afghanistan to target U.S. forces there and Pakistani soldiers on this side of the ethnic Pashtun majority tribal belt.

Gen. Sultan said 80 persons were killed in the building, which was 100 yards from the nearest house. Local political officials and Islamic leaders corroborated the death toll.

Gen. Sultan denied reports that al-Zawahri was in the area at the time of the attack. "It is all wrong, speculative, and we launched this operation on our own to target a training facility," he said. A Bajur-area intelligence official said word was spreading among residents that al-Zawahri may have been expected at the madrassa, but he said the reports were wrong.

Hussain, the cleric thought to have been a deputy of al-Zawahri, was among those killed, the intelligence official and residents said.

Another al-Zawahri lieutenant, Faqir Mohammed, apparently left the madrassa 30 minutes before the strike, said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the press.

Hours later, Mr. Mohammed addressed 10,000 mourners at a funeral for some of the victims.

"We were peaceful, but the government attacked and killed our innocent people on orders from America," said Mr. Mohammed, who was surrounded by dozens of militants brandishing semiautomatic weapons. "It is an open aggression."

Three funerals were held one after the other in a field near the madrassa, where the remains of at least 50 persons were laid on wooden beds placed side by side in rows and covered with colored blankets.

Villagers walked among the beds and offered prayers. Militants, their faces covered with brown and red scarves, patrolled the crowd.

On Saturday, Mr. Mohammed led a rally of 5,000 Taliban and al Qaeda supporters nearby, during which he denounced the Pakistani and U.S. governments and praised bin Laden.

Pakistan Ties Site It Attacked To Militants (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Oct. 30 — The Pakistani military said today that it had destroyed a religious school used for training militants in the Bajur tribal area, which straddles the border with Afghanistan. The attack killed at least 80 people, the military said, describing them as militants.

The strike started at about 5 a.m. local time, when helicopter gunships fired missiles into the religious school, known as a madrassa, that was run by a local cleric, Maulvi Liaqut, according to military officials. Ground troops then stormed the compound.

Local news reports said Mr. Liaqut was killed in the attack.

He had once been a member of the defunct militant movement Tehreek Nifaz-e-Shariat Mohammadi, which sent thousands of tribal fighters into Afghanistan to support the Taliban before being banned in 2002 by President Gen. Pervez Musharraf. Mr. Liaqut was accused by the government of harboring local and foreign militants at the school.

“We received confirmed intelligence reports that 70 to 80 militants were hiding in a madrassa used as a terrorist-training facility, which was destroyed by an army strike, led by helicopters,” Maj. General Shaukat Sultan, a spokesman for the Pakistani military, told The Associated Press.

He also told reporters that security forces had information that the madrassa was being used for military training, and that the militants had been warned to close down the facility but had not done so.

Local television stations showed scenes from the attack site, including armed men seen standing by the dead bodies and thousands of people gathered around the rubble.

General Sultan said that no "high value target" was present during the raid, referring to leaders of Al Qaeda or the Taliban. General Sultan also said that no children or women were present inside the madrassa, and he denied that any American or NATO troops were involved in the raid.

"The information that we are receiving so far is that majority of the facility has been destroyed and most of the miscreants present there, they have been killed," he said.

General Sultan said that the madrassa was in an isolated location. "There is no house within about a 100-meter radius of this madrassa," said General Sultan. "As per information that we had, there were no women or children present there," he said.

Pakistani officials dismissed any suggestions that the United States was behind the attack. Tasnim Aslam, a spokesman for Pakistan's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said at a news conference that the attack was not carried out under foreign pressure.

But opposition Islamist parties were quick to denounce the attack and blamed the United States. Qazi Hussain Ahmed, the leader of Jamaat-e-Islami, alleged that innocent children were killed and that the Pakistan Army was covering up for the alleged Americans strike.

"This area is not an area where there can be any training camp," Mr. Ahmed said at a news briefing in Islamabad. "This is actually tantamount to the declaration of war on Pakistan," he said.

After the attack, helicopters were reported hovering over the area. Telecommunication links were also reported to be suspended, according to local news media.

The madrassa was located in the village of Chingai near Khar, the main town in the tribal region of Bajur, one of the semiautonomous tribal areas in northwestern Pakistan that have long been considered safe havens for Taliban and Al Qaeda remnants.

Bajur, which borders Afghan province of Kunar, has a history of troubled militancy. Itwas the scene of a widely unpopular American military strike in January, when al Qaeda's No. 2 leader, Ayman al-Zawahiri, was the target.

As it happened, Mr. Zawahiri was not present at the time of that attack, but at least 18 people, mostly civilians, were killed. The incident helped spark nationwide protests against the United States and President Musharraf.

President Musharraf has sent more than 80,000 troops to the tribal areas along the Afghan border to flush out Taliban members.

NATO and Afghan officials have repeatedly said that Taliban fighters who have found refuge in Pakistan are responsible for attacks inside Afghanistan.

Responding to Afghani official accusations that Pakistan was not doing enough, General Sultan said both countries were responsible for curbing cross-border infiltration.

"If at all, there is any kind of infiltration taking place, the responsibility to check the infiltration is not only of Pakistan Army," he said. "The responsibility is of every one else. On the Pakistan side, we need to patrol the borders and on the Afghanistan side, they need to patrol the borders. If anyone is crossing the border, well, it also indicates failing on their part." "And as far as we are concerned, we do not support any such activity," General Sultan said. "And the purpose of the peace agreement is that the militant activity is to be marginalized, not to be supported."

Political fallout became evident in Pakistan soon after today's attack Siraj ul Haq, a senior minister in the provincial cabinet, and Haroon-ur-Rashid, a member of the Parliament, condemned the strike and announced plans to resign, a local television station reported.

Today's attack came two days after thousands of tribal militants staged a protest rally in Bajur and vowed to continue their opposition to the United States and its Pakistani supporters. Faqir Mohammad, a local tribal leader, told the protesters that jihad would continue against America and its allies, according toThe A.P., calling supporters of America the enemy.

The attack also threatens to disrupt a peace deal that was expected to be signed today between Bajur tribal leaders and the military. The agreement is meant to control the flow of weapons and militants into Afghanistan. A similar accord was signed with tribal leaders this year in neighboring North Waziristan.

"This attack is very strange, as we were told Sunday that the peace agreement would be signed," Mohammed Sadiq, a local lawmaker, told The A.P.

Pakistan Attack A Setback To Border Peace (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, October 31, 2006

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN

Missiles rained down Monday on what the military said was an Al Qaeda hideout in Bajaur district, a restive tribal area along Pakistan's border with Afghanistan.

The attack, which reportedly killed about 80 people in a madrassah, or religious school, is the second on Bajaur in less than a year. But it has erupted across a vastly different political context, raising concerns about the direction of Pakistan's efforts to contain terrorism in the area.

When missiles last January destroyed a compound in Damadola, killing 13 civilians, the government of Pakistan was still at war with militants in the tribal zones.

Now, however, they are nominally at peace, having signed a controversial accord in North Waziristan that many, including officials in Afghanistan and NATO, have viewed with skepticism.

Under the deal, tribal elders agreed to remove foreign fighters from tribal areas and to stop militants from entering Afghanistan. In return, the Army released hundreds of Taliban militants and returned their weapons, vehicle and equipment.

Monday, the tribal zone's provincial government had been expected to sign a similar accord - now in doubt - in Bajaur, broadening a peace process with Taliban-linked tribesmen.

The timing of the strike raises questions about Pakistan's commitment to such deals, as well as the commitment of its allies across the border. It also threatens to stoke extremism in an area that seemed, somewhat shakily, to be moving toward peace.

Pakistan has worked hard to stave off concerns about its policy of negotiating with terrorists. Some observers say they have failed, and that Monday's strike was a vote of no confidence from American and NATO forces across the border.

"What has happened today is a remarkable disapproval of the Pakistani government's policy [in the tribal areas]," says Rasul Bakhsh Rais, a political-science professor at the Lahore University of Management Sciences. "NATO and the Americans are telling Pakistan, 'If you have retreated from the area, then we will go there.' "

Pakistan's military spokesman, Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, said Monday that the dawn strike was conducted by Pakistan military helicopter gunships, which fired four to five missiles into the facility. The madrassah targeted, he added, was used as a base for terrorist activities and housed as many as 80 militants.

General Sultan said that the attack occurred after the leaders of the facility refused to close it down.

One of those killed was Liaquat Hussain, a cleric linked to Al Qaeda No. 2 Ayman al-Zawahiri, according to the Associated Press.

While the Army took responsibility for the attacks, Pakistan's leading Islamic political leader immediately blamed the United States and called for protests to take place Tuesday. One religious leader, Faqir Mohammed, who was not at the madrassah when it was struck, called for broad protest during a funeral attended by thousands of tribesmen. Two days earlier, Mr. Mohammed had denounced the Pakistani and US governments and praised Osama bin Laden during a pro-Taliban rally of 5,000 in Damadola.

Uncertainty persists, however, over who fired the missiles, and based on what intelligence. There are speculations that the strike, as in January, was miscalculated, and mistakenly targeted civilians rather than militants.

"It looks very odd for the Army to strike this madrassah," says Talat Masood, a retired lieutenant general and analyst in Islamabad. "Why couldn't they strike in a normal ground operation?"

Confusion has also prompted many to wonder whether the attack was conducted by American or NATO forces across the border in Afghanistan. The Pakistani Army, they speculate, might be claiming responsibility to avoid a political firestorm, as occurred after last January's attack. At that time, protests broke out when it was learned that a CIA drone had entered Pakistani airspace and fired upon a compound.

"[The strike] symbolizes a disagreement with the government of Pakistan. The agreement that Pakistan has signed, it has not been able to sell that to the US or Afghanistan," says Mr. Rais.

Whatever the source of the attack, there is consensus that peace efforts in the tribal areas have been undermined, if not derailed.

"I don't think another tribal elder will sign an agreement now," says Kamal Matinuddin, a retired lieutenant general. "It will put the government in a very difficult position."

Pakistan's counterterrorism strategies have been under fire for months. Its military strategy in the tribal areas, which began in 2003, had largely been seen as backfiring.

DOJ_NMG_0089112

Hundreds of militants were killed, but so, too, were civilians and Army personnel. Rather than beating back extremism, military operations turned the tribal areas into an enclave of Taliban and Al Qaeda sympathies.

The Army, many analysts say, finally backpedaled, pulling out troops and devising a new strategy. The peace accord signed in September, and the one scheduled for Tuesday, constituted radical alternatives. Monday's strike, and the calls for violence by protesters, have now cast a shadow over the process.

Pakistan Strike Called Response To U.S. Reports (WP)

By Pamela Constable And Kamran Khan

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

A missile strike that killed close to 80 people at an Islamic school in Pakistan early Monday was launched because of U.S. intelligence reports that senior al-Qaeda figures were hiding there, Pakistani intelligence officials said. The strike generated angry protests by religious and tribal leaders, who accused the government of doing Washington's bidding at the cost of Pakistani lives.

The country's major Islamic party charged that U.S. military planes carried out the attack, which demolished the school, located near the border with Afghanistan. Pakistani and U.S. military officials denied that, saying the raid was the work of Pakistani helicopter gunships and forces, though U.S. intelligence had prompted it.

"This was a training camp, and they had been warned to stop their activities," said Gen. Mahmud Ali Durrani, Pakistan's ambassador in Washington. "They did not pay heed, so they were hit by our gunships and all the people there were killed. There will be a lot of unhappy or misguided people saying we are killing our own people for the sake of the Americans, but we had a commitment to fight terrorism on our soil, and we made a decision."

Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, are widely believed to be hiding in the rugged Afghan-Pakistani border region, home to fiercely independent tribal peoples. Afghan officials also contend that Pakistan's side of the border is serving as a sanctuary for newly aggressive Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan.

The attack in the Bajaur tribal district near the village of Khar caused the highest number of deaths of any single anti-extremist attack in Pakistan since 2001, when Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, agreed to side with the United States to help overthrow the Taliban in Afghanistan.

The raid on the Islamic studies school, known as a madrassa, seemed to represent an abrupt shift from the Musharraf government's recent policy of seeking peaceful negotiations with extremists in the border regions. In the past several months, two peace deals were signed in the tribal areas of North and South Waziristan after sustained attacks there by the Pakistani military drew strong local opposition and caused heavy casualties on both sides.

A third such agreement was due to be signed in Bajaur this week, but it seemed almost certain to collapse now. Monday's events are bound to compound problems for Musharraf, whose domestic political support has been steadily eroding.

"What a stupid operation, just one day before an accord between the local Taliban and the government. It has killed the entire spirit and the peaceful atmosphere in the tribal areas," said Maulana Fazlur Rehman Khan, who heads one of two major religious parties in parliament. Protesters who turned out in many towns Monday pledged to return to the streets Tuesday.

A similar strike occurred in January, when U.S. missiles devastated a nearby compound that authorities believed Zawahiri was visiting. Officials initially denied, then acknowledged, reports that a U.S. drone had carried out the strike, which killed 18 people. The incident set off protests across Pakistan and forced the Musharraf government to publicly condemn the U.S. action.

Among those killed Monday was Maulana Liaquat, an Islamic cleric allied with al-Qaeda who is believed to have hosted a dinner for Zawahiri in January that led to the missile strike in Damadola village. At a mass funeral for Liaquat and his followers Monday afternoon, news agencies reported, thousands of armed men shouted, "Down with Musharraf! Down with Bush!"

Some religious politicians from the area rejected the official version of events, saying it bore strong similarities to the January attack.

"Exactly like Damadola, there was a big flare before a missile hit the madrassa with a huge bang. Several minutes later, Pakistan army gunship helicopters appeared on the horizon firing aimlessly," said Sahibzada Haroon-ur Rashid, the local member of parliament from the religious Jamaat-e-Islami party. "I don't have an iota of doubt that the missile was fired from an American drone."

Rashid resigned from parliament in protest Monday, as did another senior leader of the religious political alliance that controls North-West Frontier Province, near Afghanistan. Until now, the country's religious parties had maintained an uneasy alliance with Musharraf, and he often deferred to their demands.

Pakistani officials dismissed comparisons with the January attack. "I can say with 100 percent surety that our forces targeted the terrorist training facility," the chief military spokesman, Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, asserted. "It is wrong to draw any comparison with U.S.-led action in Damadola."

If Monday's attack was carried out exclusively by Pakistan's military, it suggests that Musharraf -- long squeezed between domestic and international pressure on the terrorism issue -- decided to risk near-certain outrage at home to bolster his faltering credentials as a partner in the United States' global campaign.

Musharraf visited Washington last month, where he met with President Bush and Afghan President Hamid Karzai at the White House. In the past, Musharraf's government has earned U.S. praise for arresting and killing many al-Qaeda fighters. But relations have been cool with Karzai because of the Afghan accusations that Pakistan is harboring Taliban fighters.

According to Durrani, the Pakistani ambassador, the Washington meetings included pledges by Pakistan to make a strong effort to fight terrorism, to involve tribal leaders in both countries in that effort and to share intelligence with U.S. and Afghan officials.

"Yes, there are sensitivities, but we cannot sit on our haunches and do nothing," he said. "Many times, things we do in the tribal areas are misinterpreted and not popular. But you have to do tough things. This sends the message that we mean business."

One Pakistani intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the religious school in Khar was "serving as nucleus for all pro-al-Qaeda and pro-Taliban activities" in the Bajaur tribal district.

Publicly, Sultan and other Pakistani officials acknowledged that the attack was partly based on foreign intelligence. Privately, other officials said the information was developed solely by Americans. "They pressed the intelligence hard against our face. . . . A rapid military action was inevitable," one said.

Durrani said no one at the school was younger than 20 and that no children or other civilians were believed killed.

Pentagon Mounts Public Affairs Ops To Counter Bad News, Exploit "New Media" (AFP)

By Jim Mannion

AFP, October 31, 2006

The Pentagon is expanding its public affairs operations to counter "inaccurate" news stories and editorials and exploit "new media" to get its message out, its chief spokesman said, denying the effort was linked to the US elections.

The initiative comes amid plummeting domestic support for the war in Iraq and just before crucial mid-term congressional elections in which opposition Democrats are contesting Republican control of the Congress.

Eric Ruff, the Pentagon press secretary, insisted that the new public affairs program was not prompted by either the elections or polls showing that only about 37 percent believe the war is going well.

"What were looking at doing is, 'How can we get better, how can we get faster, how can we transform public affairs?'," he told reporters.

"And we're looking at being quicker to respond to breaking news. Being quicker to respond, frankly, to inaccurate statements," he said.

"And we're looking at this whole issue of new media -- podcasting, and IM-ing and all those kinds of things, where people are basically running circles inside us," he said.

Ruff disclosed the expanded operations after questions were raised about a wall being built in the Pentagon press operations center that will separate the new unit from Pentagon public affairs officials who deal with the media.

He denied that the intent of the new operation was to go around the mainstream news media.

Ruff said he did not know how much the operation is costing or how many people were being hired.

The unit includes a rapid response team, a "new media" group, and a team that specializes in getting Pentagon officials booked on radio and television shows.

"Well, just for example, letters to the editors: the operational tempo for letters to the editor has gone up considerably," Ruff said.

Dorrance Smith, the assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, has written a torrent of letters to editors in recent weeks seeking corrections or rebutting articles and editorials.

The Pentagon's daily compilation of defense-related news articles on Monday ran five such letters, including one to the Washington Post that has not been published.

Ruff said the new operation also was set up by Smith, a former ABC television producer and media adviser in Baghdad to L. Paul Bremer, who led the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq in the year after the US invasion.

But US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, a strident critic of media coverage of Iraq, also has pushed for a sweeping overhaul in the way the military communicates with the public.

DOJ_NMG_0089114

In a speech to the Council on Foreign Relations in February, he called for 24-hour press operations centers and an approach that would give Internet operations and other channels of communications equal status to "20th century press relations."

"It will result in much less reliance on the traditional print press, just as publics of the US and the world are relying less on newspapers as their principal source of information," he said.

Efforts to expand the military's use of "information operations" overseas aroused controversy following disclosures last year that a private contractor was used to secretly plant paid stories in the Iraqi media.

"Information operations" is a military term used to describe propaganda aimed at influencing foreign publics. Traditional Pentagon public affairs, on the other hand, is bound by laws that prohibit propagandizing of Americans.

Asked whether the new Pentagon operations fell under the category of "information operations," Ruff said, "I've not looked at it that way at all."

"I've looked at it as getting better at what we do, from the standpoint of taking advantage of technology, of setting the record straight from a public affairs position," he said.

Pentagon Ramping Up Public Relations Efforts (AP)

AP, October 31, 2006

PENTAGON Think of a political campaign's "war room," and then picture it within the Pentagon's giant rings.A memo obtained by The Associated Press shows the Defense Department is adding to its public relations staff. It plans to set up teams to quickly answer opponents' claims, develop messages for news cycles and coordinate officials or politicians to speak out on issues.Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has said the thing that keeps him up at night is his belief that terrorists have been able to manipulate the media, while the Pentagon's communications efforts have been lacking. He once graded those efforts as a D or a D-plus.A Pentagon spokesman denies the new effort is aimed at shaping public opinion about the war, or at influencing next week's elections.

Pentagon Boosts Public Relations Arsenal (AP)

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Pentagon is buttressing its public relations staff and starting an operation akin to a political campaign war room as Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld faces intensifying criticism over the Iraq war.

In a memo obtained by The Associated Press, Dorrance Smith, assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, said new teams of people will "develop messages" for the 24-hour news cycle and "correct the record."

The memo describes an operation modeled after a political campaign -- such as that made famous by Bill Clinton's successful 1992 presidential race -- calling for a "Rapid Response" section for quickly answering opponents' assertions.

Another branch would coordinate "surrogates." In political campaigns, surrogates are usually high-level politicians or key interest groups who speak or travel on behalf of a candidate or an issue.

The plan would focus more resources on so-called new media, such as the Internet and Web logs. It would also include new workers to book civilian and military guests on television and radio shows.

Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff did not provide the exact number of people to be hired, or the costs.

Rumsfeld has complained bitterly that the press focuses too much attention on bad news coming out of Iraq, and not enough on progress being made there.

As an example, he said during a trip to Nevada earlier this year that he was deeply troubled by the success of terrorist groups in "manipulating the media" to influence Westerners.

"That's the thing that keeps me up at night," he said during a question-and-answer session at a naval base.

The Pentagon changes, in the works for months, come as voters prepare to go to the polls next week with the war in Iraq as a key issue.

Polls suggest that the Republicans could lose their majority in the House, and perhaps the Senate, too.

The new public relations plan began to take concrete shape on Friday as new construction began in the E-Ring, the Pentagon's outermost corridor, to accommodate new hires.

Ruff said Monday that the reorganization, spearheaded by Smith, will help the department "set the record straight" and provide accurate, timely information.

He denied that the effort was set up to respond to the eroding public support for the war, or that it was aimed at helping in next week's elections.

He also said he would not call it an "information operations" program, which generally refers to a propaganda-type campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0089115

Ruff said the effort grew out of Rumsfeld's criticism of the department's communications capabilities, which the secretary compared unfavorably to how quickly and effectively terrorists can get their message out.

"If I were grading I would say we probably deserve a 'D' or a 'D-plus' as a country as to how well we're doing in the battle of ideas that's taking place in the world today," Rumsfeld said during a visit to the Army War College in March.

"I'm not going to suggest that it's easy, but we have not found the formula as a country" for countering the extremists' message.

"We're trying to do better than a D-plus," said Ruff.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Monster's Founder Quits Board Amid Options Probe (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Mark Maremont

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

Monster Worldwide Inc.'s founder, Andrew McKelvey, resigned from the company's board after declining to be interviewed by lawyers conducting an internal investigation into backdating of stock options at the company.

Mr. McKelvey, who founded the company that was the precursor of Monster 39 years ago, had been the company's chairman and chief executive until earlier this month, when he stepped down from both posts, citing the demands of dealing with the options probe. Yesterday, he resigned his remaining positions as director and chairman emeritus. Monster is the parent of the popular Monster.com job-search Web site.

The broadening options-backdating scandal so far has focused on more than 150 companies, and white-collar attorneys say executives increasingly are refusing to cooperate with in-house probes for fear that their statements will be used against them by the government. But failure to cooperate makes it difficult or impossible for the executive to stay in his or her position. Nearly all of the companies involved are conducting internal probes, and typically turn over the results to federal investigators.

Robert Jones, a Monster spokesman, said the company and its board "demanded full compliance with the special committee and its representatives." He declined to comment further.

Behind yesterday's departure was an initial interview Mr. McKelvey, 71 years old, gave in July to the lawyers at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer Feld LLP conducting an internal probe for a special committee of Monster's board. At that time, Mr. McKelvey said that he had no knowledge of any options backdating at Monster, a person familiar with his interview said. This person said that Akin Gump lawyers found evidence contradicting this assertion.

Mr. McKelvey's new attorney, in a letter dated Oct. 29 submitting his client's resignation, tried to clarify remarks the former Monster chief had made in July. He said his client was "jet-lagged, came in without counsel and....did not express his thoughts and recollections as clearly or accurately as he would have liked."

Mr. McKelvey's lawyer, Steven F. Reich, said in the letter that his client had "misunderstood" what the July questions were about, and "focused too narrowly on the issue of whether he knew at the time that improper conduct had occurred, and not on the more general issue of whether backdating had occurred." Mr. Reich added that his client now wished to make clear that he didn't understand at the time that backdating of options was improper or that the practice could have legal or accounting implications.

Mr. McKelvey had been scheduled to be interviewed again by the Akin Gump lawyers yesterday, but Mr. Reich canceled the meeting, saying as new counsel he needed more time to prepare.

"We think the letter from Mr. McKelvey's lawyer is fairly self-explanatory," said Andrew Levander, an outside lawyer for Monster.

Options give their recipient the right to buy a stock at a fixed price, allowing the recipient to profit if the market value of the stock rises from the day the option was granted. But it turns out many companies cheated by pretending that their options were granted on earlier dates, when the stock price was much lower, a practice that gives an instant paper profit to grant recipients.

Backdating is illegal if not properly disclosed to shareholders, and also can pose serious accounting and tax problems for companies and executives.

Three former executives at Comverse Technology Inc. have been charged criminally with fraud connected with alleged options backdating at the New York telecommunications software firm. All three purportedly had given confessions to private lawyers conducting an internal probe. One, the company's former finance chief, has pleaded guilty.

At Monster, several top executives, not including Mr. McKelvey, received options supposedly granted at highly favorable times when the company's stock price was low. Several grants were at quarterly or annual low points. The company previously announced the suspension of Myron Olesnyckyj, its general counsel, and has said it is very likely to restate its financial results over options issues.

In a June interview with The Wall Street Journal, Mr. McKelvey said his practice was to sign off on grants and pass them on to the board's compensation committee, but he didn't know the "mechanics" of how options were ultimately awarded. In June, Mr. McKelvey also said that he didn't know of evidence of backdating or other improprieties.

Yesterday, Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said the corporate response to stock-option abuses was "unprecedented" and reflects how the corporate environment has changed after accounting scandals at companies such as Enron Corp.

In remarks to reporters after addressing a Stanford University conference in Washington, D.C., Mr. Cox said the forceful private-sector response shows "an unmistakable message has been received" on the need for firms to investigate and address stock-option abuses.

Mr. Cox told reporters the SEC has a number of investigations into stock-option abuses, and said he expects "we'll be seeing more." SEC enforcement division director Linda Thomsen said the agency has more than 120 probes under way, focusing on the worst behavior, such as falsifying documents, creating fictitious employees and lying to auditors -- conduct the SEC alleged against former Comverse executives, which Ms. Thomsen suggested may have occurred at other firms as well.

Separately, Intuit Inc. said that the SEC has decided not to recommend any enforcement action in its investigation of the company's options-granting practices. Intuit, a Mountain View, Calif., maker of personal-finance software, previously had said an internal probe found no evidence of fraud or wrongdoing in its options practices. The company concluded it didn't need to restate historical results.

Monster's Founder Steps Down As Chairman Emeritus (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, October 31, 2006

As federal authorities continue to investigate Monster Worldwide in its stock-option granting practices, the company said Monday that former CEO and founder Andrew McKelvey has resigned as chairman emeritus of the company.

The 71-year-old stepped down last month as CEO and chairman, and Chief Operating Officer William Pastore was promoted to CEO of Monster, the parent corporation of a popular job-search website.

McKelvey was scheduled to meet Monday with a Monster special committee investigating the company's stock-option grants, but he changed his mind.

The company said in a statement that “Mr. McKelvey had declined to be interviewed” and “would not provide assurance that he would appear at a later date.”

McKelvey's attorney, Steven Reich of Manatt Phelps & Phillips, said in a letter Sunday to Monster's private attorneys that “we need a good deal more time to get up to speed on this fact-intensive matter that covers a period of many years.”

The letter, addressed to attorney James Benjamin at law firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, also said that McKelvey was ill, was suffering from jet lag and lacked legal representation during a key meeting with the committee last July on the stock-option scandal.

When questioned, McKelvey did not understand the legal and accounting implications of stock-option backdating, or whether Monster engaged in improper practices, according to the letter filed Monday with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The SEC and Justice Department are investigating Monster's stock-option practices, the company has said. Monster also is conducting its own investigation, by the Akin Gump law firm and a special committee of directors.

Company spokeswoman Kathryn Burns said the company hopes to restate its financial results by December. “Now that we know the magnitude of the restatement,” she says, “we're planning to start 2007 on a clean slate.”

Nasdaq officials have warned Monster that it may be delisted if the company does not file by Dec. 13 its quarterly earnings statement for the June quarter.

Monster expects to restate its finances for the years 1997 through 2005, according to the company's SEC filings.

Meanwhile, recent shareholders' lawsuits accuse Monster executives and directors of securities fraud and of allegedly failing to disclose the backdating of stock-option grants worth millions of dollars.

Backdating option awards involves choosing an award date when a company's stock price was lower than the date the options were actually awarded. That gives the holder a chance for a bigger profit when they exercise the options and sell the shares.

Monster's senior executives were motivated "to overpay themselves, to profit from their misconduct by cashing in on underpriced stock options and to issue false financial statements to cover up their misdeeds," according to a lawsuit filed by the National Roofing Industry Pension Plan in U.S. District Court in New York.

Another federal lawsuit, filed by Philadelphia's Board of Pensions and Retirement, alleges that dozens of "suspicious grants" totaling millions of dollars were issued to Monster executives and directors from 1997 to the present.

Shares of Monster rose 2.6% to $41.32 in Monday trading on the Nasdaq stock market.

Federal authorities are investigating more than 100 companies on suspicion of illegal stock-option grants.

Ex-CEO Of Monster Worldwide Resigns From Board Over Stock Options Investigation (AP)

By Vinnee Tong, The Associated Press

AP, October 31, 2006

The scandal over stock options backdating spread to yet another executive as the former chief executive of Monster Worldwide Inc., Andrew J. McKelvey, quit his board seat and refused to sit for questions from fellow board members.

Monster Worldwide, parent of the world's largest job search Web site, announced McKelvey's resignation on Monday. A board committee conducting an internal investigation had sought to interview him further following a meeting in July. Monster has received a subpoena from the U.S. attorney's office in the Southern District of New York over stock options and has said it wants to complete its own investigation by the end of the year.

McKelvey, who is 71, is the latest company chief to be affected by investigations of the accounting of past options grants. In all, at least 135 U.S. companies have disclosed internal inquiries or government investigations and at least 39 executives and board directors at 19 companies have been fired or have resigned.

McKelvey's full resignation from the board comes weeks after he stepped down from the posts of chairman and chief executive on Oct. 9. At that time, he retained a spot on the board and was named as a chairman emeritus.

Top executives who have recently resigned from other companies over options investigations include: UnitedHealth Group Inc. Chief Executive William McGuire, KLA-Tencor Corp. Chairman Kenneth Levy, CNET Networks Inc. Chief Executive Shelby Bonnie and McAfee Inc. CEO George Samenuk. McGuire quit as chairman earlier this month and will resign as CEO by Dec. 1.

So far, federal authorities have filed charges against former officials of two technology companies. And Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said on Monday that he expected more such charges in the coming days.

"This is very, very serious," said Jerry Reisman, an attorney specializing in corporate fraud at the firm Reisman Peirez & Reisman. About McKelvey, he said, "He doesn't want to answer questions because anything he says can be used against him in any criminal investigation. He may already be a target, we don't know."

Backdating involves issuing stock options retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price, potentially increasing profits for recipients when they sell their shares at higher prices.

Monster issued a statement Monday disclosing that, through a lawyer, McKelvey declined to be interviewed by a special committee of the board in a meeting that had been set for Monday. He also would not assure the board that he would appear at a later date.

A lawyer for McKelvey wrote in a letter that the former executive refused to meet because he did not have sufficient time to review the facts of what had happened over the course of several years. Attorney Steven Reich also clarified answers McKelvey gave in a July meeting, arguing that McKelvey did not know backdating was illegal.

"He did not understand that it was improper for the exercise price of stock to be different than the price on the grant dates, nor did he understand there were legal or accounting implications associated with that difference," Reich wrote in the letter.

The company's ongoing internal investigation had also delayed the release of its latest quarterly earnings results and led to the suspension of Myron Olesnyckyj, the company's senior vice president, general counsel and secretary.

When McKelvey resigned as CEO, he was replaced by William Pastore. Monster's board also created a three-person executive committee for board matters.

Shares of Monster Worldwide rose $1.10, or 2.73 percent, to $41.39 on the Nasdaq Stock Market in afternoon trading.

More Options-tied Cases Likely (AP)

By MARCY GORDON And VINNIE TONG, The Associated Press

AP, October 31, 2006

SEC: Many companies, however, are stepping forward and voluntarily reporting irregularities.

WASHINGTON - With about 100 companies under investigation, new cases will be brought on suspicious timing of stock options grants in the near future, the head of the Securities and Exchange Commission said Monday.

Meanwhile, there have been an "unprecedented" number of companies that have voluntarily reported irregularities in stock options awards to the authorities -- a cooperation that will be taken into account by the SEC in those cases, Chairman Christopher Cox said.

Federal authorities have filed charges so far against former officials of two technology companies.

"I'd expect that we'll see more as a result of that process in the days ahead," Cox told reporters.

His remarks came amid news that the former chief executive of Monster Worldwide Inc., parent of the world's largest job-search site, had resigned from its board after refusing to be interviewed about the company's past options practices.

Andrew J. McKelvey's resignation came weeks after he stepped down from the posts of chairman and chief executive on Oct. 9. At that time, he retained a board seat and was named chairman emeritus.

To date, at least 135 public companies have disclosed internal inquiries over options grants or investigations by the SEC or the Justice Department, and at least 39 executives and directors at 19 companies have been fired or resigned.

"This is very, very serious," said Jerry Reisman, an attorney specializing in corporate fraud at the firm Reisman Peirez & Reisman. About McKelvey, he said, "He doesn't want to answer questions because anything he says can be used against him in any criminal investigation. He may already be a target; we don't know."

A lawyer for McKelvey wrote in a letter that the former executive refused to meet because he did not have sufficient time to review the facts of what had happened over the course of several years. Attorney Steven Reich also clarified answers McKelvey gave in a July meeting, arguing that McKelvey did not know backdating was illegal.

Backdating is an issue in many of the investigations. In the practice, stock options are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price. This can fatten profits for options recipients.

Backdating options can be legal if the practice is disclosed properly to investors and approved by the company's board.

Missed Deadlines Raise Possibility Of More Backdated Option Grants (MERCN)

By Therese Poletti

The San Jose Mercury News, October 31, 2006

Hundreds of companies have missed the regulatory deadlines to disclose how many stock options they have granted to insiders, raising questions about whether more options grants may have been backdated even amid new tougher securities laws, according to a report by Glass Lewis.

In an Oct. 20 report called ``The Backdating Scandal's Second Act?" Glass Lewis, an institutional shareholder advisory firm in San Francisco, noted that its research has identified hundreds of companies with late filings to the Securities and Exchange Commission. Those filings, called Form 4s, are now required within two days of the grants, per new securities laws as a result of Sarbanes-Oxley legislation.

``This suggests backdating continued to occur after the adoption of new disclosure rules," wrote Todd Fernandez, a senior research analyst at Glass Lewis, in the report. He noted there are many examples of companies that were late in disclosing grants to insiders and the stock price rose materially from the purported grant date to the disclosure date.

Glass Lewis said it reviewed hundreds of thousands of insider transactions from January, 2004 to June 2006, for its report.

To date, the SEC and the Justice Department have said they are investigating more than 100 companies for giving executives and employees a head start on profits, by backdating their stock options grants to a more favorable date. Backdating per se is not illegal, but the companies are being investigated for not properly disclosing these options grants in their financial statements. Companies and employees could also face some tax implications.

SEC's Grip On Hedge Funds Reviewed (DEAL)

By Ron Orol And Donna Block, The Deal

The Deal, October 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089119

Congressional investigators are examining whether stock exchanges and the Securities and Exchange Commission are equipped to police trading activity ahead of market-moving deals, particularly as hedge funds become an increasingly large presence in the financial markets.

At the request of Sen. Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, the Government Accountability Office earlier this month agreed to examine whether the SEC had adequate procedures in place to oversee stock exchange regulators, including the New York Stock Exchange and NASD.

Ostensibly, those exchanges are self-regulatory organizations, but the SEC ultimately is charged with ensuring that the public markets are carrying out their obligations to root out insider trading, fraud and other abuses.

Financial industry sources say Grassley is right to suspect some fire behind the smoke of suspicious trading and that the SEC appears to suffer a backlog of referrals of suspected improper trading from the exchanges.

With the advent of decimalization, increased domination by institutional trading, short-term trading strategies by hedge funds, and the move to a for-profit model of the major trading venues, it's unclear whether the SRO's market surveillance budgets, staffing levels and computer technology are keeping up.

"The tasks are bigger, the volumes are bigger and the rapidity of trading is bigger," said Steve Howard, a partner at Washington law firm Thatcher Profitt & Wood.

As for the SEC, Howard added that the agency has maintained the initiative in areas like insider trading. "Their actions [on insider trading] are at a low relative the number of actions taken in the 1980s and with a faux pas like Pequot it begs the question -- what happened?"

In fact, according to testimony by NYSE Regulation executive vice president Robert Marchman in September, the NYSE in the last two years has seen "a significant increase in the number and complexity of our insider trading referrals to the SEC." According to his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, referrals to the SEC increased from 68 in 2004 to 111 in 2005, a 63 percent increase. For 2006, at the current pace, "we project 140 referrals to the SEC, an increase of 26 percent from 2005," he said.

Combined, insider trading referrals to the SEC have increased a cumulative 105 percent over the last two years. "The projected 140 referrals in 2006 will handily surpass the five-year high-water mark of 98 referrals in 2000," Marchman said.

So what is the SEC doing with all these referrals?

The agency declined comment pending a review of its records. But one suggestion is that the SEC has not acted on many of them because is focused on other areas like the roll out of XBRL -- a quest to modernize the agency's data retrieval system. The personnel-strapped agency also focused a lot of attention in the past year on unsuccessful attempts to require hedge fund manager registration, an initiative that was struck down in court. A court also struck down a rule that would have required independent directors to sit on mutual fund boards.

The SEC is indeed hurting for bodies. According to a source close to the SROs at a recent meeting with the SEC, the organizations were told that trading referrals were not acted upon because of a "hiring freeze." It's estimated that the SEC lost 31 "full-time equivalent" positions in enforcement in fiscal 2006, a 2.4 percent decline from fiscal 2005.

Nevertheless, Grassley wants to scrutinize in greater detail the SEC's handling of an insider trading case involving a large hedge fund and an influential investment banking executive prior to mergers or other market moving activities. Grassley questioned whether the agency gave Morgan Stanley chief executive John Mack special treatment during a probe of insider trading at Pequot Capital Management Inc., which runs $7 billion in hedge funds.

In a letter to clients last month, Pequot announced that the SEC staffers had determined they would not bring charges against the fund or any of its employees.

The revelation fueled alarm on Capitol Hill, where lawmakers already had raised concerns about the SEC's handling of the Pequot investigation. The former leader of the SEC's Pequot investigation was fired after telling Congress that senior SEC officials blocked his efforts to question Mack, who now heads Morgan Stanley. The agency has been investigating whether Pequot relied on insider information to buy stock of Heller Financial Inc. prior to its 2001 takeover by General Electric Co.

Beyond the Pequot matter, Grassley wants the General Accounting Office to investigate the SEC's enforcement division and compliance department and whether the agency is prepared to oversee hedge fund trades. Grassley asked the GAO to examine the SEC's "planning, oversight, control and other management processes." More broadly, the study will look at the overlapping SEC and SRO compliance networks and whether there is an overly cozy relationship between the stock exchanges and their investment banking clients.

It's unclear how long the GAO will take to issue its report, but the oversight office, which agreed to do the investigation on Oct. 16, will likely take several months and could be completed by June.

Hedge fund and other regulatory observers expect that should the GAO identify problems with the SEC's investigation of this situation, then it is likely stock exchanges and the SEC will spend more time and energy inspecting market transactions and other activities. The result is also likely to be an increased level of communications between the stock exchanges and the SEC on market activity.

"I expect the SROs will likely need to devote a significantly larger portion of their resources looking at market activity," said William Natbony, partner at Katten Muchin Rosenman in New York.

Stock exchanges have already both invested heavily in reviewing market moving activities, with possible plans for more funding in that area.

But Arthur F. Bell Jr., president of Arthur Bell & Associates, a Hunt Valley, Md., hedge fund consultancy firm, said there isn't enough evidence available yet to determine whether there is a problem and if there is an issue, whether it needs a whole new regulatory regime.

Grassley's efforts also may have set up a three-way congressional turf battle over the hedge fund regulation. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., in June held a hearing on the industry, charging that the SEC and the Justice Department had better get serious about investigating market manipulation by hedge funds and collusion between hedge fund managers and ostensibly independent research firms that supply analysis to investors.

Efforts to rein in the hedge fund industry by both Grassley and Specter have put a spotlight on Senate Banking Committee Chairman Richard Shelby, R-Ala. The Senate Banking Committee has jurisdiction over hedge funds and investment banking.

But securities lawyers also contend that whatever the results of the GAO report, it is not likely to put pressure on SEC Chairman Christopher Cox to restore the requirement for hedge fund manager registration.

As hedge funds have increased in size they have also increased their trading volume, making the job of stock exchange oversight of the trades more difficult. Richard Lashley, co-founder of Naperville, Ill.-based hedge fund PL Capital, says he's worried about the system of intermediaries that processes stock transactions seizing up.

"I don't know if there are too many transactions, but since there is much more capital out there I worry about the system which the trades are made could break down," Lashley says.

Targeting Hedge Funds (WSJ)

The big news with last month's implosion of Amaranth Advisors hedge fund was how little news it made. Even as the $9 billion fund was spiraling down after bad energy bets, J.P. Morgan Chase and the Citadel Investment Group stepped in to pick up the pieces. J.P. Morgan even reported that the deal boosted its third-quarter earnings.

But the Amaranth debacle still poses a different threat -- the political kind. Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley is circulating a letter to regulators looking for suggestions on how to regulate hedge funds. He's far from the only one. Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal is bidding to become the next Eliot Spitzer by doing to hedge funds what New York's AG did to the insurance industry. (Someone might want to tell Mr. Blumenthal that if he wants to drive this rich and growing industry out of Greenwich, he should keep it up.)

Rumblings can be heard abroad too. The German government wants the G-8 to take up hedge-fund and private-equity regulation. A select committee of the British Parliament is already examining regulations. Arthur Levitt, a former head of the SEC who opposes more hedge-fund regulation, nonetheless says he'd be surprised if Congress doesn't take up the issue next year, no matter which party controls Congress. * * *

So, just what is driving this push to regulate? First, until recently hedge funds have been growing like Topsy, and the 1998 meltdown of Long-Term Capital Management did little to diminish wealthy investors' appetite for new funds. Today there are more than 3,000 hedge funds, managing more than $1 trillion in assets. This growth has made them an increasingly attractive target for imperialist bureaucrats and rent-seeking politicians.

Then there are the demographics. Hedge funds by definition are open only to the rich. They have received a regulatory pass so far by limiting the number of investors in any given fund and restricting access to those who, essentially, can afford to lose everything they put in. By promising to cater only to the wealthy, hedge funds escape most of the rules passed in the wake of the 1929 crash to protect small investors. They can also take on a lot more leverage than, say, mutual funds. And their managers are not restricted in paying themselves performance-based compensation.

This basic bargain -- stay away from small investors and the SEC will leave you alone -- has held up pretty well for 70 years. There's little political hay to be made by arguing that millionaires need government protection from other millionaires.

But recently the bargain has shown signs of fraying. Senator Grassley cites pension-fund investments in hedge funds as one cause for concern. A large public or private pension fund may have billions in assets, but if it gets burned by a hedge fund that goes belly up, the "little guy" could get hurt, the Senator claims.

Never mind that pension funds have been seeking out hedge funds precisely because the lighter regulatory burden has meant higher returns. Moreover, to say that pension beneficiaries are "exposed" to hedge-fund risk is another way of saying that they are exposed to pension-fund-manager risk. But this is one reason pension funds themselves are regulated and supervised. Pension-fund investments are also highly diversified, or should be, with hedge funds representing only a slice of a pension-fund portfolio.

A second concern is that hedge funds are getting so big and numerous that they may pose a risk to the larger financial system. Thus regulators say they need to know more about, and have more control over, what exactly is going on in Greenwich.

"Systemic" risk is no laughing matter. One such risk that keeps us awake at night is having so much housing risk concentrated in two big firms, Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac -- especially when they enjoy an implicit government guarantee on the leverage they use to fatten their bottom line. Those two companies, by the way, have a combined portfolio nearly as large as the entire hedge-fund industry. But Capitol Hill prefers to ignore that systemic danger because the two mortgage giants and their homebuilder allies lather the place with campaign contributions.

By contrast, when Long-Term Capital Management (LTCM) went bust, it had about $5 billion in assets that it had leveraged into a $120 billion portfolio. That's not chump change, but the banks that had the most to lose stepped up and bought out the hedge-fund managers. The investors in LTCM got wiped out, but the "financial system" barely hiccupped. A report on LTCM issued in 1999 by the Treasury, the SEC and Federal Reserve noted that, even in a worst-case scenario, none of the banks and brokerages "exposed" to LTCM were ever in danger of insolvency. More recently, the failure of Amaranth and Bayou made headlines but barely caused a financial blip.

This is not to say there are no risks, especially when hedge funds are experimenting in complex derivatives and the like. But most of those transactions have banks or other regulated entities as counterparties, and so do not occur in a regulatory vacuum. Banks and their regulators have a duty to understand their exposure to what their hedge-fund clients and counterparties are doing. As long as they do, the risk of contagion can be minimized without intrusive regulation of hedge funds. * * *

All that said, politicians follow the money, so it was inevitable that hedge funds would become targets as they prospered. Some hedge-fund managers have floated the idea of establishing a self-regulatory entity like the NASD for their industry to keep the panting politicians at bay. This could prove a decent hedge of its own against more-intrusive alternatives.

Certainly it beats giving direct jurisdiction over the funds to the SEC and its army of 27-year-old lawyers. Best of all would be for the Members of Congress to leave hedge funds alone and reform the many "systemic" financial risks -- such as Fannie Mae, Social Security -- that they themselves have created.

Delphi Settles Charges With SEC (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission said yesterday that it settled civil fraud charges against embattled auto parts supplier Delphi Corp. and some of its former officials, while others vowed to fight.

The SEC named 13 individuals in the case, which alleges that officers at the company's highest level engaged in accounting schemes to mask Delphi's declining financial condition from 2000 to 2004. In one effort, the SEC said executives misrepresented warranty claims as pension costs to improve financial results.

Under terms of the settlement, Delphi faces no financial penalties.

The SEC said six individuals in the case agreed to settle the charges without admitting wrongdoing and will pay a total of $1.4 million in fines and other payments. The largest amount will be paid by Alan Dawes, Delphi's former chief financial officer, who agreed to pay $687,000.

J.T. Battenberg III, Delphi's former chief executive who was also named in the complaint, denied the SEC's claims.

"I deny the allegations against me and will ask that the Court hear evidence at the earliest possible time," Battenberg said in a statement.

The other former Delphi officials fighting the case are Paul Free, controller and chief accounting officer; John Blahnik, treasurer; Milan Belans, former director of capital planning and pension analysis; Catherine Rozanski, director of financial accounting and reporting; and Judith Kudla, former director of finance in Delphi's information technology department. Scot

McDonald, an employee of a Texas IT company ensnared in the case, also is fighting the complaint, which was filed in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan.

Thomas W. Kranmer, Blahnik's attorney, said he hadn't had an opportunity to review the complaint. "However, there is another side to this story and we look forward to making that presentation to the court," he said.

Attorneys for the others fighting the complaints weren't immediately available for comment yesterday.

Linda Chatman Thomsen, director of the commissions enforcement division, said in a statement that the Delphi case stood out on several counts. "The facts here are particularly troubling because of the number of fraudulent schemes engaged in by Delphi, the length of time over which they occurred, and the number of Delphi employees, including senior officers, who carried out the schemes."

Last year, Troy, Mich.-based Delphi restated some earnings in the financial periods under SEC scrutiny. In a statement, chief executive Steve Miller said, "We are pleased to put the SEC investigation behind us and consider this settlement as an important step in our transformation process."

In one of the alleged abuses, the SEC said Delphi engaged in accounting schemes that tried to hide a billing dispute with General Motors Corp. over faulty parts. According to the complaint, GM was asserting in May 2000 that Delphi owed between $350 million and $800 million for warranty claims for faulty Delphi-made parts. The firms eventually agreed to $237 million to satisfy the claims.

Along the way, Delphi officials continually misclassified the items. The SEC complaint says Delphi sought to mischaracterize the $237 million payment as a pension-related expense, which could potentially limit the payment's impact on Delphi's income statement. The SEC says the misclassification resulted in Delphi overstating profit in the second quarter of 2000 by $69 million. In the third quarter of 2000, the SEC says Delphi's profit would have been about $15 million, rather than the $148 million Delphi reported.

Additionally, near the end of 2000, the SEC said Delphi entered into two fraudulent inventory transactions in which it purported to sell $270 million of precious metals to banks and consulting firms, while simultaneously agreeing to buy the inventory back later. The SEC said the transactions were intended to allow Delphi to inflate its cash and improperly report $80 million in profit.

Delphi has been operating under bankruptcy court protection since last October. The firm, once under GM's wing, was spun off in 1999. Delphi then became stalled by crushing U.S. labor contracts and competition from parts makers operating in low-wage countries. Since separating from GM, Delphi has lost billions of dollars. Its problems have cast a shadow over GM, which is also trying to stabilize its U.S. operations.

SEC Files Fraud Charges Against Delphi And Former Top Executives (AP)

By Ken Thomas, Associated Press

AP, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Securities and Exchange Commission said Monday it had settled charges of accounting fraud against Delphi Corp. and six people, including the auto supplier's former chief financial officer, in a scheme to hide the poor conditions of the company's finances.

The SEC, in a filing in federal court in Detroit, charged former Delphi Chief Executive J.T. Battenberg and others with participating in or aiding and abetting the company's fraud.

Delphi, the nation's largest auto supplier, filed for bankruptcy protection in October 2005. Resolving the SEC investigation could help the company move closer to emergence from bankruptcy next year.

The government said in a statement that the Troy, Mich.-based company had settled its charges and will not face penalties because of its cooperation with investigators.

Delphi Chairman and CEO Robert S. "Steve" Miller said the auto supplier had "cooperated fully with the commission's investigation and will continue to do so. We are pleased to put the SEC investigation behind us and consider this settlement an important step in our transformation process."

Delphi settled the charges "without admitting or denying the Commission's allegations," the SEC said.

The agency said it settled charges with six of the people named in the complaint, including former Chief Financial Officer Alan Dawes, who agreed to pay $687,000 in fines and restitution.

The SEC investigation found that Delphi manipulated its earnings from 2000 to 2004, using several illegal schemes to boost its earnings, including the concealment of a $237 million transaction in 2000 with its former parent company, General Motors Corp., involving warranty costs.

Linda Chatman Thomsen, director of the SEC's division of enforcement, said the facts were "particularly troubling because of the number of fraudulent schemes engaged in by Delphi, the length of time over which they occurred, and the number of Delphi employees, including senior officers, who carried out the schemes."

The SEC said its investigation was continuing. The Justice Department has also been conducting a criminal investigation of the company related to the accounting practices. A Justice spokeswoman declined to comment.

Battenberg, in a statement, said the SEC complaint against him "relates entirely to a settlement of disputes between Delphi and General Motors in September 2000 that I believed and continue to believe was entirely lawful and proper.

"I fully cooperated with Delphi and with the SEC in their investigations of this matter both before and after my retirement, and am disappointed to say the least that this lawsuit has been filed," Battenberg said. "I deny the allegations against me and will ask that the court hear the evidence at the earliest possible time."

Battenberg, Delphi's founding chairman after it was spun off from GM in 1999, announced his retirement in February 2005, shortly before the SEC probe was announced.

Peter Henning, a former SEC attorney who teaches at Wayne State University Law School, said the chief financial officer's knowledge was key to the government's probe in similar accounting fraud cases involving Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. He said Dawes, the former CFO, would likely be the linchpin in the Delphi case.

"The CFO not only knows the accounting but he also knows the management decisions for certain transactions, so he will be a key to the case," Henning said.

In addition to Battenberg and Dawes, the SEC complaint also named Paul Free, Delphi's former controller and chief accounting officer; John Blahnik, Delphi's former treasurer and senior vice president; Milan Belans, Delphi's former director of capital planning and pension analysis; Catherine Rozanski, Delphi's former director of financial accounting and reporting; and Judith Kudla, former director of finance in Delphi's information technology department.

Others charged include: Scot McDonald, who works for a Texas-based information technology company and formerly served as manager of U.S. GAAP Consulting and Reporting; B.N. Bahadur, who led a Michigan-based private management consulting company.

In addition, the complaint charged four other people with aiding and abetting Delphi's reporting and books-and-records violations: Atul Pasricha, Delphi's former assistant treasurer; Laura Marion, Delphi's former director of financial accounting and reporting; Stuart Doyle, a former client executive supporting the Texas IT company's relationship with Delphi; and Kevin Curry, a former client executive supporting the Texas IT company's relationship with Delphi.

In addition to Dawes, the SEC reached settlements with Pasricha, Bahadur, Marion, Doyle and Curry. Bahadur agreed to pay back nearly $490,000 in ill-gotten gains and interest and pay an $80,000 penalty; Pasricha agreed to a $55,000 penalty; Marion and Doyle agreed to pay penalties of $40,000 apiece and Curry agreed to pay a $25,000 penalty.

Attorneys for Belans, Kudla and McDonald didn't immediately return telephone calls seeking comment. Free's attorney, Richard Rossman, had no immediate comment.

David DuMouchel, Rozanski's lawyer, said they were "very disappointed that the (SEC) filed the action against Cathy but now we'll just proceed to defend" her.

Thomas Cranmer, Blahnik's attorney, said, "there's another side of the story to be told, and we look forward to presenting our case in court."

Delphi's Ex-CEO To Fight Fraud Charges (USAT)

By Sharon Silke Carty

USA Today, October 31, 2006

DETROIT — Delphi's former CEO says he'll fight a lawsuit by the Securities and Exchange Commission that charges him and six other former Delphi employees with incidents of fraud from 2000 to 2004.

The SEC said its two-year investigation revealed the auto-parts supplier manipulated its finances during that period to boost cash flow and earnings.

An additional six people, including the former chief financial officer, have settled charges related to the incidents.

J.T. Battenberg, Delphi's founding chairman and CEO from 1999 (when the supplier was spun off from General Motors) until he retired in June 2005, insists the actions he took were “entirely lawful and proper.”

“I fully cooperated with Delphi and the SEC in their investigations of this matter both before and after my retirement, and am disappointed — to say the least — that this lawsuit has been filed,” he said in a statement.

Six of those charged, including former CFO Alan Dawes, reached settlements with the SEC without admitting guilt and will pay a total of $1.4 million in fines.

Delphi, which filed for bankruptcy-court protection in October 2005, also did not admit guilt and, because of its cooperation with the probe, won't have to pay fines.

"The facts here are particularly troubling because of the number of fraudulent schemes engaged in by Delphi, the length of time over which they occurred, and the number of Delphi employees, including senior officers, who carried out the schemes," said Linda Chatman Thomsen, director of the SEC's division of enforcement.

The SEC alleges that it uncovered seven incidents of fraud, including:

·Two moves in 2000 that hid a $237 million liability Delphi faced for defective parts, allowing it to falsely boost its net income for the year by $202 million.

·Two schemes in which Delphi shifted the way it accounted for its inventory of metals, batteries and generator cores from fourth-quarter 2000 to first-quarter 2001.

The moves made Delphi's cash flow look $200 million better and its inventory $270 million slimmer, and boosted net income by $80 million.

·In exchange for new business, Delphi made EDS, an information technology supplier, pay it $20 million, which Delphi agreed to pay back over five years, with interest — essentially turning the deal into a loan to Delphi.

But in an attempt to make its earnings targets for the 2001 fourth quarter, Delphi booked the $20 million as income. The SEC began its investigation of Delphi in 2004, after EDS informed the agency of the loan.

Nine Ex-Delphi Execs Charged With Fraud (DEN)

By David Shepardson

Detroit News, October 31, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission filed civil fraud charges against nine former Delphi executives, including former CEO J.T. Battenberg III and former Chief Financial Officer Alan Dawes, in U.S. District Court in Detroit on Monday in connection with allegations of widespread accounting fraud.

Also charged were four company officials from two companies that conducted allegedly improper transactions with Delphi -- including three employees at EDS and B.N. Bahadur, the CEO of Southfield-based turnaround firm BBK Ltd.

Bahadur, Dawes, two of the EDS employees and two other former Delphi officials agreed to settle the allegations with the SEC.

Delphi Corp., General Motors Corp.'s former parts unit, was also charged with wrongdoing as a corporation; it agreed to settle the allegations and will not pay any civil fine.

"The SEC's complaint against me relates entirely to a settlement of disputes between Delphi and General Motors in September 2000 that I believed and continue to believe was entirely lawful and proper. I fully cooperated with Delphi and with the SEC in their investigations of this matter both before and after my retirement, and am disappointed to say the least that this lawsuit has been filed. I deny the allegations against me and will ask that the Court hear the evidence at the earliest possible time."

In March 2005, following a 10-month internal investigation led by an outside law firm, Delphi ousted Dawes and then-chief accounting officer Paul Free, who was also charged in Monday's filing, and said many of the company's financial statements were inaccurate. It also removed at least four other officials.

The investigation into Delphi began in July 2004 after EDS, another former GM subsidiary, told the SEC in June 2004 about a $20 million loan in 2001 that Delphi booked as income. The SEC upgraded its probe into a formal investigation in August 2004.

Unresolved is the ongoing criminal investigation into Delphi Corp. being led by the Justice Department's fraud section.

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

NEW YORK -- The son of billionaire oil tycoon T. Boone Pickens pleaded guilty to securities fraud Monday, admitting his role in a scheme to inflate the stock value of three companies so he could make hundreds of thousands of dollars illegally.

DOJ_NMG_0089125

Michael O. Pickens, of Nocona, Texas, entered the plea in U.S. District Court in Manhattan after signing an agreement calling for him to be sentenced to as little as four years and nine months in prison or as much as five years and 11 months.

Judge Loretta A. Preska set sentencing for Jan. 30 after Mr. Pickens, 52, entered the plea to three charges of securities fraud. The charges carry a potential fine of $3 million.

Mr. Pickens was arrested July 18, 2005, and was accused of sending hundreds of thousands of hoax faxes throughout the U.S. in December 2004 to fraudulently induce investors to buy three stocks. (See related article1.)

Prosecutors said each fax purported to be a handwritten note conveying a stock tip to a person, suggesting it had been mistakenly sent to each recipient. An indictment said the fake faxes caused the trading values and market prices of the stocks to increase dramatically. It said one stock's value almost doubled in one day.

In one fake note, a financial planner identified as Chris tells Dr. Mitchel that his newest stock idea will be like the last one, which tripled in value.

The government, which didn't say how many people acted on the phony faxes, said Mr. Pickens used the faxes Dec. 17-22, 2004, to pump up the price of three stocks so he could sell them at a premium of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. Pickens told the judge "the faxes were made to appear as a misdirected tip from a stock broker to a customer. In fact, as I knew, there was no broker, no customer and no tip."

He added: "I knew at the time what I was doing was wrong, and I'm very sorry for my conduct."

During his plea, Mr. Pickens, a Texas stock promoter, said he has been undergoing treatment for substance abuse since June.

A spokesman for T. Boone Pickens, Jay Rosser, said: "Mr. Pickens is proud of Mike for accepting responsibility for his actions. This is an important step and a significant milestone. Boone and his whole family are fully supportive of him in his rehabilitation efforts."

Radler Assets Frozen (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

The assets of F. David Radler, the former publisher of The Chicago Sun-Times, were recently frozen by a Canadian court at the request of Hollinger Inc., Conrad M. Black's former holding company, which is suing Mr. Black and Mr. Radler to recover management fees.

A British Columbia Supreme Court judge in Vancouver granted the order on Oct. 25. Hollinger is suing Mr. Black and Mr. Radler to recover management fees and noncompetition payments.

The injunction, which applies worldwide, prohibits Mr. Radler and his company, F. D. Radler Ltd., from disposing of, mortgaging or transferring any assets, and freezes their bank accounts while the suit remains before the courts.

Mr. Radler is allowed to spend up to $22,255 a month for living expenses and legal fees. The order will remain in effect until Nov. 9, unless the court agrees to extend it, the judge, Deborah Satanove, said in a three-page ruling.

Mr. Black's assets were frozen Aug. 18 at Hollinger's request by the order of an Ontario Superior Court judge. Mr. Black and his wife were limited to a monthly allowance of 50,000 Canadian dollars. Mr. Black and Hollinger agreed on Sept. 29 to replace the judge's order with a confidential settlement.

Hollinger, the holding company that Mr. Black used to control the newspaper publisher Hollinger International, is seeking 636 million Canadian dollars in damages. In July, Hollinger International changed its name to the Sun-Times Media Group.

In Chicago, Mr. Black faces 12 charges of racketeering, money laundering, wire fraud and obstruction of justice. He is accused of moving $92 million from Hollinger International through other companies and using Hollinger Inc. to enrich himself at shareholder expense. Mr. Black has denied any wrongdoing. His trial in Chicago is scheduled to start in March.

Mr. Radler pleaded guilty in September to United States fraud charges and agreed to cooperate with the Justice Department.

Prosecutors have recommended that Mr. Radler serve 29 months in jail and pay a $250,000 fine. He remains free on a $500,000 bond until all proceedings in the case are finished.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutor Argues Issues For Leak Trial (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, October 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089126

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald told a federal judge Monday that he shouldn't have to explain during the upcoming trial of a former White House aide why nobody was charged with leaking the identity of a CIA operative.

Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, faces trial for obstruction and perjury in January and is the only person charged in the case. His supporters have accused Fitzgerald of singling out Libby while not charging the source of the leak, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage.

In court documents, Fitzgerald said he shouldn't have to address that issue at Libby's trial. While never addressing Armitage by name, Fitzgerald said it would be irrelevant to discuss other officials.

"If Mr. X was investigated for leaking classified information, the government's decision not to charge Mr. X should have nothing to do with the jury's role as the finder of fact in Libby's case," Fitzgerald wrote.

If jurors disagree with his decision not to charge anyone else, they might be less likely to convict Libby, Fitzgerald wrote.

Armitage told prosecutors he inadvertently revealed Plame's job to syndicated columnist Robert Novak in July 2003. Novak's story ran as Plame's husband, Joseph Wilson, criticized the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Libby was one of several Bush administration officials questioned about the leak and prosecutors said he lied about his conversations with reporters.

Defense attorneys have sought information regarding Armitage's role in the leak and have been unsuccessful.

Fitzgerald's court filing is an attempt to prevent Libby's attorneys from making the argument that Libby had no reason to lie because, if he had leaked classified information, prosecutors would have charged him with it.

"The government's decision not to charge a crime is not a declaration as to the legality or propriety of the defendant's conduct," Fitzgerald wrote.

Libby's defense attorneys are expected to respond to Fitzgerald's motion.

Fla. Prison Guards Stand Trial (AP-Y)

By Bill Kaczor, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 31, 2006

Lawyers for two prison guards charged in a contraband-for-sex scandal that ended in a deadly shootout told a jury Monday that the government's case relies on the testimony of inmates who are willing to lie in exchange for reduced sentences.

Gregory Dixon and Alan Moore, who both work at a federal prison for women, are accused of participating in a scheme to swap sex with female inmates for such commonplace items as gum, cigarettes and perfume. Both are charged with conspiracy and bribery. Dixon also is accused of witness tampering.

"You will hear a lot of nonsense from inmates all trying to punch their tickets home," said Thomas Findley, Dixon's lawyer, as the trial opened.

Authorities said the suspected plot ended June 21 in a shootout after prison guard Ralph Hill smuggled a gun into the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution and opened fire when FBI and Justice Department agents arrived to arrest him and other defendants. Hill and an FBI agent were killed.

Three guards have since pleaded guilty in the scheme, but none have been implicated in the shootout. Dixon and Moore have been suspended from their jobs.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Alan Sprowls acknowledged his key witnesses are convicted felons but promised the jury that the government will introduce sufficient evidence to show the guards abused their authority for personal benefit.

He said the conspiracy, punishable by up to 20 years in prison, was not based on a formal agreement or even a handshake.

"This is going to be a much more subtle understanding. ... 'I'm not going to tell on you; you're not going to tell on me,'" Sprowls said.

Findley said his client has admitted to having sex with inmates but was not charged with that crime. He denied that Dixon was part of a conspiracy to commit bribery, mail fraud and other crimes or that he traded contraband for sex.

Moore has not admitted to having sex with inmates. His attorney, Robert Harper, questioned whether the government has a case.

"Where's the DNA? There isn't any," Harper said. "Where's the recording? Where is the videotape? There isn't any."

Date Set For Death-penalty Trial (HONADV)

By Ken Kobayashi, Advertiser Courts Writer

Honolulu Advertiser, October 31, 2006

The first death penalty trial here since Hawai`i abolished capital punishment in the 1950s is scheduled to begin in October of next year.

Army Spc. Naeem Williams pleaded not guilty today to a charge of murdering his 5-year-old daughter Talia Williams, who died July 16 last year. He faces the death penalty, which was authorized earlier this year by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Federal Magistrate Judge Leslie Kobayashi today set Williams' trial for Oct. 16, which is later than usual because of legal issues that may arise because the charge carries the death penalty.

Williams' wife Delilah Williams is also scheduled to go on trial with her husband on a charge of murdering Talia Williams, but the attorney general did not authorize the death penalty prosecution for her. Delilah Williams earlier pleaded not guilty. If convicted, she faces a maximum sentence of life in prison.

Lee Man Claims He Was Victim In Pornography Case (BONITAN)

By Kristen Zambo

Bonita (FL) News, October 31, 2006

Former Lee County school bus driver Donald Deverso told a federal judge that he was taken advantage of by a girl from the Philippines.

He said he didn't do anything wrong, that he was the real victim in the child pornography case he accused the federal government of manufacturing.

At times becoming argumentative, former Lee County school bus driver Donald Deverso staunchly maintained his innocence Monday, telling a federal judge during his sentencing hearing that he was taken advantage of by a girl from the Philippines.

"To keep calling these women victims — I didn't have any victims, your honor," Deverso said before U.S. District Judge John E. Steele sentenced him to 16 years behind bars. "I didn't write to them. They wrote to me."

Deverso, 59 and of Cape Coral, was convicted on May 19 in the high-profile case. He was accused of keeping child porn on his home computer from May 11, 2002, through April 15, 2005. He also was charged with transporting child pornography in October 2004, and manufacturing it while he vacationed in the Philippines. Deverso photographed underage girls he met online through Asian dating Web sites, one victim and investigators testified in spring during his weeklong trial.

Prosecutors said Deverso chatted with numerous women online, proposing marriage to them. Deverso remains married to his third wife, Zong Yu Deverso, whom he met on a Chinese brides Web site. Deverso countered that he never promised these others marriage, just that it was possible if they got along well.

Based on federal sentencing guidelines, Steele had to sentence Deverso to a minimum of 15 years in prison. He could have been sentenced to 20 years.

"What kind of person flies around the world to take advantage of poor and desperate women?" Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney Doug Molloy asked. "One who deserves the maximum penalty of incarceration this court can impose."

Deverso never has shown remorse for the crimes, he said, and Deverso didn't care about hurting the women and girls, nor his family.

"Those were children in those pictures," Molloy said. "That was a young lady that man defiled."

Deverso lashed back against Molloy, saying he didn't know why the region's top federal prosecutor was treating him like that.

Deverso maintained he did nothing illegal. The girl had to be at least 18 years old to participate in the Asian dating Web sites. She told Deverso she was 18 when they met, Deverso said, and he bought her a 19th birthday present in November 2004, one month after they first met in the Philippines.

Deverso has been held in the Lee and Hendry county jails since his arrest in April 2005.

One girl, now 19 years old, testified in May during Deverso's trial that he had sex with her and took graphic naked pictures of her. Deverso was not charged with rape.

Wracked with sobs, the girl — who the Daily News is not naming because of the nature of the charges — fled from the courtroom twice during the trial. Deverso's defense attorney, John Bergendahl, asked for a mistrial at the time, and Monday in court said Steele should have declared one.

During the almost 2½ hour sentencing hearing, Steele said he still wouldn't grant a mistrial.

The girl testified she told Deverso she was 17. She turned 18 less than one month after his first visit with her in October 2004. He referred to her as his fiancee, investigators said.

"I did not take advantage of (the girl)," Deverso said. "I helped her."

He bought her clothes, furniture, an apartment to live in with friends and tried to make her life better, he added.

"The first time we met we did not have sex," he said, adding that they decided to wait until he gained her father's approval. "How could I knowingly take those pictures of a minor when she lied about her age?" Deverso asked.

His niece, Linda Rachoza, told Steele her uncle was a good man. The girl should take some of the blame, she added.

"She should have held some accountability for what she did wrong," Rachoza told the Daily News after the sentencing.

Prosecutors contend Deverso recorded himself having sex with underage Asian girls. Deverso said investigators didn't show any of the photos he took with the girl's family on vacation, including of them "jet-skiing."

He was considering retiring to the Philippines, where he could buy land and a home much more cheaply, Deverso said.

Bergendahl vowed to appeal the conviction and sentence, saying the mandatory 15-year term amounts to cruel and unusual punishment, a violation of the Eighth Amendment. After the hearing he said he "strongly disagrees with the applicability of the 15-year" required minimum sentence.

He argued that Deverso shouldn't be sentenced to a stiffer penalty because the girl "contributed to the offense," Deverso is older and he suffers from a variety of medical problems, such as back pain and a hernia.

Bergendahl late last week asked Steele's permission to withdraw from the case. He asked again Monday, saying their relationship had deteriorated. He said Deverso's family wanted to hire a California defense lawyer, but Steele rejected both requests, saying that lawyer isn't licensed to work in Florida.

"We believe Mr. Deverso creates conflict to delay even more," Molloy said.

Deverso and his wife, nicknamed Ming-Mei, since have reconciled. She received her green card in February 2005. She asked Monday for her husband to come home.

"I know him," she said in halting English. "I sleep with him before. No monster."

Deverso said he also wanted one of the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents who worked on the case, Keith Cramsey, to be investigated. He accused Cramsey of lying and illegally obtaining evidence. Prosecutors stood behind Cramsey's work.

"I'm not happy," Deverso told Steele before being led away by U.S. marshals. "I just don't know how I can be lied to and lied about. I'm not gonna survive prison, your honor. I know that, you know that, and now my family knows that. Welcome to paradise."

Masilotti Charged (PALMBEACHP)

By Tom Dubocq, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), October 31, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH — Former Palm Beach County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti faces up to five years in prison and forfeiture of $9.5'million in cash and real estate for his leading role in a land deal conspiracy that stretched from 2000 to this past June, federal prosecutors said Monday.

Masilotti, who in a sorrowful resignation letter said he will plead guilty, is expected to surrender Friday at the federal courthouse in Fort Pierce, where he will appear for the first time before a judge. Still to be determined: when Masilotti formally will plead guilty and when he'll be dispatched to prison.

The grand jury investigation of Tony Masilotti was triggered by a series of stories in The Palm Beach Post this year documenting how the county commission chairman's family secretly profited from land deals that Masilotti had pushed.

The Post's investigation, launched in January, involved the review of thousands of documents from 16 government agencies in four counties in Florida and Illinois as well as dozens of interviews. It began with records of Masilotti's recent divorce, which included financial statements and a document index that identified marital property holdings in the name of an accountant who represented a secret land trust. The trust, it turned out, was involved in a tangled series of transactions that generated a $1.3 million profit for the family.

Feds Charge Masilotti With Conspiracy, Allege He Made Millions On Secret Land Deals (FLSUNSEN)

By Josh Hafenbrack & Peter Franceschina, Sun-sentinel.com

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 31, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH -- Federal authorities on Monday formally charged former Palm Beach County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti with conspiracy to commit fraud by making millions from three secret land deals.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in West Palm Beach said it would seek to fine Masilotti $250,000, put him in prison for a maximum of 5 years and request the forfeiture of millions of dollars in assets.

In a 35-page list of charges, the U.S. Attorney cited Masilotti's land deals in Martin County, Brevard County and Palm Beach County.

In one Palm Beach County deal, Masilotti is accused of receiving between $40,000 and $50,000 for his assistance in helping a developer solve traffic problems concerning land the Diocese of Palm Beach County was selling in the town of Royal Palm Beach.

In another deal, Masilotti and family members allegedly got $100,000 in free air travel from a developer who did business with county in purchasing a former public horse riding area near Wellington. The property was bought by a group headed by developer Bruce Rendina, who was only identified by his initials in the charges.

In a Brevard County deal, Masilotti allegedly created a trust called the ARM Family Land Trust. In the deal, Masilotti bought some 60 acres of land for $100,000 and then, while on the commission, voted "to advocate and publicly endorse zoning changes dramatically increasing the value of the land," the charges said. Masilotti then had a part in swapping the land for land in Brevard County worth nearly $8 million, the charges said.

In the Martin County deal, Masilotti and his ex-wife Susan made $1.3 million in a complicated set of secret, land deals that involved land purchases there by the South Florida Water Management District.

Last Friday, Masilotti announced he planned to plead guilty to federal corruption charges, admitting for the first time to wrongdoing and expressing "regret and sorrow."

The chastened county commissioner faxed his five-paragraph resignation, effective immediately, to County Administrator Bob Weisman early Friday morning.

Masilotti, 50, pledged to cooperate with the FBI, Internal Revenue Service and U.S. Attorney's Office, which have been investigating for six months his potential abuse of power and a secret land deal in Martin County, which enriched Masilotti and his ex-wife but was hidden through a secret trust.

"Eventually I will plead guilty," Masilotti wrote.

Former Chief Caillier Sentenced (KATC-TV)

KATC-TV, October 31, 2006

Former Opelousas Police Chief Larry Caillier, who had a stellar career in law enforcement, was sentenced Monday in federal court for filing a false claim. His department was paid for bike patrols that never happened. Before sentencing, his attorneys asked the court to take into account Caillier's accomplishments and untarnished record.

Caillier could have faced up to five years in prison. Instead, U.S. District Judge Richard Haik sentenced him to five years probation, 10 months of house arrest and he must pay restitution to the U.S. Clerk of Court. The FBI determined Caillier owes $26,300. "Without question this was a mistake, a very costly and disastrous mistake - costly to the chief, costly to his family, very costly to the community," says attorney Elbert Guillory.

Caillier's attorneys pleaded for leniency. Attorney Ed Lopez recounted the former chief's career beginning with serving in the U.S. Air Force, Louisiana State Police, then 15 years as chief in Opelousas. "This man has spent 35 years protecting the general public, and he's had an exemplary record," Lopez says. Guillory says, "This situation today, aside, Chief Caillier is still one of the nation's best and most successful law enforcement officers."

In court, Caillier apologized. "I'd like to offer a sincere apology to the United States Of America for incidences that happened on my watch." Elbert Guillory says law enforcement agencies have expressed interest in hiring Caillier as a consultant. He wouldn't say which agencies, but one is in-state and a couple are out-of-state.

Former Chief Gets 10 Months Of House Arrest (OPELDW)

By Jacqueline Cochran

Opelousas Daily World, October 31, 2006

There will be no jail time for the former Opelousas police chief found guilty of a federal charge of filing false claims while in office.

But Larry Caillier will serve five years of probation and 10 months under house arrest, and he's been ordered to pay $26,300 in restitution for his crime. Perhaps more painful for the four-term chief, he'll never be allowed to work in law enforcement again, nor is he allowed to own a gun.

"Your true punishment will not be your going to jail but, as a person, to have to live with this," U.S. District Judge Richard Haik told Caillier during sentencing. "I'm not sure if anything worse could happen to you. Standing here, a convicted felon." The conviction is the first and only found against the former chief, though the state remains poised to proceed with another 26 separate charges - five malfeasance in office charges connected with Caillier allegedly ordering OPD officers not to respond to disturbance calls and several other charges ranging from forgery to money laundering.

Also still facing both federal and state charges in connection with the patrols is former OPD Maj. Ronnie Trahan. Trahan was just charged last week in federal court with aiding and abetting Caillier in the filing of a false claim for reimbursement on the patrols. The state has also charged Trahan with criminal conspiracy, public payroll fraud, six counts of prohibiting splitting of profits, fees and commissions, 10 counts of forgery and money laundering.

Motions made Monday by attorney Elbert Guillory on behalf of Caillier to change court records to reflect Trahan's greater role were systematically rejected by Haik, as each was offered for consideration.

Guillory asked for the court record to read:

the defendant did not participate in creation of three documents and in time became aware of documents created by subordinate.

the defendant at no time authorized or instructed Trahan to make up or adjust time sheets.

the addition of officers names so the maximum $3,000 per month would be paid by the housing authority was done without the knowledge and consent of the defendant.

"I Larry J. Caillier, at this time would like to offer a sincere apology to the United States of America for incidents that happened on my watch as chief of police for the city of Opelousas."

Haik told Caillier that while the measure of the offense was substantial, in all fairness he had to take into consideration "all the good you have done for your country and state in service and community."

His Vietnam War service, his having worked 20 years as a state trooper and his 15 years as police chief all stand as proof of that good, Haik said.

"I feel sorry for you and your family and for putting them through this," Haik said. "You should apologize to all of your family and all of the police officers that served for you, and all of the people you put in jail because now, basically, you have become one of them. And that is something you will never be able to wash away."

Caillier's family sat somberly in the rear of the court. Some with heads down as the judge reprimanded the man who once referred to himself as "the wizard."

"Do you understand?" Haik asked after each condition of sentencing was stated.

Former Opelousas Police Chief Sentenced (BRADV)

By Richard Burgess

Baton Rouge Advocate, October 31, 2006

Former Opelousas Police Chief Larry J. Caillier was sentenced Monday to 10 months of home confinement and ordered to pay $26,300 in restitution for a scheme to win unearned federal grant money.

U.S. District Judge Richard Haik chose not to put the ex-chief behind bars, citing Caillier's record as a military veteran, long-time State Police trooper and leader of the city's Police Department for 15 years.

"You had a tremendous, bright future, which is now not very bright," Haik said.

Caillier declined to comment after the court hearing and made only a brief statement to the judge, apologizing for "an incident that happened on my watch."

Caillier and one of his top officers were accused in a federal investigation that focused on a $225,000 U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development grant for bicycle patrols at public housing projects in Opelousas from 2000 to 2003.

Federal prosecutors allege that Caillier and former Maj. Ronnie Trahan Sr. were involved in a scheme to falsify records to receive grant money for patrols that were never done.

Caillier pleaded guilty earlier this year to a federal false-claims charge but has maintained that he did not orchestrate the scheme.

He admitted only not intervening when he learned Trahan was allegedly falsifying time sheets.

Caillier's attorneys said Monday that the estimated $23,000 to $26,000 the ex-chief was paid under the grant was for legitimate supervisory work.

Charges are pending against Trahan in the case.

Trahan told investigators that Caillier directed him to falsify time sheets to ensure that the Police Department billed $3,000 every two weeks, regardless of whether the money was earned by patrolling officers.

A federal false-claims charge carries a maximum of five years in prison.

Caillier was facing a recommended sentencing range of from six months to 12 months in prison under federal sentencing guidelines, which are based on a person's criminal history and the severity of the crime.

Retrial Sought In Perjury Case (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

Federal prosecutors say they have new evidence against Joann Wiggan, acquitted earlier on four of five charges linked to the Pellicano probe.

Federal authorities announced Monday that they will retry a former phone company employee acquitted last month of four of five charges in the first trial resulting from the wiretapping investigation of indicted private investigator Anthony Pellicano and others.

Citing "compelling" new evidence in the case, Assistant U.S. Atty. Daniel Saunders told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer that the government would again prosecute Joann Wiggan for perjury for allegedly lying to a federal grand jury last October when she said she never retrieved a single message from her voicemail account at work. The jury last month hung on that charge.

Additionally, Saunders said, he expects a superseding indictment with additional charges against Wiggan to be returned in two weeks. She was found not guilty on four other felony counts of lying about her contacts with former co-worker Ray Turner, who is accused of illegally accessing telephone company records for Pellicano and assisting him in his alleged wiretapping. Saunders and co-prosecutor Kevin Lally declined further comment about the alleged new evidence or additional charges.

After the brief hearing, Wiggan's attorney, David Reed, expressed dismay at the government's decision.

"We are troubled and concerned at the timing of this new evidence, which I am unable to talk about at this point," Reed said outside court. "And I will look at whether motions are appropriate to dismiss the superseding indictment prior to trial."

On advice of her attorney, Wiggan did not comment.

Last month, Reed likened Wiggan's acquittal to "David beating Goliath," saying that the divorced mother of three withstood "tremendous pressure" from prosecutors and federal agents to plead guilty to perjury.

Though separate from the larger Pellicano case, the prosecution of Wiggan arose from the same FBI probe of the former private eye and allegations that he and others used a variety of illegal means, including wiretaps, to benefit his clients. He, Turner and other defendants have denied the charges.

During Wiggan's four-day trial, prosecutors produced a 23-page log of phone calls to and from Wiggan's home, office and cellphones between late 1998 and 2002, alleging that the records proved that she was lying when she said she had no contact with Turner and had not begun using her office voicemail until sometime in 2003.

The logs showed more than 1,000 calls from Wiggan's phone numbers to her voicemail, 117 calls from Turner's number to her office voicemail, and other calls between numbers assigned to Turner and Wiggan.

But Wiggan and her attorney attributed her misstatements to forgetfulness or innocent oversights. In addition, Wiggan's ex-husband and eldest son also testified that they had made numerous calls to her office voicemail.

Unlike two other former SBC employees who admitted helping Turner, Wiggan took the stand in her own defense to insist that she had not illegally provided him with information or even spoken to him in years.

Though the nature of the new charges was not disclosed, the government's questioning of Wiggan during the recent trial suggested that the new charges could relate to alleged inconsistencies between statements before the federal grand jury and before the trial court.

Newport Beach Man Sentenced In Fraud Case (OCR)

By Ryan Hammill, The Orange County Register

Orange County Register, October 31, 2006

Illya Bond handed eight years in federal prison for various charges connected to energy investment scam.

The former CEO of a defunct Los Angeles energy company who participated in a fraudulent investment scheme was sentenced to eight years in federal prison at the United States District Court in Los Angeles on Monday.

Illya Bond, 57, of Newport Beach, was also ordered by District Court Judge Percy Anderson to pay over $2.4 million in restitution to victims of fraud involving the PowerSource Corporation, a fraudulent company he formerly helmed.

A federal jury convicted Bond on charges of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud and making a false statement to special agents with the FBI in a January decision.

He is the last in a series of seven defendants with ties to the company to be convicted and the sixth sentenced. A previous defendant died before the penalty phase of his trial.

Bond helped create fraudulent sales materials that were provided to investors prior to the company's collapse.

KCAL-TV, October 31, 2006

(CBS) LOS ANGELES A Newport Beach man who headed a bogus energy company was sentenced Monday to eight years in federal prison for his lead role in an investment con.

Illya Bond, 57, orchestrated the scam, which bilked more than 100 people out of more than $2.4 million, according to prosecutors.

He was chief executive of Los Angeles-based PowerSource Corp., which was formed after California's electricity market was deregulated. Investors from across the country, who were lured via spam e-mail, a Web site and telemarketing calls, paid $10,000 for units in a series of limited liability partnerships that were supposed to finance PowerSource, according to the government.

PowerSource went out of business in 2001 when the scam collapsed, prosecutors said.

Bond, who also used the name Frank Akberry, was convicted in January of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud and lying to FBI agents.

In addition to the prison time, he was ordered to pay more than $2.4 million in restitution.

PowerSource's president, San Marcos resident E. Douglas Mitchell, was convicted of similar charges after a 2004 trial in Florida, but died before he could be sentenced, according to the government.

Three other California men, Ronald W. Johnson of Rancho Santa Margarita, James V. Miles of Bakersfield and Gary Spink of Menifee, and three people from Florida were also convicted in that state. They received sentences ranging from six months to five years in prison, prosecutors said.

Many Sex Offenders Restricted Tonight (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, October 31, 2006

Many sex offenders, limited in where they can live or work, are under another restriction today: no costumes, no candy giving, no jack-o'-lanterns, no welcoming front-porch lights.

Some states go further to protect children on the holiday. At least 10 states keep a special eye on sex offenders via house arrest or required meetings, through such programs as Operation Boo in California and Operation Trick No Treat in Virginia.

In New Mexico, a convicted pedophile or violent sex offender who lives alone has, for the first time this year, a sign outside his door today that notifies the public of his offense, says Tim Olsen, a regional manager of the New Mexico Corrections Department. He says offenders must stay inside and keep outside lights turned off.

“They're on virtual house arrest. They can't answer the door unless there's an emergency,” and police will drive by to check, he says. “We can't expect all parents will be out there. We want to make sure kids are safe on Halloween.”

New Mexico, New Jersey, South Carolina and Tennessee are into their second year of precautions, although Tennessee only recently announced its restrictions after phone calls from anxious parents.

“We wanted the public to know we're taking steps to protect children,” says Jack Elder, spokesman for the Tennessee Board of Probation and Parole.

In Virginia, which began its Halloween program in 2002, high-risk sex offenders on parole or probation must report to offices where they are held for several hours while kids go trick or treating. “We try to make it a meaningful experience” by providing counselors and updates on registration rules, says Jo G. Holland, regional director of the Virginia Department of Corrections.

Some states have had Halloween restrictions for years but are increasing surveillance. New York, which requires offenders to stay home between 3 p.m. and 6 a.m., is making checkup calls and unannounced visits.

Violators can be arrested. Robert Goldman, a former Chicago-area TV sportscaster, got six months in jail for violating his probation by handing out candy last Halloween.

The restrictions generally apply only to people on probation or parole, a fraction of the 566,782 sex offenders registered nationwide. In Tennessee, the Halloween restrictions apply to 2,000 of 8,100 registered offenders, Elder says.

Most sex offenders are under no “meaningful supervision,” and the Halloween rules are a “desperate effort to do something good,” says Grier Weeks, executive director of the National Association to Protect Children, an advocacy group. “It's always good to keep kids from going up the steps of a known sex offender.”

Laura Ahearn welcomes the restrictions. “A candy bar represents an opportunity for a sexual predator to start the process of grooming a child,” says Ahearn, director of Parents for Megan's Law, a child-advocacy group.

Number Of Police Killed, Assaulted Dips (WP/AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The number of police officers nationwide who were killed by criminals while on the job in 2005 dipped slightly from a year earlier, FBI data released Monday show.

An estimated 1,800 fewer cops were assaulted during the same time period _ the lowest total since 2001.

Nearly all of the officers killed _ 55 in 2005, down from 57 in 2004 _ worked for city police departments, according to the FBI's annual report.

All but one of the slain officers were men, who on average were 37 years old with a decade of law enforcement service. More than half of them _ 28 _ were killed in a swath of southern states stretching from Delaware to Texas. Forty-seven of the officers were white; eight were black.

Traffic duty proved to be the most lethal assignment for the officers, the report shows.

Fifteen cops were killed during traffic pursuits or on traffic stops, compared with eight slain while making arrests and another eight who were ambushed. The rest of the killings came while breaking up family quarrels, investigating suspicious activity, transporting prisoners and other duties.

Additionally, 67 officers were accidentally killed on duty last year, down from 82 in 2004.

Another 57,546 police officers were assaulted while on the job in 2005, down from 59,373 in 2004. The largest number of assaults came in the early morning hours, from midnight to 2 a.m., while police were breaking up bar fights, family quarrels and other disturbances.

The FBI's assault data were collected from 10,032 law enforcement agencies nationwide, serving 75 percent of the population.

City Fears Crime Report Fallout (SLPD)

By Jeremy Kohler, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 31, 2006

SUMMARY: Mayor Francis Slay's office struck back Monday at what officials say is a flawed study ranking St. Louis at the top of the nation's large cities in crime.

Here we go again: A publisher in Kansas, using a formula decried by criminologists, says St. Louis is the most dangerous city in the United States. And city officials are fuming.

As the buzz lifted from Sunday's World Series parade, the ranking kept national media focused here. The storyline? St. Louis: First in baseball, first in crime. Detroit finished second in both.

All the attention from the annual safety ranking by Morgan Quitno Press — a publisher of reference books and lists of statistics — had St. Louis officials seeing red — and not of the Cardinals variety.

But bogus or not, Rainford said, there is good reason to worry the ranking could hurt St. Louis.

Nancy Milton, spokeswoman for the St. Louis Convention & Visitors Commission, said she fielded phone calls Monday from convention planners concerned about what they were hearing. She declined to identify them.

"A majority of them say they're going to face questions from their boards of directors and their constituents, and they want to get ahead of those questions," she said. Milton said most seemed to understand that the ranking had little to do with the safety of conventioneers.

"Chicago had 448 murders and St. Louis had a regrettable 131, but I don't think anyone is going to stop going to Chicago," she said.

Morgan Quitno's assessment is based on a given city's rates last year in six crime categories — murder, rape, robbery, aggravated assault, burglary and auto theft — as reported to the FBI. The firm, in Lawrence, Kan., scored cities against national averages in each category and added the scores, weighting each crime the same.

Richard Rosenfeld, a criminologist at the University of Missouri at St. Louis, said Morgan Quitno's methodology is flawed because it compares places like Memphis, which includes miles of outlying areas, to St. Louis, where the city limits barely extend from the urban core.

"Does St. Louis have a crime problem? Yes, sure, it has a crime problem, and every big city has a crime problem. Like every big city, it's worse in some areas than others," he said.

Using the same methodology, the St. Louis area ranked 129th most dangerous out of 344 metro areas, said Morgan Quitno's president, Scott Morgan.

He said such lists are what they are, and he's not surprised this one draws some criticism. "I am stunned if there is a criminologist out there who will support this," he acknowledged.

St. Louis last held the mantle of shame in 2002, but sloughed it off. It finished no higher than fourth in intervening years, and lost this year in a landslide, Morgan said.

A bad finish was not a surprise, as reports of violent crimes surged 20 percent last year to their highest levels in seven years.

On Monday, the city struck back, decrying the timing of the release and the methodology behind the ranking. Morgan Quitno usually releases its study around Thanksgiving.

"I've got to give them credit," Rainford said. "They don't know anything about crime or statistics but they do know something about public relations."

Rainford, a former PR man, blasts Morgan Quitno every fall. (Last year: "worthless"; two years ago: "charlatans".) On Monday, he said City Hall was ratcheting up the city's defense.

To wit, he branded Morgan "this guy who's working in his pajamas and his bare feet in his mother's basement on his PC."

Morgan said he did not purposefully release the report to coincide with the World Series; he said it was released earlier than in other years because his firm received crime data from the FBI earlier.

"I am fine getting fried by people who want to go after this thing and say there is not a problem in St. Louis," he said.

Not that everyone was unhappy. Some 900 miles away, Gwendolyn Faison, mayor of Camden, N.J., told the Associated Press that her day was made.

Her hard-luck community held the mantle the past two years. Without the most dangerous title, "There's a new hope and a new spirit," she said.

St. Louis Mayor Disuptes Crime Ranking (BVND)

By Christopher Leonard

The Belleville News Democrat, October 31, 2006

ST. LOUIS - Mayor Francis Slay makes no bones about it: Morgan Quitno Press is dead wrong to call St. Louis the most dangerous city in the United States.

"It's bogus," Slay said of the group's annual ranking released Monday. "To suggest that St. Louis is more dangerous than Miami, New Orleans, Los Angeles and Chicago - it just doesn't make any sense."

The study placed St. Louis atop the most dangerous list after murders in the city jumped nearly 20 percent between 2004 and 2005.

Slay took issue with the study's methodology. He said the group used population figures from the U.S. Census Bureau that were too low, exaggerating the crime statistics. The city previously challenged the Census Bureau's figures, getting the population estimate bumped up from roughly 330,000 people to 353,000 people.

Scott Morgan, president of Morgan Quitno, said he used a population estimate of 346,000 derived from an FBI report. Changing the figure to 353,000 doesn't change St. Louis's ranking, Morgan said.

Slay also repeated a long-standing criticism of the ranking, which only looks at crime within St. Louis city limits. More than 1 million people live in suburbs outside the city and including them in the study would greatly dilute the overall crime rate, Slay said.

Morgan basically agreed. He said city's like New York City benefit in the rankings because they include higher-income and lower-crime areas like Stanton Island.

But St. Louis still beat out several cities like Philadelphia and Detroit that have a similar population divide, Morgan said.

"St. Louis is not unique in being a core city surrounded by affluent areas that are in a different jurisdictions," he said. The whole purpose of the ranking is to send up a "red flag" for high-crime cities and promote discussion, Morgan said.

Slay acknowledged there are high-crime neighborhoods inside the city that push up the rate of murders and robberies, and he said the city is doing something about it.

City voters passed an increase in business license fees this year that will raise more than $3 million annually for law enforcement programs, Slay said.

DOJ_NMG_0089135

The city is in the process of hiring and training 40 new police officers and launched a program in the prosecutor's office to crack down on career criminals.

Slay said there is simple proof the city isn't as dangerous as Morgan Quitno makes it out to be. The downtown population is steadily increasing as new lofts, restaurants and offices are being built.

"People are coming to the city, they like the city. They feel safe here," Slay said.

KPD Says "most Dangerous Cities" List Flawed (KNOXNS)

By Staff And Wire Reports

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), October 31, 2006

ST. LOUIS -- A surge in violence made St. Louis the most dangerous city in the country, leading a trend of violent crimes rising much faster in the Midwest than in the rest of nation, according to an annual list.

The city has long fared poorly in the rankings of the safest and most dangerous American cities compiled by Morgan Quitno Press. Violent crime surged nearly 20 percent in St. Louis from 2004 to last year, when the rate of such crimes rose most dramatically in the Midwest, according to FBI figures released in June.

"It's just sad the way this city is," resident Sam Dawson said. "On the news you hear killings, someone's been shot."

Knoxville Police Chief Sterling P. Owen IV was not immediately available for comment. KPD spokesman Darrell DeBusk said the study appears flawed as far as Tennessee numbers are concerned.

Law enforcement agencies in Tennessee use a more comprehensive and detailed crime reporting system than that used in most other states.

"It's like comparing apples to oranges," he said. "All Tennessee law enforcement agencies use an incident based reporting system, versus the Uniform Crime Report system that most law enforcement agencies in the county use."

In Tennessee, four separate crimes will be reported if, in a single incident, a house is burglarized, the homeowner stabbed, the house vandalized and the homeowner's car is stolen. "But in the uniform crime report system, all of that is reported as a single crime, the most serious one."

The FBI has recommended the incident based system as more accurate, but only a few states have adopted it so far, DeBusk said.

St. Louis' unwanted top ranking came as the city was still celebrating Friday's World Series victory at the new Busch Stadium. St. Louis has been spending millions of dollars on urban renewal even as the crime rate climbs.

Mayor Francis Slay did not return calls to his office seeking comment Sunday.

Scott Morgan, president of Morgan Quitno Press, a private research and publishing company specializing in state and city reference books, said he was not surprised to see St. Louis top the list, since it has been among the 10 most dangerous cities for years.

The study looks at crime only within St. Louis city limits, with a population of about 330,000, Morgan said. It doesn't take into account the suburbs in St. Louis County, which has roughly 980,000 residents.

Visiting St. Louis on Thursday, FBI director Robert Mueller said it was too early to tell why some types of crime were rising faster in the Midwest.

Mueller said the FBI is working harder to form partnerships with police departments to launch programs like St. Louis' Safe Streets task force, which focuses police efforts on problematic neighborhoods.

The safest city in 2005 was Brick, N.J., with a population about 78,000, followed by Amherst, N.Y., and Mission Viejo, Calif. The second most dangerous city was Detroit, followed by Flint, Mich., and Compton, Calif.

The bad news for St. Louis was good for Camden, N.J., which in 2005 was named the most dangerous city for the second year in a row.

Camden Mayor Gwendolyn Faison said Sunday she was thrilled to learn that her city no longer topped the most-dangerous list.

"You made my day!" said Faison, who has served since 2000. "There's a new hope and a new spirit."

Cities are ranked based on more than just their crime rate, Morgan said. Individual crimes such as rape or burglary are measured separately, compared to national averages and then compiled to give a city its ranking. Crimes are weighted based on their level of danger.

DOJ_NMG_0089136

The national FBI figures released in June showed the murder rate in St. Louis jumped 16 percent from 2004 to 2005, compared with 4.8 percent nationally. The overall violent crime rate increased nearly 20 percent, compared with 2.5 percent nationally.

While crime increased in all regions last year, the 5.7 percent rise in the 12 Midwestern states was at least three times higher than any other region, according to the FBI.

Associated Press writer Rebecca Santana in Trenton, N.J., contributed to this report.

Candidate For Mayor Disputes Louisville's Ranking Among Top 10 'Safest Cities' (WAVE-TV)

By Janelle MacDonald

(LOUISVILLE) -- The annual list of the safest and most dangerous cities in the country was released Monday, and a couple of Kentuckiana cities were on it. Louisville made the list of the 10 safest large cities for the second year in a row. But some say the question of how safe we really are depends on how you look at it. WAVE 3's Janelle MacDonald investigates.

A company called Morgan Quitno has compiled the list for the past 13 years, using FBI crime statistics on murder, rape, robbery, aggravated assault, burglary and motor vehicle theft. This year Louisville comes in at number eight.

But like so many things right now, the ranking has turned in to a political issue, with some saying it proves crime fighting efforts are working here, and others saying just the opposite.

Just how safe do you feel in the city of Louisville? If you believe the latest rankings, you should feel pretty good, with Louisville at number eight, just behind other large cities like San Antonio, Texas and San Diego, California.

Shortly after visiting with school children Monday morning, Louisville Mayor Jerry Abramson said the ranking is proof things are working here in the River City.

"The fact that we've been able to hold our own in the top 10 once again, I think says a lot about the police department, says a lot about Chief White and his leadership, and it also says a lot about the citizens that are joined with us in our community policing effort."

But this being political season, obviously, there may be some different opinions.

Councilman Kelly Downard has made crime a major part of his own campaign for mayor and he disagrees with the Louisville's ranking, calling it a "fluke."

"We do not have a safe city," Downard said. "When we have children being killed on Cherokee Road, and Buechel and in Victory Park -- in the same week, three people murdered -- we've got a problem."

Downard says another list put out by the same company tells a different story. That list ranks Louisville 185th out of 344 in metropolitan areas.

Downard says Louisville's inclusion in the other "large cities" list is misleading because it includes areas formerly a part of Jefferson County.

"What they did was, they added the entire county, where there is less crime, and said therefore we have less crime in our city because we've added 400,000 people and not many more crimes."

Mayor Abramson doesn't see it that way. "When you look at cities like Indianapolis that have had significant problems, Nashville has had significant problems, when you look at the cities that have consolidated, you know we really show up well when you talk about a city of 700,000 people."

Downard says Louisville is included in a category with notoriously rough major cities like Detroit and New York City, and points out, the metro comes in behind the Big Apple on the current ranking.

He says Louisville should compare itself to its past history, and says if you do that, crime has risen every year since the merger. But the mayor says major violent crimes like murder and robberies are down overall.

A couple of Kentuckiana cities also made the safest lists. Elizabethtown came in at number 17 on the list of overall safest metropolitan areas. That city became a metro area with the 2000 census.

Columbus, Indiana, just north of Seymour, is number 11 on that same list, just six spots ahead of E'Town.

WLNS-TV, October 31, 2006

It's a list no city wants to top, a list of the most-dangerous cities in the United States. A new list is out and Saint Louis tops the list of most-dangerous cities. Two Michigan cities follow- Detroit at #2 and Flint ranks third. Lansing ranks as the 96th most-dangerous city.

DOJ_NMG_0089137

The new list gives the perception Lansing isn't that safe, but the Lansing Police Department says their numbers tell a different story. An independent research company put together the latest list of most-dangerous cities. The company based their rankings on FBI crime numbers in six categories- murder, rape, robbery, aggravated assault, burglary and motor vehicle theft.

According to the company's method, Lansing comes in as the 96th most-dangerous city in the country, and the third most-dangerous city in the state.

Lt. Bruce Ferguson: "We don't agree with their numbers."

The Lansing Police Department says the company omitted many other crimes for its list, like arson or drug arrests. Therefore, the department doesn't believe the numbers give an accurate picture.

Lt. Bruce Ferguson: "Homicides in the past several years have decreased, motor vehicle thefts, we have seen a steady decrease in crime in Lansing in the past decade."

While all crime can't be prevented, Ferguson adds the city has actively tried to keep the crime numbers low.

Lt. Bruce Ferguson: "Working with our neighborhoods, doing neighborhood watches, the whole community policing idea."

Ferguson says there's always room for improvement. He says the Lansing Police Department is always trying to find new programs targeting areas, like domestic violence, where the department sees the most problems.

WSOC-TV, October 31, 2006

CHARLOTTE, N.C. -- Charlotte has been named one of the most dangerous big cities in the country, but police say the ranking is wrong.

The national research firm out of Kansas that compiled Crime In The United States ranked the Queen City the eighth most dangerous city in the United States with a population above 500,000.

Morgan Quitno Press used Federal Bureau of Investigation numbers to determine how safe the cities are. Charlotte-Mecklenburg police, however, say the group shouldn't compare cities using that method, and it's misleading.

"The extent to which we enjoy a safe community depends on everybody in the community accepting some responsibility for helping deal with the environment and the situations that help create crime," said Charlotte-Mecklenburg Police Department Chief Darrel Stephens.

He also said not all of the FBI numbers are used in the ranking, so the data is selective.

The CMPD is constantly working to make the city safer though. After a hike in robberies and homicides last year, the department formed the Street Crimes Task Force to focus on the city's crime hotspots and has already seen a reduction in those kinds of crimes.

The change has people in Charlotte feeling pretty safe. People who spoke with Eyewitness News said they were surprised to hear where the study placed the Queen City.

"I think the safety thing is just scary, that we can't come to the park and not feel like we're comfortable and our children can run around without us having all eyes or ears on them," said mother Alli Murr.

Parent Angela Lamkin agreed.

"It is a little bit concerning, especially being a mom with a young child," she said. "I guess we just pick the safest places we can be."

The CMPD also said that violent crime is down this year, which should help the city in next year's rankings.

According to the study, Brick, N.J., is America's safest city and St. Louis, Mo., is the United States' most dangerous city.

In The Most Secure Town, A Most Pleasant Afterglow (NSL)

By Maryann Spoto, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), October 31, 2006

The day after it was named the safest place in the nation, Brick Township was soaking up the good press.

Residents flagged down police officers to praise them for their hard work, and neighbors, friends and business people congratulated themselves on their good fortune.

"Did you hear?" Chris Diedrich, a fitness instructor, asked her morning step class at Brick Fitness for Women. "It's all over the news. Brick is the safest city in the country."

But some were more than a little suspicious. After all, wasn't the Ocean County municipality located near some pretty nice little Jersey Shore towns that seem synonymous with safe?

DOJ_NMG_0089138

"It's a great title to have, but I want the people of Brick Township to know that it's not because crime doesn't occur," said Scott Pezarras, Brick's acting business administrator, sounding a bit cautionary on a day City Hall was brimming with smiles.

So was the honor bestowed on Brick Township a sign the burgeoning bedroom community is a bit of utopia in a densely packed Northeast? Or was it more statistical anomaly?

Turns out it's a bit of both.

The survey in question, an analysis of FBI crime statistics by a Kansas publishing concern that tends to attract huge national press each year, does have a few quirks. Most notable in the case of Brick Township is the fact that the company, Morgan Quitno Press, looks only at municipalities of 75,000 people or more.

Brick Township is on the low side of that cutoff with an estimated population of 80,000. It joined only 11 other communities in the state in the study. In other words, 554 of New Jersey's 566 towns were excluded.

Scott Morgan, who heads Morgan Quitno, publisher of the book City Crime Rankings, said there is nothing wrong with that.

"Most people will accept these are the towns that they have heard about nationwide, and they want to know about," Morgan said.

The survey considers just 371 communities in the country. In New Jersey, Brick was up against mostly gritty cities like Newark, Camden, Paterson, Trenton and other places where extreme poverty and street crime have long gone hand in hand. Most of those places had the dubious distinction of winding up on the other end of the safe-cities ranking.

A few New Jersey places included in the study pool were similarly large suburbs -- Dover Township and Edison -- and they, too, fared very well nationally, 14th and 23rd, respectively.

That is because New Jersey's large suburbs and large cities are very different places, according to demographers who know the state well. They noted it is difficult to make meaningful comparisons of places that are so different.

Take Camden, for example, which is often listed as the most dangerous city in the nation in the study, but improved its standing by five notches this year.

Last year, the median income in Camden was $26,171, compared with $59,752 in Brick. The 2000 Census showed 83 percent of Brick's residents owned their homes, versus 46 percent in Camden.

"There has never been an easy way to make a comprehensive measure so that we can rank municipalities, no matter what it is," said James Hughes, a Rutgers University demographer. "There are always some nuances and codicils to what it is."

Hughes also said the size of the survey takes nothing away from Brick or its relative safety.

The No. 1 ranking for the township, which last year placed second in the national study, was cause for municipal joy.

"It's nice," he said of the honor. "It helps (the officers) do their job better."

Brick Township Council vice president Stephen Acropolis, head of the town's public safety committee, said he realizes the scope of the study was somewhat thin. But he said the police department still deserves credit for its work.

"We know we've had a great police department for years," he said. "It's just nice to get the national recognition."

Acropolis said he was bombarded with comments about the ranking from residents yesterday while he coached high school ice hockey.

"People know about it. They're very aware of it. Even when we were second-safest, they talked about it a lot," he said.

Kathy Botticelli, who has lived in town for three decades, said a friend e-mailed her a story about the ranking early yesterday morning.

"I'm just proud to be in a town that wants safety for everybody," Botticelli said as she stood outside the municipal building after paying her taxes.

Resident Margaret Roush said she feels safe in town as she stood in Windward Beach Park, watching her 2-year-old son Danny play on the jungle gym.

"It's a family community," Roush said. "I don't think it draws a lot of heavy crime. Between the families and the elderly, it's not that big a draw for crime."

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court Case: Are Jury Awards Too High? (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON

Jesse Williams smoked two packs of cigarettes a day for 45 years. Following his death in 1997 after being diagnosed with lung cancer, his wife, Mayola, sued the Philip Morris tobacco company seeking $100 million in punitive damages.

The Oregon jury that heard her case rejected the $100 million request. Instead, it awarded her $79.5 million.

Tuesday, the case arrives at the US Supreme Court where lawyers for Philip Morris are asking the justices to strike down the punitive damage award as constitutionally excessive and fundamentally unfair. The case, Philip Morris v. Mayola Williams, is being closely watched to see whether a majority of justices are willing to issue strict guidelines to identify when a punitive damage award is unconstitutionally excessive.

Lawyers for Philip Morris say the judge in the case allowed the jury to punish the tobacco company for alleged harms done to other smokers in Oregon beyond the specific harm suffered by Mr. Williams and his family.

They also argue that the $79.5 million award violates "guideposts" set by the Supreme Court in earlier cases barring punitive damage verdicts that are out of proportion to the harm done.

Lawyers for Ms. Williams counter that Philip Morris engaged in a massive and deadly fraud by pushing an addictive product on the public while concealing information it knew about the unhealthful effects of smoking.

Instead of supporting a government health campaign against smoking in the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s, the tobacco company cast doubt on research showing the deadly effects of smoking. The lawyers say Philip Morris launched a deceptive public campaign to offer a crutch and an excuse to its addicted customers so they would keep using their product. Under these circumstances, the lawyers say, the $79.5 million award is appropriate rather than excessive.

"Where a fraud is as monstrous as this one was in its willingness to put lives at risk for profit, strong medicine is required," writes Robert Peck, a Williams lawyer, in his brief. High Court has limited punitive damages

In recent years, the Supreme Court has moved toward limiting large punitive damage awards by establishing a three-part test. But the champion of that approach, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, has retired from the court and it is unclear how the newest members of the court, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, will view the issue.

In addition, some state courts have declined to strictly apply the high court's three-part test and have allowed large punitive damages.

"What is really at stake fundamentally is the Supreme Court's holdings on whether there is an outer limit to punitive damages," says Sherman Joyce of the American Tort Reform Association in Washington. "It seemed to us that the Oregon courts had not been faithful to the Supreme Court's holdings."

Trial lawyers and their supporters argue that the high court never completely closed the door on large punitive damage awards in cases involving extraordinarily reprehensible conduct. In such cases, they say, the size of punitive damage awards should be up to juries and to state lawmakers, rather than Supreme Court justices.

"Punitive damages throughout the history of our country have been a matter relegated to the states," says Edward Sweda of the Tobacco Control Resource Center at Northeastern University School of Law in Boston. "If Oregonians thought that punitive damage awards were too high, they could go to their lawmakers to enact a cap, but they have chosen not to do so." Jury told to consider other injured smokers

In the Williams case in Oregon, a lawyer for Williams urged the jury to consider not only how the tobacco company had injured his client but how other smokers in Oregon had been injured as well. The lawyer raised the issue in his closing argument even though the jury had heard no evidence concerning other Oregon smokers.

"When you determine the amount of money to award in punitive damages against Philip Morris ... it's fair to think about how many other Jesse Williams[es] in the last 40 years in the State of Oregon there have been," the lawyer said. "It's more than fair to think about how many more are out there in the future."

Philip Morris lawyers asked the judge to issue a special instruction to the jurors before their deliberations to make sure the panel didn't punish the company for hypothetical injuries allegedly suffered by other Oregon smokers - or potential injuries yet to be suffered by smokers in the future.

The judge refused. The $79.5 million punitive damage award was cut in half on appeal, but later reinstated. Ultimately, it was upheld by the Oregon Supreme Court.

Philip Morris attorney Andrew Frey says there is no historical precedent supporting the Oregon punitive damage award. "Only three years ago, this court held that a defendant cannot be punished in an individual action for harms to persons other than the plaintiff," he writes in his US Supreme Court brief.

Lawyers for Williams say the references to other Oregon smokers were intended to help jurors quantify the magnitude of the offense, not calculate individual punishments. "Philip Morris conflates consideration of total harm within Oregon and the enormity of the offense with punishment for the thousands of Oregonians also defrauded. The two are not the same," Mr. Peck writes in his brief.

In earlier decisions, the Supreme Court ruled that a judge assessing punitive damage awards must consider three factors before deciding whether the award should be struck down as excessive.

The three so-called guideposts are: the reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct, the ratio between the amount of compensatory damages awarded and the punitive damage award, and the difference between the punitive damage award and other civil or criminal sanctions that could be imposed for similar misconduct.

The courts in Oregon concluded that Philip Morris's conduct was so reprehensible that it outweighed the two other factors.

Under the ratio guidepost, the high court has suggested that most punitive damage awards should fall within a single-digit ratio of compensatory damages. In contrast, the ratio in the Philip Morris case is 97:1.

The last time the Supreme Court addressed the punitive damage issue in 2003, it left the door open for larger ratios in instances of "particularly egregious" conduct.

"Because there are no rigid benchmarks," Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote for the majority in a case called State Farm v. Campbell, these larger ratios may be acceptable "where a particularly egregious act has resulted in only a small amount of economic damages."

In the wake of that decision, several state courts have allowed sizable punitive damage awards, and some analysts suggest that those courts haven't been faithful to the Supreme Court's holding. Now the question is whether the court will close the door it left open in the State Farm case, or throw it wide open and allow state lawmakers and individual juries to decide how large is too large for punitive damage awards.

High Court To Hear Tobacco Firm's Appeal (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Jesse Williams, according to his widow, never gave any credence to the surgeon general's health warnings about smoking cigarettes.

When Williams contracted inoperable lung cancer after smoking two packs a day for 45 years, he told his wife: "Those darn cigarette people finally did it. They were lying all the time."

Nine years after Williams' death, the Supreme Court is considering this question: Can Williams' widow collect $79.5 million in punitive damages for fraud from the cigarette company Philip Morris USA?

To the dismay of anti-smoking groups, the Supreme Court agreed to hear the company's appeal of a jury verdict in Oregon.

Philip Morris, the maker of Marlboros, is struggling to turn back unfavorable rulings by Oregon state courts in the Williams case. One ruling upheld the jury award after the Supreme Court sent the case back to Oregon once before to make sure it conformed to a 2003 high court opinion limiting punitive damages.

Gary Lawrence, convicted of beating his wife's lover to death with a pipe and baseball bat then setting the body on fire, is asking the Supreme Court to allow the appeal of his sentence to proceed despite a lower-court ruling that he missed a deadline. Among Lawrence's arguments is that his lawyer, supervised by Florida courts, was responsible for timely legal filings.

In the case over punitive damages, the Williams family is counting on justices to find that Philip Morris' conduct was so reprehensible that it justifies exceeding guidelines the court has laid out in two rulings in the past 10 years that struck down large awards.

One difference is that the earlier cases did not involve physical injuries.

The company doesn't deny making public statements rejecting a link between smoking and cancer; rather, it says there's no evidence Williams ever heard the statements or ever read them.

The court also will be looking at the decision of the state courts that declared it acceptable for the jury in the Williams case to consider harm by Philip Morris to other smokers for conduct similar to that which allegedly injured Williams.

Three years ago, the U.S. Supreme Court said in a different case that a defendant cannot be punished in an individual lawsuit for harm to people other than the plaintiff.

The cigarette company says the approach of the Oregon courts is collective punishment in an individual action, a violation of due process. Philip Morris complained that the nonparties in the case were never identified, their individual circumstances were not presented in court, and there was no way for a defendant to respond to allegations of widespread harm.

The jury awarded Williams' widow, Mayola, $800,000, in actual damages, a ratio of 97 to one. Justice Anthony Kennedy said three years ago that the ratio of punitive to compensatory damages rarely should be higher than nine to one.

The company says that under long-established practice, when compensatory damages are substantial, the constitutional maximum punishment is between zero and four times the amount of compensatory damages.

DOJ_NMG_0089141

The cases are Philip Morris USA v. Williams, 05-1256, and Lawrence v. Florida, 05-8820.

Assessing The Damages (NYT)

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

The Supreme Court has been struggling to address the thorny question of when, if ever, punitive damages become so large that they violate the Constitution. The court made a good start when it laid down guidelines on when punitive damages are excessive. But eventually, it went too far. Today, it hears arguments in a case that offers a perfect opportunity to pull back to a more reasonable position.

The case involves Philip Morris's challenge to damages awarded to the widow of a smoker who died of lung cancer. An Oregon jury awarded Jesse Williams's widow, Mayola Williams, more than $821,000 in actual damages, and $79.5 million in punitive damages. Mrs. Williams said Philip Morris had engaged in 40 years of publicity to undercut concerns about cigarettes, even though it knew for most or all of that time that smoking was deadly.

The Oregon Supreme Court upheld the punitive damages award. The court said the conduct that Philip Morris was charged with "would have kept many Oregonians smoking past the point when they would otherwise have quit." It said the company's "deceit thus would, naturally and inevitably, lead to significant injury or death."

The Supreme Court has already indicated that at some point punitive damages become so large that they violate due process. But it has done a poor job of identifying that point. Originally, it laid down some reasonable factors for lower courts to consider, including how reprehensible they considered the defendant's conduct. But in 2003, the court put forth the dubious proposition that punitive damages should generally be in a "single digit" ratio to actual damages — so with actual damages of, say, $100,000, punitive damages should be under $1 million.

Constitutional principles can seldom be boiled down to a formula, and it is difficult to see why the court should rein in juries so tightly. The purpose of punitive damages is, the Supreme Court has noted, "punishing unlawful conduct and deterring its repetition." In cases of extremely bad conduct, particularly when a defendant is large and willful, a bigger award may be necessary. In this case, $79.5 million does not strike us as unreasonable. Nor do we see any basis for holding that this jury verdict, affirmed in a thoughtful decision by Oregon's highest court, is a denial of Philip Morris's due process rights.

A final problem with the Supreme Court's rule of thumb on punitive damages is that it has been far less restrictive when it comes to punishing people. In 2003, the court held that California did not violate the ban on cruel and unusual punishment when it sentenced a man under its three-strikes law to 50 years for a theft of $153.53 worth of videotapes. That is a far more disproportionate punishment than Philip Morris got, for far less offensive conduct.

By Brett Barrouquere, Associated Press

AP, October 31, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - Kentucky can continue to enforce laws requiring small cigarette companies to make payments to help cover smoking-related health costs, a federal appeals court ruled Monday.

The ruling means the state can continue collecting escrow payments from small cigarette companies that did not participate in the 1998 master settlement agreement between tobacco companies and 52 states and U.S. territories. Attorneys said it was the first ruling by a federal appeals court addressing the issue of whether states can force smaller companies to make the payments.

The landmark agreement in 1998 required payments to be made over 25 years and settled all of the state's lawsuits over the public costs of treating sick smokers. More than 30 states passed laws requiring nonparticipating cigarette-makers to make escrow payments.

A three-judge panel from the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati turned away a challenge from three companies that said Kentucky laws effectively barred the businesses from selling tobacco in the state.

Chicago-based Tritent International Corp.; DWI, LLC; and Cibahia Tabacos Especias, a Brazilian company, each of which imports discount cigarettes, filed the lawsuit. A federal judge in Frankfort rejected the companies' claims in September 2005, prompting the appeal.

The three tobacco companies had argued that Kentucky's laws were pre-empted by the federal Sherman Antitrust Act, which is aimed at preventing monopolies.

Kentucky's laws require companies that didn't take part in the master settlement agreement to place funds into an escrow account. The amount to be paid is based on their cigarette sales in Kentucky. The money is held for 25 years to cover any future medical costs resulting from those companies' tobacco products.

DOJ_NMG_0089142

The state keeps a list of which companies make the payments. Any company not on the list is barred from selling cigarettes in the state.

Because Kentucky's laws treat every cigarette the same, whether or not it took part in the master settlement and every seller is required to pay the same amount of money per pack sold, the federal antitrust act doesn't pre-empt the state law, the appeals court ruled.

"They simply require that all tobacco companies - whether or not they choose to join the MSA - make payments to the state or face blacklisting from the Kentucky market," Judge Ronald Gilman wrote for the panel.

The companies also claimed the laws created an illegal cartel made up of the states and the tobacco industry.

Michael Plumey, an assistant Attorney General in Kentucky who worked on the case, said the cartel allegation "sounds really bad," but the ruling should help put that issue to rest.

"This decision strongly rejects that idea," Plumey said. "There was no anticompetitive cartel created by these statutes."

Four other appeals courts - the New York-based 2nd Circuit, the St. Louis-based 8th Circuit, the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit and the 10th Circuit in Denver - are currently considering similar challenges.

Plumey said the decision isn't binding with the other appeals courts, although it could be filed there as part of the cases in an effort to affect the outcome.

"It could have a persuasive effect," Plumey said. "We hope that it will."

Tenet Selling Infamous Hospital (MEMBIZ)

Memphis Business Journal, October 31, 2006

The hospital that helped launch Tenet Healthcare Corp. on a painful four-year odyssey with the Department of Justice now has a new owner.

Tenet announced late Friday that it had reached an agreement with a physician-owned company to take over the 306-bed Alvarado Hospital Medical Center in San Diego. The new owner, Plymouth Health, will pay $36.5 million for Alvarado, with the money going into Tenet general funds. The sale is expected to be completed by Dec. 31.

Alvarado came under scrutiny four years ago when the Justice Department looked into the hospital's physician recruitment efforts, including the payment of some physician relocation expenses. The law is vague on the subject and two California juries were unable to reach a verdict in a case that was filed in 2003.

Tenet agreed to sell Alvarado as part of a deal to drop the case.

Dallas-based Tenet (NYSE: THC) operates acute care hospitals in 13 states, including 519-bed Saint Francis Hospital in East Memphis and 100-bed Saint Francis-Bartlett.

Tenet has sold other properties, including some in Florida and Louisiana, in a company-wide effort to become smaller and more focused.

Arrests Made In Smuggling Probe In Ariz. (AP)

By ARTHUR H. ROTSTEIN, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 31, 2006

TUCSON, Ariz. — More than 40 people were arrested Monday in connection with a family-run smuggling ring that brought hundreds of illegal immigrants into the country, officials said.

The 44 arrests came after a two-year investigation into the ring, which operated out of the southern Arizona town of Bowie, officials said. Many of those arrested are American citizens, officials said. Eleven more suspects, including at least five Mexican nationals, remained at large Monday.

The ring recruited young women to smuggle migrants' infants through ports of entry, posing as their mothers, while the parents were smuggled through the desert separately, said John Lewis, the FBI special agent in charge in Arizona.

The operation smuggled people from Mexico into the U.S. for more than 10 years — most from Mexico, but also from El Salvador and the Dominican Republic, Lewis said.

"This network organized, housed, fed, guided and transported large numbers of illegal aliens across the border," said Paul K. Charlton, U.S. attorney for Arizona.

The suspects were named in an indictment this month. They included the suspected ring leader, Pablo Esteban Juarez, 31; his wife, Lori Gutierrez Juarez, 30; guides who walked people across the border; drivers who transported illegal immigrants; and "money runners" who picked up smuggling fees.

DOJ_NMG_0089143

Officials said each migrant was charged between $500 and $800 to be smuggled from Agua Prieta, Mexico, to Bowie, about 83 miles east of Tucson. They would be charged more — typically around $2,000, and sometimes even higher — to be moved from Bowie to their destination.

People paid the ring more than $500,000 in the past four years, Lewis said.

The indictment charged that members of the ring were involved in a conspiracy to transport and harbor illegal immigrants and to launder money for profit.

There were no telephone listings for the Juarezes in Bowie. It was not immediately known whether they had lawyers or whether they were American citizens.

44 Seized In Migrant Smuggling Syndicate (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, October 31, 2006

More than 150 federal agents, sheriff's deputies and police officers swarmed over the tiny southern Arizona town of Bowie on Monday, cracking down on a family-owned syndicate suspected of smuggling thousands of illegal immigrants into the United States.

By day's end, at least 44 suspects had been arrested on criminal counts of conspiracy and money laundering. Fifty-five defendants are listed in a 728-count federal grand-jury indictment.

Although the so-called Juarez Alien Smuggling Organization is based in Bowie, federal agents also made arrests in nearby Willcox and in New Mexico, California, Minnesota and Ohio.

advertisement

"This is not just a couple of coyotes," said Deb McCarley, an FBI spokeswoman. "This was the entire organization from top to bottom that we took down."

The bust came on the same day the Border Patrol announced that arrests along the U.S.-Mexican border were down 8.5 percent in fiscal 2006 from the year before. Officials attributed the decline to tougher enforcement.

According to the indictment, Pablo Esteban "Stevie" Juarez, 31, of Bowie, oversaw a highly organized gang that had been in existence for at least 10 years. The U.S. Attorney's Office also identified his wife, Lori Juarez, 30, as a leader. Officials believe Pablo inherited the gang from his father, Marcos Ruiz Juarez, and his brother, Marcos Abel Juarez. All three also were indicted.

"This was not just any family business," said Paul Charlton, U.S. attorney for Arizona, adding that the ring transformed Bowie into "a major staging area for the movement of illegal aliens to the Phoenix hub."

Undocumented immigrants were assembled south of the border and guided into Arizona or New Mexico before being driven to drophouses in Bowie, about 80 miles east of Tucson on Interstate 10.

Immigrants paid up to $2,000 to the coyotes, and the indictment lists more than 700 Western Union money wires as smuggling fees. Those funds were sent to Bowie from all across the nation.

"This affects every state in the United States, not just Arizona," McCarley said.

Bowie, an unincorporated community in Cochise County, is barely more than a roadside stop with a burger stand and gas station surrounded by pecan and pistachio groves.

The extended Juarez family accounts for a significant portion of Bowie's population of about 700. Bruce E. Brown, the local school superintendent, said there are 110 students in the community, and many saw parents or relatives taken away in handcuffs Monday. Brown said administrators spent the afternoon finding relatives to take children who no longer had adult supervision at home.

"It probably affected a third of my kids," he said. "We had a lot of children that were pretty upset today."

McCarley said the case was developed with intelligence gathered by the Cochise County Sheriff's Office and the Border Patrol. Those agencies were joined by the FBI, Immigration and Customs Enforcement and Willcox police in a two-year investigation of the syndicate, which used a motel and two houses to warehouse immigrants.

Forty-five weapons were seized. Investigators said the smugglers used guns to protect themselves and to intimidate illegal immigrants.

McCarley said some gang members were paid to bring undocumented immigrant babies through vehicle checkpoints along the border, posing as parents, while the real mother and father were smuggled into the country. In some instances, the infants were drugged to ensure they would not make a fuss.

McCarley said the family also charged competing coyotes a "tax" to use smuggling routes in the area.

The suspects made initial appearances Monday in U.S. District Court in Tucson. Each is charged with conspiracy, which carries a maximum prison sentence of 10 years. The majority of suspects also were indicted on charges of money laundering, which also has a 10-year maximum sentence.

Attention, Voters: Have Your ID Ready In Many States, New Rules On Identification At The Polls Spark Confusion, Controversy By CHRISTOPHER CONKEY (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

May I see your ID?

Americans are used to hearing that question at airports and in bars, but on this Election Day many will also hear it when they go to the polls.

That's because nearly half of the states have passed laws -- many since widely publicized irregularities in the 2000 presidential race in Florida -- requiring voters to prove their identity before they're allowed to cast a ballot. It sounds like a simple plan, but these laws are sparking confusion, partisan rancor and a frenzy of legal challenges in the days leading up to the midterm election. Luckily for voters, they have to know the current rules only in their own state. And any voter in any state is entitled to cast a provisional ballot if he or she encounters a problem at the polling place. States do, however, vary on how they determine whether a provisional ballot is later counted and how long a voter has to come back and prove his identity.

In Arizona, a proposition passed in 2004 requiring residents to show ID was struck down this month by a federal court only to be reinstated by the U.S. Supreme Court. Arizona Secretary of State Jan Brewer said the lower-court ruling stirred "a lot of questions, confusion and anger," and that poll workers are now being retrained to apply the law. Linda Brown, executive director of the Arizona Advocacy Network, says she spent primary day last month outside a polling station talking to frustrated voters who weren't allowed to cast provisional ballots for lack of proper ID.

"The most disturbing thing we witnessed were poll workers who were ill-informed and making it up as they went along," Ms. Brown says.

In Georgia, a state judge in September overturned a new law requiring every voter to show a photo ID at the polls. The ruling came just as the state elections board was mailing informational letters to some 305,000 registered voters whose names didn't show up on the state's list of licensed drivers and thus might lack valid photo IDs. The first 200,000 letters were already out the door, and the board's Republican member in charge of voter education decided to mail the rest after the ruling, leading to charges that he was deliberately misleading likely Democratic voters.

"The point was to tell these people, 'Hey, you can't really vote,' and suppress their turnout," said David Worley, a Democratic member of the board.

To try to clear up the matter, which has led to a call for a Justice Department investigation, the Georgia elections board has been running public-service announcements and is sending the same group of voters a new letter telling them to disregard the earlier one. "To the extent that there was any confusion, we've corrected it," said Republican board member Tex McIver, whose decision on the mailing put him at the center of the storm.

The courts have upheld Indiana's photo-ID requirement so far, but a federal appeals court will rule on it after the election. Missouri's Supreme Court declared the state's ID requirements invalid this month, saying the state couldn't prove any instances of voter fraud at the polls. Ohio officials will defend some of their ID rules in court tomorrow.

In all of the disputes, voter-identification laws tend to break down along party lines. Republicans generally support the laws, saying they are necessary to rebuild trust in the voting process. Democrats say that in-person voter fraud is extremely rare and that ID laws do more harm than good by disenfranchising elderly, disabled, low-income, minority and other voters who might not have the right documentation.

In Minnesota, Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty recently pushed for the state legislature to adopt a photo-ID requirement, saying 32 noncitizens had registered to vote since 2004, and 11 of them had actually cast ballots. Brian Melendez, chairman of the state's Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party, says the proposal is "using a cannon to swat a fly." He figures the 32 registrations constituted 0.001% of the state's registered voters.

The movement toward stricter voter verification comes after Congress passed the Help America Vote Act in 2002. The law has spurred a raft of new voting machines in polling places across the country. It also required first-time voters who register by mail to provide identification before they can vote. What's more, a commission led by former President Jimmy Carter and former Secretary of State James Baker in 2005 recommended a nationwide voter-ID requirement.

California, New York and 22 other states don't go much further than the minimal HAVA requirement for first-time voters. But many states have set additional rules. Texas, Ohio and 17 other states require some form of identification, such as a utility bill or paycheck. Louisiana and South Dakota encourage registered voters to bring photo IDs but still allow them to cast a regular ballot without them if they sign an affidavit. Kansas and Pennsylvania require all first-time voters to show identification at the polls.

Despite the best efforts of many election officials and civic-participation groups, though, some election officials say confusion among some voters and poll workers on Election Day is inevitable given the hodgepodge of new laws and the legal battles surrounding them. "I'm personally worried that there's going to be some voter confusion over what's required," says Deborah Markowitz, president of the National Association of Secretaries of State.

At a time when many precinct workers are also coping with new electronic voting machines and new statewide registration databases, the identification rules add to the confusion. "Conditions are good for bad things to happen," says Doug Chapin, director of electionline.org, a nonpartisan group that tracks election reforms. He fears that many poll workers "may ask for ID when it's not required."

Electionline.org1 and canivote.org2, a Web site run by the National Association of Secretaries of State, both list voter-ID rules by state.

Many of the new in-person voter requirements don't apply to absentee or early voters, a fact often derided by opponents of voter-ID laws since the most-documented type of voter fraud involves absentee voting.

But efforts to beef up ID requirements for absentee and early balloting have ended up in the courts, too. In Ohio, a federal judge put the new absentee voting ID rules on hold, saying they were vague and applied inconsistently across the state. The Republican secretary of state, J. Kenneth Blackwell, didn't want the ruling appealed so close to the election. "We did not want there to be conflicting court rulings and confusion added to the process," said James Lee, a spokesman for Mr. Blackwell's office.

But the state's Republican attorney general, Jim Petro, who lost to Mr. Blackwell in the primary for governor in May, filed an appeal anyway. On Sunday, an appeals court sided with Mr. Petro, reinstating the identification rules for absentee ballots, and once again raising questions about how those ballots might be counted.

By Bob Davis

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Smartmatic Corp., whose voting machines will be used in midterm elections next week, says it adopted a complicated ownership structure to minimize taxes and protect intellectual property, and not to mask any control by Venezuela's government.

Smartmatic, which is owned by Venezuelan entrepreneurs who split their time between Boca Raton, Fla., and Caracas, has been caught up in a government probe over foreign ownership. On Election Day, Smartmatic equipment will be used in 16 states, including Florida and California, and the District of Columbia.

The actions of the voting-machine company are being reviewed by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S. The committee reviews foreign acquisitions to see if they pose national security concerns.

Most reviews by the committee occur before an acquisition is completed -- and publicity engendered by the probes can kill a deal. This year, for instance, a company owned by the government of Dubai, a Persian Gulf emirate that is part of the United Arab Emirates, was forced to back away from plans to run commercial operations at several U.S. ports, amid an outcry on Capitol Hill.

With Smartmatic, the pattern is reversed. The company bought a U.S. voting-machine company, Sequoia Voting Systems Inc., in 2005, and the panel is only now starting a formal review. While a review could end in a recommendation for a divestiture, such an action would be rare. A committee spokeswoman recalled just one instance in which a review resulted in a divestiture. In 1990, the first Bush administration ordered China to sell a U.S. maker of aircraft parts.

The Smartmatic purchase has drawn attention because of concerns that the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, an opponent of U.S. policies, has a stake in the company. Smartmatic came to prominence in 2004 when its machines were used in an election to recall President Chávez, which Mr. Chávez won handily -- and which the Venezuelan opposition say was riddled with fraud. Smartmatic put together a consortium to conduct the recall elections, which included a company called Bizta Corp., in which Smartmatic owners had a large stake. For a time, the Venezuelan government had a 28% stake in Bizta in exchange for a government loan.

Bizta paid off the loan in 2004, and Smartmatic bought the company the following year. But accusations of Chávez government control of Smartmatic have dogged the company since. In addition, late in 2004, Smartmatic scrapped a simple corporate structure, in which it was based in the U.S. with a Venezuelan subsidiary. It adopted a complex offshore structure, with headquarters in the Netherlands Antilles; a main subsidiary in the Netherlands and a variety of subsidiaries in the U.S., Barbados, Venezuela and Mexico.

That also led to concern that the structure was designed to mask foreign ownership. "The opaque nature of Smartmatic's ownership is particularly troubling since Smartmatic has been associated" with the Venezuelan government, Rep. Carolyn Maloney, a New York Democrat, wrote to Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson this month. The Treasury Department is the lead agency in the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S..

At a news briefing yesterday, Smartmatic's 32-year-old chief executive, Antonio Mugica, presented a simpler explanation: tax reduction. The combination of setting up in the Netherlands and Dutch Antilles produces "a very beneficial tax treatment with the confines of the law," said Smartmatic's attorney, Jeffrey Bialos. Mr. Chávez and the Venezuelan government have no ownership stake in the company, Mr. Mugica said.

In 2004, when the company changed its corporate structure, it debated how much of the company's earnings it should report to the U.S. or the Bahamas, where it also had a subsidiary. Smartmatic said three of its Venezuelan managers own about 91% of the company. They are Mr. Mugica, with 78.8%; Chief Technology Officer Roger Pinate, with 8.5%; and Chief Financial Officer Alfredo Anzola, with 3.9%.

The Cfius review appears to be just into its 30-day period. If the government decides to look further, it starts a 45-day investigation, which can end in a recommendation to the president to take action.

Voting Machine Firm Denies Chavez Ties (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

The nation's third-largest supplier of electronic voting machines said yesterday that it asked the federal government to review its purchase by a company controlled by Venezuelans to allay concerns that it is influenced by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

The company, Smartmatic Corp., and its subsidiary, Sequoia Voting Systems Inc., are being investigated by the Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States.

The CFIUS, which probes international business deals with defense or national security implications, received national attention this year when it cleared the purchase of a major provider of U.S. port security by a Dubai-based company, a transaction that fell apart after uproar on Capitol Hill.

Smartmatic representatives yesterday said that the Venezuelan government does not own and has never owned any part of the company. "No foreign government from any country has ever held a stake in Smartmatic," said the company's chief executive, Antonio Mugica.

The CFIUS investigation was first reported by the Miami Herald over the weekend, but Smartmatic confirmed in a news conference yesterday that it was cooperating with -- and had asked for -- the investigation.

In May, after concerns about the company's ownership structure began to circulate, Smartmatic dismissed the idea of a CFIUS investigation, saying Sequoia's products "do not fall within the parameters of the matters governed by CFIUS."

Jeff Bialos, a Washington lawyer representing Smartmatic and Sequoia, said that Smartmatic decided to request the inquiry to clear up "unfounded accusations" that have "persistently dogged" officials of both companies. "The company is in a policy of full disclosure with these issues," he said.

The development comes before the midterm elections, which will be a major test of the reliability and security of new electronic voting machines. A breakdown in the use of Sequoia voting machines in the March primary in Chicago gave rise to questions about Smartmatic's corporate structure, which is based in the Netherlands Antilles in the Caribbean but owned by Venezuelan nationals.

Generating more concern is the hostile relationship between the United States and Chavez, who called President Bush "the devil" last month. In 2004, opposition groups questioned the results of an unsuccessful 2004 recall election -- run on Smartmatic technology -- that tried to oust Chavez. International observers cleared the election.

"Given the state of the relationship between President Bush and President Hugo Chavez right now, the idea that a Venezuelan firm might be responsible for programming our voting machines is a legitimate concern," said Robert Pastor, executive director of the Commission on Federal Election Reform at American University.

Smartmatic International Group is owned primarily by foundations controlled by three Venezuelans -- Mugica, Roger Pinate and Alfredo Anzola. It was a small company until it beat out Nebraska-based Election Systems & Software in 2004 for a contract to provide voting technology in Venezuela. With millions in profits from that contract, Smartmatic bought Sequoia last year from a British company for about $16 million. Sequoia supplies electronic voting machines to at least a dozen states and the District.

Bizta, a start-up technology company in Venezuela with some of the same owners as Smartmatic, received a $150,000 grant from a financing arm of Venezuela's government before the 2004 recall. In exchange, Bizta pledged nearly 30 percent of the company shares and a seat on the board to the government. Bizta has been folded into Smartmatic, and Mugica said the grant, which he characterized as a loan, has been repaid. He added that a government representative never showed up at board meetings.

Venezuela's government said yesterday that it had no ownership in Smartmatic. "The Chavez administration does not have any type of relationship with the Smartmatic Corporation," said the Venezuelan ambassador to the United States, Bernardo Alvarez.

Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-N.Y.), ranking member on the House committee that oversees the CFIUS, asked the Treasury Department in May to review Sequoia's acquisition. "The ownership of the company that makes machines that we use to exercise our democracy should also be looked at from a national security perspective," Maloney said yesterday.

Election experts said the Smartmatic concern would not be pressing if voting machine companies were more open about their technology. "If things were done truly transparently and it was auditable and there was accountability, it wouldn't really matter," said Warren Stewart, executive director of VoteTrust USA. "Unfortunately, that is not the case."

E-Mail Voting Comes With Risks (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Time was when soldiers, if they wanted to vote, had to request ballots by snail mail, fill them out and return them the same way.

The process typically took weeks.

This year, thousands of soldiers around the world have the opportunity to vote in the Nov. 7 elections by e-mail. It's part of a Pentagon effort to make it easier for overseas military personnel to cast ballots in federal and state elections, and it reflects how the Internet has changed life in the combat zone.

But computer security experts inside and outside the government warned that the Pentagon's Federal Voting Assistance Program ignores the risks associated with unencrypted e-mail: interception, hacking and identity theft.

"E-mail traffic can flow through equipment owned and operated by various governments, companies and individuals in many countries," Joel Rothschild, a Navy Reserve captain, said in an August report prepared for the Pentagon. "It is easily monitored, blocked and subject to tampering."

A separate report by four outside computer security experts released last week raised similar red flags and added that the use of unencrypted e-mail for registering overseas voters invited identity theft.

"No bank would ask their customers to send Social Security numbers over unencrypted e-mail," said the report's co-author, David Wagner, a professor of computer science at the University of California at Berkeley. But that is what the system allows, he said.

Rothschild's report noted that e-mails can be encrypted to reduce tampering risks. Pentagon officials said states would need to arrange for that provision.

States have options for getting ballots to and from voters. They can fax, e-mail or mail the ballots, or use a combination of the methods. The federal government began the use of faxed ballots in 1990, with troops stationed in the Persian Gulf for Operation Desert Shield. E-mail is an option in those states that allow it; at the moment eight do. Mississippi was the first, allowing troops overseas to vote by e-mail in a 2003 gubernatorial election.

Neither the Pentagon nor state officials say they track how many of the 294,000 military personnel overseas are voting by e-mail. That information is held at the county level, state elections officials said.

In Colorado, Jefferson County elections official Shawna Weir said she has received three ballots that soldiers sent by e-mail. The service members -- two in Iraq and one on a ship -- e-mailed their ballots to a federal facility in Virginia, which then faxed them to the county.

They were all "very eager to vote," Weir said, noting that they had called her to make sure they could get their ballots.

The combination of faxing and e-mail "is about as dangerous as you can get," Wagner said. "It's got all of the problems with unencrypted e-mail, plus your ballot is being routed through the Department of Defense. Will soldiers feel free to vote their conscience when they know that the DOD may be able to see how they voted? How do we know that the DOD or their contractors haven't modified soldiers' ballots in transit?"

DOJ_NMG_0089148

J. Scott Wiedmann, deputy director of the Federal Voting Assistance Program, said the operators at the federal facility cannot alter e-mail content, which is sent in "read-only" format. Voters are also encouraged to mail in an original copy of their ballot as a backstop, he said.

Soldiers faxing and e-mailing their ballots also must sign waivers saying they understand that somebody might see their ballot, Wiedmann said. "There's no U.S. constitutional guarantee to a secret ballot," he said.

Joni Ernst is a county elections official in Iowa and a major in the Iowa Army National Guard who served in Iraq from 2003 to 2004. She delivered mail to the troops and saw how long it could take, so she is glad that soldiers have the e-mail option. Most every camp has an Internet cafe for soldiers, and if the voting process is simple, she said, the troops are more likely to vote.

"Their time is very limited," Ernst said. "We don't want to detract from the mission. But we want to make sure their vote counts."

Campaign To End Race Preferences Splits Michigan (NYT)

By Tamar Lewin

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

ANN ARBOR, Mich., Oct. 25 — Three years after the Supreme Court heard Jennifer Gratz's challenge to the University of Michigan's affirmative action policy, she is still fighting racial preferences, this time in a Michigan ballot initiative.

"We have a horrible history when it comes to race in this country," said Ms. Gratz, 29, a white applicant who was wait-listed 11 years ago at the state's flagship campus here. "But that doesn't make it right to give preference to the son of a black doctor at the expense of a poor student whose parents didn't go to college."

The ballot initiative, Proposition 2, which would amend Michigan's Constitution to bar public institutions from considering race or sex in public education, employment or contracting, has drawn wide opposition from the state's civic establishment, including business and labor, the Democratic governor and her Republican challenger. But polls show voters are split, with significant numbers undecided or refusing to say where they stand.

Passage would probably reinvigorate challenges to a variety of affirmative action programs in other states. In California, where a similar proposition passed in 1996, the number of black students at the elite public universities has dropped. This fall, 96 of 4,800 freshmen at the University of California, Los Angeles — 2 percent — are black, a 30-year low.

For the University of Michigan, the proposition would require broader changes than the Supreme Court did; it ruled in Ms. Gratz's case and a companion case that while the consideration of race as part of the law school's admissions policy was constitutional, a formula giving extra points to minority undergraduate applicants was not.

The president of the university, Mary Sue Coleman, an opponent of the proposition, said its reach could extend into K to 12 education.

"It would make it illegal to have our program targeting girls in junior high school, and having them come to campus to learn about science and engineering," Ms. Coleman said. "I'm a woman scientist, and I know how fragile our gains are."

Such arguments have resonance in Ann Arbor, where the Democratic headquarters is doing a brisk business in "No on 2" yard signs.

"We need to keep affirmative action because it's still not a level playing field for women or minorities," said Gena Morris, who is black, an event planner who volunteers at Democratic headquarters.

Susan Greenberg, a widow whose husband was a University of Michigan professor, took home a yard sign recently, saying, "It's probably the most important thing on the ballot."

Just 20 miles north of the liberal university enclave, in Brighton, there is less familiarity with the proposition but more opposition to affirmative action.

"I don't know a lot about Proposition 2, but I do know a neighbor kid, a good kid, a local kid with a 3.7-3.8 average, who didn't get into the university and he should have," said Vicki Smith, who is white, shopping one afternoon at Kohls department store. "I do think there's something wrong with their admissions."

Pollsters, in fact, say the Nov. 7 results may well turn on whether the measure is seen primarily as a race issue.

"If voters think about it as being about race, black and white, support goes up," said Ed Sarpolus, vice president of EPIC-MRA, a polling firm in Lansing. "So the opponents are trying to show that it's not just race, that it would hurt women, hurt Michigan's economy, and they're having some success with that."

Though most of the debate on the proposition has been about race and college admissions — four out of five Michigan residents are white — the ballot initiative is also playing out against the state's somber economic picture of high unemployment, high migration of young people and a wrenching transition away from manufacturing.

Opposition to Proposition 2 is strongest in majority-black Detroit and a few liberal strongholds like Ann Arbor. Like California's Proposition 209, which passed in 1996, Proposition 2 has been backed by Ward Connerly, a wealthy black

Republican who is a former University of California regent. If Mr. Connerly is successful in Michigan, and maybe even if he is not, he is likely to carry the fight to other states.

"When my toes turn up, that's when I'll stop fighting this," said Mr. Connerly, who has provided nearly $500,000 for the Michigan Civil Rights Initiative, the group Ms. Gratz leads. "As John F. Kennedy said," he continued, "race has no place in public life."

As of Oct. 20, the group had raised $1.4 million and spent $782,000.

Ms. Gratz, who grew up in a working-class suburb of Detroit, graduated among the top 15 in a high school class of about 300. But she only made the wait list for the Ann Arbor campus of the University of Michigan and never returned the postcard that would have kept her on the list for available spaces.

She graduated from the University of Michigan-Dearborn with a math degree and became a product manager at a technology company. She also pursued the suit against the university. She called Mr. Connerly soon after the Supreme Court ruled on her case, and they began working on the Michigan proposition. It has been her full-time job for three years.

Opposition to the measure is led by One United Michigan, an unusually broad coalition that includes Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm, a Democrat, and her Republican challenger, Dick DeVos, as well as unions, churches, businesses and higher education and civil rights groups. It has raised and spent $3.3 million.

"We have the A.C.L.U. sitting with the Michigan Catholic Conference on the steering committee, which is something you don't see very often, " said David Waymire, a coalition spokesman. "There isn't a big Michigan voice on the other side. But it's tough. Two years ago, the initial polling found more than two-thirds supported the proposition. The miracle is that we've gotten it into a winnable range."

Coalition members said Proposition 2 would hamper employers' efforts to diversify their work forces. They said it would also force some local governments to eliminate outreach and set-aside programs for minority contractors and would diminish the already-meager representation of black and Hispanic students at the flagship university here.

"It would be like slamming a door on progress," Ms. Coleman said. "I will do everything that's legal to help us attract minority students. But it's already having a chilling effect."

This year, the freshman class at the Ann Arbor campus has 330 blacks, or 6.4 percent, down from the high of 499 in 2001, and from 350 in the year after the Supreme Court case, when a new admissions process was adopted. Over all, blacks make up 7.2 percent of the undergraduates. But there are other ways to look at the numbers.

The Center for Equal Opportunity in Virginia, which supports the proposition, released an analysis of University of Michigan data finding that black applicants who were accepted by the university had lower grades and SAT scores than white applicants who were admitted. The median SAT for black students who were admitted was 1160 in 2005, it said, compared with 1350 for whites.

The center said the university now weighed race and ethnicity even more heavily than before the Supreme Court ruling.

The university disagrees. "Their analysis is flat-out wrong and carefully calculated to achieve a political outcome," said Julie Peterson, a university spokeswoman.

She said that the center overlooked factors added to the admissions process after the ruling, like recommendations, essays and extracurricular activities, and that the data on which the center based its conclusions did not include all applicants.

Ms. Peterson and others at the university emphasized that because there were so many white applicants and so few blacks, an end to affirmative action would not substantially increase white students' odds of admission. In their book, "The Shape of the River," Derek C. Bok and William G. Bowen estimated that if selective universities had race-blind admissions, the probability of white students' admission would rise only slightly — to 26.5 percent from 25 percent — while black students' admissions would decline by half.

Wade Henderson, executive director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights said the proposition would help determine the future of affirmative action.

"Michigan is ground zero in the national debate on the meaning of equal opportunity," Mr. Henderson said. "It's really important that we stop this, before Ward Connerly takes the battle to other states."

But in many quarters here, public support remained strong, which Ms. Gratz said indicated just how much Michigan's power brokers were out of touch with voters.

"The entire elite establishment is all lined up on the other side of this issue," Ms. Gratz said, "but the mainstream, normal, everyday people who go to work every day think their husbands, their wives, their kids, should be treated equally by our government, and should not be judged on race or sex."

Court Upholds Ban On Enforcement Of Abortion Warning Law (FINDLAW/AP)

By Chet Brokaw, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 31, 2006

(AP) - PIERRE, South Dakota-South Dakota cannot enforce a 2005 law that would require doctors to give additional warnings to women who seek abortions, a federal appeals panel ruled Monday.

In a 2-1 ruling, the panel of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a lower court's ruling that has prevented the state from enforcing the law. Planned Parenthood, which challenged the measure, has demonstrated a likelihood it will win in its argument that the law violates the U.S. Constitution, the panel said.

The law, passed by state lawmakers in 2005, would require doctors to tell women that abortions end human lives and may later cause serious psychological problems for women who have abortions. A woman also would have to be told she has a legal relationship with her unborn child and that the relationship would be terminated by an abortion that would end the child's life.

U.S. District Judge Karen Schreier of Rapid City issued an order preventing the state from enforcing the law while the lawsuit proceeds. The judge said Planned Parenthood has a fair chance of succeeding on its claim that the law violates the free-speech rights of doctors.

The state argues that the required information is medically accurate and supported by science. State lawyers contend the law would not curb reasonable access to abortion in South Dakota.

The South Dakota Legislature this year passed a much more restrictive law, which would ban nearly all abortions in the state. South Dakota voters will decide the fate of the abortion ban in the Nov. 7 election.

Ban On Abortions Trails In New Poll (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

A South Dakota ballot measure to ban almost all abortions in the state is likely to fail by a wide margin, a new poll says.

Fifty-two percent of 800 likely voters said they would vote "no" next week on a law banning all abortions except to save the life of a mother, according to the poll, conducted for the Argus Leader newspaper in Sioux Falls, S.D.

An additional 42 percent of voters said they would vote "yes" for the ban, and 6 percent were undecided, according to the survey, which had a margin of error of 3.5 percent and was released in the newspaper's Sunday edition.

The poll shows that "voters are seeing through the campaign of misinformation and lies" from the ban's supporters, said Jan Nicolay, co-chairwoman of South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families. "There is a growing consensus that we should keep all options open for women whose health is in jeopardy and for victims of rape and incest."

Leslee Unruh, campaign manager for VoteYesForLife .com, which supports the ban, said yesterday she's seen recent polls that "show us neck and neck."

"The only poll that counts is on Election Day, and we intend to win," she said, adding that if yard signs, bumper stickers and other signs of support are any indication, the VoteYesForLife side is winning.

Earlier this year, South Dakota lawmakers passed a law making it a criminal offense to perform an abortion except to save the life of the mother. The law, which was signed by Republican Gov. Michael Rounds, finds that "life begins at the time of conception" and that a pregnant mother and her unborn child "each possess a natural and inalienable right to life."

The law is on the ballot because South Dakota law allows a newly passed law to be put before the voters if enough signatures are collected asking for it.

Pro-choice advocates see the law as a challenge to the Supreme Court's 1973 ruling in Roe v. Wade, which says that it is unconstitutional for states to ban abortions. Planned Parenthood Federation of America, which is part of the coalition opposing the ban, says the ban must be defeated to protect Roe and women's right to have an abortion.

The campaign has been ugly at times. The VoteYesForLife Web site has posted pictures showing their "Vote Yes on 6 For Life" signs vandalized with a big black "X" or a red coat hanger. The coat hanger is a referral to pre-Roe days, when women reportedly used coat hangers to rid themselves of unwanted pregnancies.

The Argus Leader said the new poll, taken by Mason-Dixon Polling & Research, shows that opposition to the ban has grown stronger with time. A similar poll taken for the newspaper in July found that 47 percent of South Dakotans opposed the ban, 39 percent supported it and 14 percent were undecided.

Chronic Troubles At Youth Jails Haunt Campaign (WP)

By Mary Otto, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

When the $60 million Baltimore City Juvenile Justice Center opened in 2003, it was hailed as the kind of solution Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) had promised when he campaigned for office.

DOJ_NMG_0089151

Within a year, independent monitors were describing conditions there as bad as those in the state's most notorious juvenile jails. A U.S. Justice Department report this summer found that the center has failed to "adequately protect children from youth violence."

When Cheltenham Youth Facility shut down several of its dilapidated cottages in January 2004, advocates heralded a move toward smaller, more specialized centers. But today, some of the state's jails remain so crowded that teenagers sleep on the floor.

As Ehrlich faces a tough fight for reelection this fall, his bold promises to fix one of Maryland's most troubled systems have vexed his campaign.

"The system has gotten worse in the last four years," Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, Ehrlich's Democratic challenger, said in a recent interview. "We're writing off too many young lives."

The governor defends his efforts, saying in a recent debate, "We have made great strides on our juvenile justice system. We've changed the whole paradigm there."

Ehrlich did not mince words about the troubled system when he ran for governor four years ago and laid the blame squarely on his Democratic opponent, Kathleen Kennedy Townsend. As lieutenant governor, Townsend had taken on juvenile justice as a priority.

But problems with violence and mismanagement ran deep in many of the nearly two dozen state-run facilities entrusted with more than 2,000 young offenders. The state's juvenile boot camps had been shut down because of brutality.

"The history of juvenile services in Maryland -- up to and including the present," Ehrlich asserted then, "is one of devastating dysfunction that has ruined children's lives."

The Republican who would become the next governor promised a new era and a "child first" approach. He would rename, and redeem, the Department of Juvenile Justice.

But violence and trouble persist. Inspections continue to reveal dangerous conditions, staff shortages, chaotic classrooms, mismanagement and crowding. Despite a boot camp debacle in the past, Ehrlich's administration, too, tried the military approach, with bad consequences.

Officials at what is now called the Department of Juvenile Services say there were no quick fixes for the broken system and the damaged children they oversee, but they can point to some hopeful signs.

"It's by no means a perfect system. But it doesn't mean we haven't moved in that direction," said Juvenile Services Secretary Kenneth C. Montague Jr. "There has been a large, large change."

But advocates say the political stakes make it hard for officials to admit there are problems in the system.

"How can you fix anything you can't admit to?" asked Ralph B. Thomas, former head of the Office of the Independent Juvenile Justice Monitor under Ehrlich and his Democratic predecessor. Ehrlich "inherited a mess, and the mess continues."

Montague said the State Department of Education is slowly taking over schools in the facilities and is scheduled to be running them all by 2012. Drug courts in a growing number of counties are offering some youths a chance at treatment.

Two facilities with long histories of trouble, Cheltenham and the Charles H. Hickey Jr. School in Baltimore, have been downsized, although there was a stabbing at Hickey this month. Two small youth detention centers, one on the Eastern Shore and one in Western Maryland, have opened.

Some of the improvements have come with federal monitoring.

Cheltenham and Hickey are being monitored by teams of juvenile justice experts following a 2005 settlement between the state and the Justice Department following claims of civil rights violations.

Educational programs have improved considerably at both facilities in the past year, said Peter Leone, a University of Maryland professor on a team for the two institutions. "It's safe to say there have been dramatic improvements," he said.

Yet elsewhere, observers have documented chaos. Patrick J. Elder, a Bethesda teacher, tried working at the Alfred D. Noyes Children's Center in Rockville for one day last spring -- then handed in his resignation.

"What I saw was disgusting," he said. "The kids had no pencils, no paper, no books." While two guards sat and chatted in the back of the room, he said, he tried unsuccessfully to get the attention of the 19 boys. Five were playing poker; three were wrestling on the floor.

"I realized this is not for me."

Independent monitors at the center found similar chaotic conditions. Montague said Noyes presents special challenges because the high cost of living in Montgomery County makes it hard to pay and retain good staff members. In response to staff and teacher shortages there, salaries were recently raised.

Problems persist at the new Baltimore facility, as well, according to the Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0089152

"We find that children confined at the Justice Center suffer significant harm and risk of harm from the facility's failure to: (i) adequately protect children from youth violence; (ii) adequately safeguard youths against suicide; and (iii) adequately provide behavioral youth services," the department said in an August report.

Montague said he disagrees with the findings. "There were no systemic constitutional violations there" last year, he said, "and there are none now."

After the Lower Shore DRILL Academy opened in Salisbury in late 2003, under the management of the Wicomico County Sheriff's Department, the state began referring young offenders there, including Phil Sisler of Elkton, then 16, who had gotten into trouble for fighting.

His mother, Monica Sisler, hoped the place would give her son positive male role models and a sense of discipline. Then allegations of abuse started to circulate. Phil said boys were regularly forced to drink until they vomited and were lined up to vomit upon one another. His mother became alarmed and fought to bring him home.

After five months there, the department removed him and other students. The academy was closed down and has not reopened.

Montague said the state acted swiftly once the problems came to light. "As soon as we knew what was happening, we took our kids out."

Battle For The ACLU (USAT)

By Nat Hentoff

USA Today, October 31, 2006

This powerful civil liberties organization is in crisis, and impassioned supporters of its mission want change now. It's up to the national leadership to listen — and to resign.

The most serious crisis in the history of the American Civil Liberties Union was caused by the decision of its leadership in 1977 to defend the First Amendment right of an American Nazi organization to march in Skokie, Ill., where many Jews, including Holocaust survivors, lived. Adhering to its basic principle cost the ACLU about 30,000 members. The Illinois Supreme Court eventually upheld the ACLU's action, and the U.S. Supreme Court refused to review that ruling.

In the direct line of fire for months was David Goldberger, then legal and legislative director of the ACLU of Illinois. I was covering the case, and whenever I or others called him, Goldberger didn't acknowledge his identity until the caller identified himself or herself.

“I got thousands of angry calls,” Goldberger, a professor of constitutional and First Amendment law at Ohio State University's law school, recently told me. “I had to screen those calls.”

Goldberger still litigates cases for the ACLU as a volunteer lawyer, but he has become involved in another crisis of the organization involving its fundamental principles: He has joined ACLU members, donors, former staffers and board members, as well as civil liberties activists, supporting a website called SavetheACLU.org. The board of the South Carolina ACLU has also signed on. All are opponents of the present leadership — Executive Director Anthony Romero and President Nadine Strossen.

The signers' Mission Statement for SavetheACLU.org emphasizes: “We believe … the ACLU is especially important now during a time of grave and systematic attacks on civil liberties by the national government. But an ACLU compromised by its repeated failures to practice what it preaches will be unable to resist these attacks for long.”

Since its founding in 1920, the ACLU has been resisting and litigating against overreaching government, but never before has there been an administration so convinced that national security overrides individual liberties — while armed with an unprecedented range of surveillance technology. If this widening internal battle over its principles continues to grow, the ACLU's credibility among the citizenry at large will diminish as the war on terrorism continues indefinitely. The greatest cost will be to all of us, not only civil libertarians, in successive administrations controlled by either political party.

Particularly providing momentum to this rebellion was the decision of Romero's longtime predecessor as executive director, Ira Glasser, to become a leader of the opposition after initially remaining silent. In “Why I Join,” on the website, Glasser speaks of the ACLU leadership's “loss of … candor and its commitment to honesty and its growing intolerance for dissent and free speech within its own ranks. Such intolerance cannot be contained … (and can change) the instincts and reflexes that drive the ACLU's mission.” As Save the ACLU's Mission Statement says, “These breaches of principle include the ACLU's approval of grant agreements that restrict speech and associational rights; efforts by management to impose gag rules on staff and to subject staff to e-mail surveillance; a proposal to bar ACLU board members from publicly criticizing the ACLU; and informal campaigns to purge ACLU of its internal critics.”

These incursions on ACLU employees' civil liberties have silenced public dissent by them, as documented in an e-mail last Dec. 20 to the ACLU national board by an “employee rights” group in the national office, including lawyers and projects staff, protesting these management practices. It was sent anonymously, the group wrote, because "the fear of reprisal for speaking out … is heavy, palpable and widespread."

Meanwhile, a counter website, VoicesfortheACLU.org, has been launched in support of the ACLU leadership and is backed by the executive directors of 18 state affiliates and six senior ACLU staff members. Yet this site does not erase any of the specific charges against the leadership.

Among the increasing number of other internal critics dedicated to the principles of the ACLU is Rosemary Armington. She and her husband, David, have for decades been major donors to the organization. In a statement on the website addressed to Strossen, she writes, "The ACLU needs to lead by example. Regrettably, over the past several years the examples have reflected breaches of fundamental ACLU principles, followed by withdrawals after public disclosures and superficial admissions of 'mistakes' — but without anyone held accountable."

In the website's "Current Controversies" category, David Kennison, of the national board as well as the South Carolina board, presents a resolution adopted by that state's board in June, which he amplifies: "The ACLU (National) Board is considering a policy proposal that would deprive board members of the long-standing rights to obtain tapes of board meetings and could require that all meeting tapes be erased after approval of minutes. … Why is the ACLU leadership anxious to deny board members their traditional access to meeting tapes? Why does the leadership want to erase our history?"

Public expressions of this resolve to save the ACLU from its leadership, including a largely complicit national board of directors, are simultaneously an inspirational and poignant embodiment of the very spirit of the ACLU.

The ACLU is indeed more needed than ever.

The executive director and president of the ACLU could make a lasting contribution to saving the Constitution by resigning their posts. As Goldberger told The New York Times, "It's clear that the organization's leadership has let it drift away from its core principles, and without those principles, it has no value."

Nat Hentoff is a former member of the ACLU's national board and, before that, the New York board. He is an authority on free speech issues.

ANTITRUST:

U.S. Justice Dept. Probing Sony Unit (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, October 31, 2006

TOKYO (AP) -- Sony Corp. said Tuesday that the U.S. Department of Justice is probing its electronics unit.

The company received a subpoena from the Justice Department's antitrust division seeking information about Sony's static random access memory, or SRAM, business, company spokesman Atsuo Omagari said.

Sony intends to cooperate with the investigation, which it described as an industrywide probe without elaborating. Omagari declined to provide other details about the probe.

SRAM is a kind of computer memory that is faster and more reliable that DRAM, or dynamic random access memory. It does not need to be refreshed like DRAM, and it is also more expensive.

SRAM is found in relatively small quantities in personal computers. It's also used in disk drives, communications equipment and networking gear.

In 2005, Sony produced 3.3 billion yen ($27.7 million) worth of SRAM. The product is made by outside manufactures for Sony, which in turn sells the memory chips to other electronics makers, Omagari said.

He would not say who manufactures the chips for Sony or who Sony's customers were.

Earlier this month, U.S.-based chipmaker Cypress Semiconductor Corp. said its SRAM operations were also under investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice.

A separate U.S. Justice investigation into price-fixing among DRAM companies has so far resulted in more than a dozen charges against individuals and more than $731 million in fines against Samsung Electronics Co., Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc.

High Court Denies Appeal By Chemicals Shipper (WSJ)

By MARK H. ANDERSON

Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday rejected Stolt-Nielsen S.A.'s last-ditch appeal to derail a federal indictment against it for price-fixing and other illegal cartel activities in the market for deep-sea chemicals shipping.

DOJ_NMG_0089154

The decision by the justices, announced with a brief order, clears the way for federal prosecution of the company on an indictment issued by a Philadelphia grand jury in September. Justice Samuel Alito, who worked on the case as an appeals court judge, recused himself.

Stolt-Nielsen in 2004 became the first company to have amnesty revoked under the Justice Department's 13-year-old program. The company has waged an intense campaign to thwart Justice Department prosecution, arguing federal authorities wrongly canceled the amnesty agreement they had struck with the company that prevented its prosecution. Justice Department prosecutors, however, have argued in federal court that Stolt-Nielsen violated the terms of that agreement.

The Supreme Court in July and August twice turned away emergency appeals from the London-based shipping company before the indictments were announced. Stolt-Nielsen had asked the Supreme Court to review the ability of Justice antitrust officials to nullify the agreement without interference from federal courts.

The so-called parcel-tanker shipping industry moves liquids such as chemicals and oils across oceans. The Justice Department alleges the company and two competitors agreed to not compete and illegally discussed pricing and other matters with the goal of eliminating competition in the industry.

Last March, a panel of the Third U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia ruled that federal courts didn't have the power to block government prosecutors from pursuing the company and its officers because of the earlier existence of an amnesty deal.

"The division received the benefit of its bargain under the amnesty agreement and has no basis to breach it by prosecuting Stolt-Nielsen or its executives," Stolt-Nielsen said in an appeal brief.

The federal indictment against the company cites activity between August 1998 and November 2002. Conviction could result in as many as three years of imprisonment and as much as $350,000 in individual fines and $10 million in corporate fines. Indictments were also brought against two former executives of the company: Samuel Cooperman, a former chief executive, and Rick Wingfield, a former executive vice president.

US Rejects Business Amnesty Test Case (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

The US Supreme Court yesterday refused to put new limits on the power of prosecutors to indict American and foreign companies. The justices refused to hear a case involving Stolt-Nielsen, the Norwegian shipping company, which would have tested the right of federal prosecutors to rescind an amnesty agreement in an antitrust case.

Stolt-Nielsen volunteered information about antitrust violations in the parcel tanker market, in exchange for amnesty from the Justice Department.

But federal prosecutors later withdrew the amnesty and indicted the company, saying it breached its duty to co-operate.

"These kinds of government [amnesty] programmes are not going to be worth anything if companies continue to be treated like this company was in this case," says Robin Conrad of the National Chamber Litigation Center, legal arm of the US Chamber of Commerce, which argued that courts should have more power to enforce leniency deals.

Merck To Buy Sirna For $1.1B In Cash (AP-YBIZ)

AP, October 31, 2006

Merck Agrees to $1.1B Deal for Sirna Therapeutics, a Developer of RNA-Interference Based

WHITEHOUSE SATTION, N.J. (AP) -- Pharmaceutical company Merck & Co. said Monday it agreed to buy Sirna Therapeutics Inc., which is creating a new way to develop therapies based on RNA interference, for $1.1 billion in cash.

Merck's $13-per-share bid offers almost a 102 percent premium over Sirna's closing price of $6.45, down 5 cents, on the Nasdaq. Sirna shares surged $6.10, or 94.5 percent, to $12.55 in aftermarket electronic exchange trading. The stock's 52-week high is $8.52, set in April.

Sirna's RNA interference technology offers a new way to develop medicines and shows great promise in cancer research, Merck said. Sirna's operations would complement RNA work Merck has been doing since its 2001 acquisition of Rosetta Inpharmatics Inc., the company said.

Sirna's leading clinical development candidate is for the treatment of the wet-form of age-related macular degeneration, part of a broad collaboration with Allergan Inc. in ophthalmic diseases.

Merck said stockholders holding 36 percent of Sirna's outstanding shares have already committed to support the deal, which still needs antitrust clearance to close. The two companies hope to complete the deal in the first quarter of 2007.

Merck shares fell 45 cents to close at $45.64 on the New York Stock Exchange, then gained 16 cents in aftermarket trading.

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

Merck & Co. increased its bet on a hot research field known as RNA interference by acquiring San Francisco-based Sirna Therapeutics Inc. for $1.1 billion.

Sirna focuses on developing drugs based on RNAi technology, which can silence the activity of some genes and creates the potential for new medicines that target specific disease-related genes. The field is thought to hold promise both for locating zones in a cell that cause illness and for creating medicines that attack them. Earlier this month, two U.S. scientists won the Nobel Prize in medicine for their late 1990s discovery of the gene-silencing mechanism.

The deal moves Merck into a leading position in the field, coming on the heels of its 2001 purchase of Rosetta Inpharmatics. That acquisition gave the Whitehouse Station, N.J., drug maker the tools to look closely at the genes in a genome. With Sirna, Merck will have the ability to target -- instead of just locate -- certain parts of a cell for destruction, said Mervyn Turner, Merck's senior vice president of world-wide licensing and external research.

Merck believes RNAi technology holds particular potential in cancer research because it could home in on genes that control cancerous cells, destroying them without harming surrounding normal cells.

Sirna only has a handful of drugs in development. Its most advanced treatment, which is in the second of three phases of human testing, is targeted at the wet form of age-related macular degeneration, a leading cause of blindness in the elderly.

Under the terms of the deal, which is expected to close in the first quarter of next year, Merck agreed to pay $13 a share in cash, or about $1.1 billion, for Sirna. That is double Sirna's 4 p.m. stock price on the Nasdaq Stock Market yesterday of $6.45. In after-hours trading, Sirna soared 97% to $12.68.

John Maraganore, president and chief executive of Alnylam Pharmaceuticals Inc., a Cambridge, Mass., competitor of Sirna, said the deal underscores the pharmaceutical industry's level of interest in RNAi. "We view it as an enormously positive endorsement for RNAi therapeutics as an important new class of drugs," he said.

It is unclear how the Sirna acquisition will affect a separate development deal Merck has with Alnylam. Mr. Maraganore said his company would continue to work with Merck as a partner on several potential therapies.

AP, October 31, 2006

Google Inc. said Monday that it wants Microsoft Corp. to make sure users can easily choose Internet search engines in future products — but Google refused to say if changes Microsoft has already made to its upcoming operating system, Vista, have gone far enough.

David C. Drummond, Google's senior vice president of corporate development, spoke to reporters after meeting with European Union antitrust regulators but refused to give details on those talks, beyond saying there had been no particular agenda.

"It's been our view that any new version of Microsoft products that include search, that that be done in a way that preserves user choice for search and other applications," Drummond said. He said that Google would monitor the situation but that it was "too early to tell" if there were would be any antitrust allegations arising from Vista.

Vista is Microsoft's first major update to the company's flagship operating system since Windows XP was released in late 2001.

Microsoft said this month it had changed Vista in several key sectors — including its search service — in an attempt to soothe European antitrust worries. Regulators had said they were concerned that computer manufacturers or consumers might be prevented from having a proper choice between different software packages.

EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes wrote to Microsoft CEO Steve Ballmer in March, pointing out possible issues with Vista's integrated Internet search, digital rights management tools used to protect copyrights and software that would create fixed-document formats comparable to Adobe Systems Inc.'s Portable Document Format, or PDF.

Security vendors Symantec Corp. and McAfee Inc. also complained that Microsoft had been slow to hand over technical details needed for their antivirus software to work smoothly with Vista.

There is no formal investigation into Vista, but Microsoft is still embroiled in a long-running legal challenge to the EU's 2004 antitrust order that found the company broke competition law. Microsoft was fined $613 million.

Microsoft Leaves Group Asking BellSouth Limits (BLOOM)

By Molly Peterson, BLOOMBERG NEWS

DOJ_NMG_0089156

Bloomberg, October 31, 2006

Microsoft Corp. distanced itself from a group lobbying for restrictions on AT&T Inc.'s proposed acquisition of BellSouth Corp., saying it won't seek to influence regulators weighing the purchase.

The company, a founder of the It's Our Net Coalition, pulled its name from the member list after deciding not to weigh in on the $82 billion deal, spokeswoman Ginny Terzano said Monday. The group wants net neutrality rules to bar telephone and cable providers from charging new priority-access fees.

The 172-member coalition last week urged the Federal Communications Commission to impose "meaningful and effective net neutrality safeguards" on the BellSouth deal. The group wants the FCC to bar AT&T, the biggest U.S. phone company, from favoring some companies over others that offer the same type of Web content or services, depending on how much they pay.

"Microsoft has withdrawn its name from the It's Our Net Web site" while the FCC considers the deal, Terzano said in an e-mailed statement. "However, we continue to support and will pursue other opportunities to obtain meaningful network neutrality policies."

Terzano declined to comment on whether Microsoft will restore its name to the site after the FCC rules on the BellSouth purchase or say if the company has quit the group. The commission is scheduled to vote on the deal Friday.

Jim McGann, a spokesman for the It's Our Net Coalition, declined to comment on Microsoft's withdrawal. The coalition's other founding members are Google Inc., Amazon.com Inc., eBay Inc., Yahoo Inc. and IAC/InterActive Corp.

The five-member FCC is the last regulatory hurdle for San Antonio-based AT&T to complete the BellSouth transaction. The Justice Department and 18 states cleared the deal without conditions. The likely recusal of one FCC member has forced Republican Chairman Kevin Martin to negotiate with Democrats who are seeking conditions on the deal.

The coalition also is urging Congress to approve net neutrality rules that would apply to all broadband providers as part of an overhaul of the 1996 Telecommunications Act.

Google, Amazon and other Internet companies say they should be able to send video and other data at high speeds without paying a premium. They say allowing such fees could destroy the open nature of the Internet by giving broadband providers too much control over content.

Phone companies including AT&T and cable companies such as Comcast Corp. oppose efforts to bar them from levying fees to recoup billions of dollars spent on high-capacity networks. They have pledged not to block subscriber access to legal content or services, and say neutrality rules would stifle investment.

Schneider Swoops In On US Group (FT)

By Delphine Strauss and Doug Cameron

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

Schneider Electric, the French electrical equipment group, on Monday agreed to pay $6.1bn cash for American Power Conversion of the US to boost its capacity in back-up supply systems for the IT sector.

Marking a bold start for Jean-Pascal Tricoire in his first year as chief executive, the deal will be Schneider's first big acquisition since the failed merger in 2001 with Legrand, a domestic rival, which the European Commission overturned on antitrust grounds.

Mr Tricoire said the APC deal was "a significant strategic move" that would strengthen Schneider's position in the electrical distribution sector, the fastest-growing segment of its core business.

Schneider's shares, suspended until noon, fell 6.2 per cent to €82.9 by early afternoon on concerns over the price of the deal, which the group will finance though a €4.5bn syndicated loan, a share capital increase of around €1.2bn and bond issues.

American Power would add annual revenues of about $2.2bn. Mr Tricoire said the deal was "a significant strategic move that would strengthen Schneider "in the fastest-growing segment of our core business: electrical distribution".

However, analysts questioned the timing and price, given the uncertain outlook for IT spending in the US market, which accounts for close to half of APC's sales.

Patrick Marshall, an analyst at Credit Suisse, said the deal was "unlikely to be well received, given the price paid, the stage we are at in the global cycle...and the scale of the integration task ahead".

The price of $31 a share represents a 30 per cent premium to APC's previous closing price and is 36 times its expected earnings per share in 2007. Shares in APC were 25 per cent higher at $29.81 in early New York trading.

Schneider said the acquisition, expected to close early next year, would be earnings enhancing from 2007 and would create value of $3.3bn, including annual synergies of $160m by 2009 and $220m by 2011.

However, the gains may depend on turning around APC's large systems business, where margins have suffered recently from a delay in passing on raw material cost increases, and on extracting major savings in its supply chain.

DOJ_NMG_0089157

APC last month annnounced a second round of cost cuts, which will reduce its workforce by 7 per cent, but continues to invest in expanding its large systems business.

"Schneider has little track record in turnarounds, and may be pursuing growth at too rapid a pace," said Olivier Esnou, analyst at Exane BNP Paribas.

APC Deal Reflects Demand For Data Protection (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

French manufacturer Schneider Electric SA's agreement to buy American Power Conversion Corp. for $6.1 billion reflects a bet on growth in corporate demand for protection from power outages.

Both companies specialize in the critical-power market, making gear that helps firms withstand blips and outages. APC's bread and butter is smaller power systems, while Schneider's domain is with bigger entities. APC, however, has been migrating into the larger market.

Schneider's offer of $31 a share is a 30% premium to APC's Friday's close of $23.76 a share. Monday's announcement propelled APC's share price up 26%, or $6.26, to $30.02 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

The French company is trying to quickly eliminate "one of its key competitors" and break into the North American small-company critical-power market dominated by APC, says Boston analyst John Quealy, of Canaccord Adams, adding that "my guess is that they struck first with a knock-out-punch type take-out price."

Schneider and APC, of West Kingston, R.I., have benefited from a trend of corporate spending to protect computerized data from the effects of even small interruptions. The trend is being driven by several factors. New York's 2003 blackouts caused many firms to realize they couldn't afford to be out of commission for several hours, while new federal health-care privacy laws have prompted medical centers to add to data capabilities, creating more need for protection.

Once only businesses like brokerage houses or airline reservation departments worried about keeping the corporate data center running all the time, but today backup power for computer systems has become common in many industries that "can't have downtime," Mr. Quealy says.

The transaction, which is expected to close in the first quarter of next year, is subject to approval by regulators and APC shareholders.

APC, launched in 1981, makes auxiliary items ranging from surge protectors for personal computers to machines that essentially provide air conditioning to keep large data centers from running too hot. The company, which has 7,600 employees, is cashing out at a time of weak earnings. For the six months ended June 25, APC reported net income of $24.7 million, down 41% from a year earlier. Sales increased 17% to $560 million. Cash and short-term investments totaled $539 million as of June 25.

APC's earnings have been lackluster in the past two years as the company spent heavily on a sales force and support to sell its cooling systems and products for bigger companies and factories, analysts say. In a slide show on its Web site, Schneider says it's "very confident it can rapidly improve APC's profitability."

For APC shareholders, the transaction offers an "immediate and substantial cash premium for their investment in the company," Rob Johnson, president and chief executive of APC, says in a prepared statement.

Qualcomm To Be Probed By EU On Royalties, People Say (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, October 31, 2006

Oct. 30 (Bloomberg) -- Qualcomm Inc., the world's second- largest maker of mobile phone chips, will be investigated by the European Union over allegations it overcharges Nokia Oyj, Ericsson AB and other handset manufacturers, people with knowledge of the situation said.

The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust authority, has told Qualcomm and phonemakers that it will open a formal probe of complaints over royalty rates in the next few weeks, said two people who declined to be identified because the decision isn't public. An EU probe could lead to Qualcomm being forced to lower its rates or fined as much as 10 percent of sales.

``The impact on royalties would be significant and the impact on finances would be catastrophic," said Richard Windsor, a mobile phone analyst at Nomura Securities in London. If the EU forces the company to cut the rate in half, Qualcomm's pretax profit in 2007 would drop by a third to $3.3 billion, he said.

The case focuses on how rewards are shared in the $200 billion industry to supply equipment for third-generation mobile phones, which allow users to access the Internet and play videos. Qualcomm contends it's owed royalties on all of the newest 3G handsets because it holds essential patents. Rivals say Qualcomm has fewer patents on 3G phones than on earlier generations and should lower its rates.

Without Merit

Paul Jacobs, Qualcomm's chief executive officer, told the Financial Times in a June 12 interview that he ``won't be surprised'' if the EU launches an investigation and such a probe wouldn't have a ``big effect'' on the company.

Qualcomm, which is based in San Diego, said in a statement Oct. 27 that the allegations are ``factually inaccurate and legally meritless.''

EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said the regulator ``continues to look into the complaints'' from phonemakers about Qualcomm.

Qualcomm is expected to generate 36 percent of its revenue and 64 percent of its profit from licensing its mobile-phone technology in 2006, according to Ehud Gelblum, an analyst with JPMorgan Chase & Co. in New York who rates the shares ``neutral.''

The EU probe will come a year after Nokia and Ericsson, along with U.S. firms Broadcom Corp. and Texas Instruments Inc. and Japan's NEC Corp. and a Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. unit, said Qualcomm reneged on an agreement to provide its technology under fair and reasonable terms. Ericsson and NEC also accused Qualcomm of abusing its dominant position and charging ``excessive'' royalties on patents used for WCDMA, or Wideband Code-Division Multiple Access.

Broadcom

Broadcom filed a similar complaint against Qualcomm last year in the U.S. A federal court in New Jersey dismissed the complaint last month, saying ``Qualcomm's conduct may engender ill-will, but it must have threatened injury to competition -- not just competitors -- to give rise to antitrust liability.'' Broadcom has said it will appeal.

``We care about Qualcomm trying to squeeze us out of the chipset market by leveraging their royalties on technology rather than competing on a level playing field based on price and quality,'' Mark Nelson, a Washington-based partner at Cleary Gottlieb Steen & Hamilton LLP who is representing Broadcom.

Ericsson said in an e-mailed statement that it filed its complaint ``because the commission's intervention is critical to the continued integrity of open standards.''

Texas Instruments urged a commission probe, saying in an e- mailed statement that ``intellectual property abuse in a standards context cannot be tolerated.''

``It is essential that companies whose patented technology is adopted into a standard uphold their commitments to license these patents on fair, reasonable, and non-discriminatory terms,'' Nokia said in an e-mailed statement.

Standards War

The dispute is rooted in the fight between Europe's GSM, or the Global System for Mobile Communications, and the U.S. approach, which allowed companies to develop competing technologies. GSM controls about 80 percent of the worldwide cell phone market, according to Ovum, a London-based research company.

Nokia has become the dominant supplier of GSM phones in Europe, though it also licenses Qualcomm's CDMA technology, which is used in networks operated by Verizon Wireless and Sprint Nextel Corp., two of the three largest U.S. wireless carriers.

Nokia and Ericsson sought a GSM-based solution for the next generation of mobile technology in the 1990s, in an effort to avoid being too dependent on Qualcomm's CDMA. Nokia and Qualcomm have also challenged each other's patents for CDMA and GSM.

Qualcomm's CDMA technology is used by 13.5 percent of the world's 2.5 billion cell phone users, according to Ovum.

Negotiation Ploy

The battle moved to the International Telecommunication Union, the Geneva-based United Nations agency that establishes and regulates standards. Qualcomm and other U.S. wireless equipment makers pushed for a single 3G standard based on CDMA.

In 2000, the ITU approved five incompatible standards for 3G, including WCDMA and CDMA2000, the successor for networks using CDMA.

Qualcomm and several analysts, including Nomura's Windsor, said the complaints were filed to apply leverage on Qualcomm in royalty negotiations. Nokia's agreement with Qualcomm expires in April 2007.

``It's about making Qualcomm sit down at the table and get a gentlemen's agreement,'' said Alan Brown, an analyst at research firm Gartner Dataquest in Egham, England.

Pay To Obey (NYT)

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

The broken American patent system has a knack for sanctioning the ridiculous. In the latest example, businesses are receiving patents for devising ways to obey the law — the tax code, to be more specific. What's next, a patented murder defense?

As Floyd Norris reported recently in The Times, the broad category known as business-method patents (like patenting the idea of pizza delivery rather than the pizza itself) has expanded once again. Now it includes the legal ways that accountants and lawyers help their clients pay less tax.

Once the Patent and Trademark Office has granted one of these patents, everyone who uses the same legal shelter — even if they draw the conclusion based on their own interpretation of the tax code — will be subject to lawsuits and even injunctions against using the method at all.

Defenders of these tax-strategy patents argue that they won't affect the average person's struggle with the 1040 form each April. The easy stuff should be rejected under the usual standard that requires patents to be novel and not obvious. Tax-strategy patents, they argue, are more geared toward the complicated tax returns of rich people.

While we don't normally rush to make it easier for the rich to pay less tax, the precedent is a bad one. People should be treated the same under the law, and shouldn't have to pay a licensing fee for the privilege. Congress needs to make spurious patents easier to challenge across the board, and should consider clarifying what may be patented. Recent technological advances raise questions about how patents apply to genes and life forms, or what standard should cover old business models on the Internet.

Patents are supposed to encourage innovation, rewarding the individual for the greater good of society. But excessive or overly broad patents can slow business activity to the pace of cold molasses. And we sure don't need something else to worry about on tax day.

2 'People Of Interest' Questioned In Esperanza Fire (LAT)

By Jonathan Abrams And Maeve Reston

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

Arson investigators questioned two "people of interest" Monday as firefighters contained the wind-fed wildfire in Riverside County that killed four federal firefighters and destroyed 34 homes, authorities said.

The two men live in Cabazon, where the fire began, and were released after they were interviewed by investigators Monday afternoon, authorities said.

"We have two people we have questioned that are people of interest," said Tom Freeman, executive officer of the Riverside County Sheriff's Department. "Sheriff's personnel have not placed them under arrest … we continue to work the case aggressively."

Riverside County sheriff's spokesman Earl Quinata said arson investigators planned to interview many other people.

"At times, we are going to have persons of interest…. We are conducting those interviews, and we have no one in custody," Quinata said. "However, we are asking the public to please keep calling the tip line if they have heard or they feel they have information on this arson-homicide investigation."

The Riverside County district attorney's office has already appointed a prosecutor to assist in the case and prepare for a potential trial. "It is potentially a death-penalty case," said Sara Danville, chief deputy district attorney for Riverside County.

"If it is ultimately proven that this was an arson fire and the murder was committed in the course of arson, then that would qualify as a special circumstance," which could lead to the death penalty, she said. She noted that her office prosecuted two arson-murder cases in 1999 in which the defendants were sentenced to death.

The Esperanza fire has blackened more than 40,000 acres and destroyed 34 homes in the mountain communities west of Palm Springs, with the tab for fire operations topping $8.3 million, not including the damage to personal property. The blaze was classified as fully contained Monday at 6 p.m.

"To have it contained in a matter of five days is a tribute to the hard work these guys on the front line have done," said Randy Scales, spokesman for the California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection.

All evacuations have been lifted, and Highway 243, one of the main roads to Idyllwild, was fully reopened for the first time since the blaze began Thursday, fire officials said.

Many residents returned to find charred rubble where their homes once stood.

"We took a hell of a hit," said Phil Reddish, 55, of Twin Pines, as he sifted through his belongings. "I'm just trying to salvage the keepsakes as mementos you keep from a fire that you survive."

DOJ_NMG_0089160

He and his son, Ty, tried to keep their mood light as they rummaged through the remains of their home. "You have to be able to joke about this, because if you don't, the reality of it will eat you alive," Ty Reddish said.

The home of Rudy Luna, 61, was spared, but less than a hundred yards away, his neighbors' house had burned to the ground.

"It's a whole community up here," said Luna, who spent the day trying to help neighbors. "People out here know what to expect, and we prepare for it, but you can't prepare for a fire that comes that fast."

The Esperanza fire was set about 1 a.m. Thursday in the foothills near Esperanza Avenue in Cabazon, authorities said. Fanned by Santa Ana wind gusts up to 60 mph, the wildfire quickly grew out of control.

Later that morning, the windblown flames swept across the mountains and overwhelmed a U.S. Forest Service crew of Engine 57 from the Alandale Station in the San Bernardino National Forest.

Fellow firefighters watched helplessly as the fire took the lives of Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, the team's captain; Jason McKay, 27, of Phelan; Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; and Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto.

John Clays, McLean's brother in law, read a brief statement on behalf of the family at the fire command center in Beaumont.

"Jess McLean is and will always be a great man," Clay said. "He is a man that was dedicated to his work and devoted to his family."

The crew's sole survivor was Pablo Cerda, 23, of Fountain Valley, who suffered burns over most of his body. He remained in critical condition Monday at Arrowhead Regional Medical Center in Colton.

Cerda had surgery Monday to insert a feeding tube and remove additional damaged skin, said Kathy Peterson, a spokeswoman for the Forest Service.

More than 50 investigators from the Riverside County Sheriff's Department, California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection, U.S. Forest Service and Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco Firearms and Explosives are working on the case.

Freeman did not say what led investigators to the two unidentified men questioned Monday. He said law enforcement and fire officials were investigating more than 250 leads that had been called into the arson tip line.

About 1 p.m., sheriff's deputies searched a residence in Cabazon about a quarter-mile from where the fire started.

"Two deputies were in there for a good while early in the afternoon and came out with a couple of bags," said Bob Dunham, 70, who lives three houses away.

Susan Raichel, spokeswoman for the ATF, confirmed that two people from Cabazon were brought in for questioning about the fire. She said she didn't know if those people lived in the house that was searched.

The ATF and FBI are each contributing $25,000 to bring the total reward for information leading to the arrest and prosecution of the arsonists to $550,000, Rachel said. Anyone with information about the blaze is asked to call the arson tip line, at (951) 922-7116.

Firefighters Gain On Calif. Wildfire (AP)

By Allison Hoffman

AP, October 31, 2006

CABAZON, Calif. - Authorities investigating an arson wildfire that killed four firefighters questioned two people Monday as crews remained confident that the blaze would soon be fully contained.

Sheriff's deputies took two men and three bags of material from a house in Cabazon, said neighbor Robert Dunham, 70, who lives three doors down from the residence a quarter-mile from where the fire started.

Authorities released little information about the two people who were interviewed at a sheriff's station and later released. No arrests had been made.

"We're trying to work through the leads that we have, and going through the process," Riverside County Sheriff Bob Doyle said in a telephone interview.

Authorities said the fire was deliberately set at the base of a slope in Cabazon, west of Palm Springs. Cabazon residents have said they saw two young men leaving the area where the fire began.

Since it started around 1 a.m. Thursday, the fire has burned 63 square miles, or 40,200 acres, as fierce Santa Ana winds swept through the region and fanned the flames. It was about 90 percent contained, and authorities expected full containment Monday night. It has destroyed 54 structures - 34 homes and 20 other buildings.

Last week, a shift in the winds turned deadly when a gust pushed a wall of flames around five firefighters trying to protect a house. Four of the firefighters died, while another was hospitalized with serious burns over most of his body.

Pablo Cerda, 23, remained in critical condition Monday, three days after undergoing surgery to remove damaged skin.

DOJ_NMG_0089161

"They want everyone to know that Pablo's dream was to help people, and on Thursday morning, that's just what he was doing - protecting and serving," said Eddie Cortez, a family spokesman.

Meanwhile, the FBI and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives donated $25,000 each to the reward pool, bringing the total to $550,000, ATF spokeswoman Susan Raichel said.

Vigils were held at several Southern California churches and fire stations for Cerda and to pray for the families of the fallen firefighters. Killed were Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, of Idyllwild; Jason McKay, 27, of Phelan; Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; and Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto.

U.S. Cites Cost Cuts' Role In BP Refinery Blast Safety Board Lays Blame With Top-Level Decisions, Raising Firm's Legal Risks By CHIP CUMMINS (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

Cost-cutting efforts by senior management at BP PLC contributed to a deadly explosion at a refinery in Texas last year, federal investigators said, a finding that ratchets up the legal stakes for the London-based oil giant.

In a summary of its preliminary findings yesterday, the Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board didn't name specific senior managers or members of BP's executive suite in London. But the federal agency alleged for the first time that high-level decisions to defer overhauls, cut staff and rein in costs at the Texas City, Texas, plant helped cause the accident, which killed 15 people and injured 180.

BP already faces a criminal probe into the accident as well as civil claims from victims and survivors' families. Though the board hasn't any regulatory role or prosecutorial powers, its findings could be taken up by civil litigants or by other agencies probing the disaster.

The development further sullies BP's corporate image after a spate of operational, compliance and environmental problems in the U.S. Federal authorities separately are investigating BP's energy-trading activities and federal and state officials are probing corrosion problems at BP's big Prudhoe Bay oil field in Alaska.

BP has issued its own findings that painted a picture of widespread maintenance and safety shortcomings at the Texas City refinery. But it laid the lion's share of the blame on the actions of a handful of lower-level workers and supervisors.

Ronnie Chappell, a BP spokesman, yesterday said the company stood by its findings. BP investigators "didn't find evidence of budgetary decisions which were an immediate cause or critical factor in this terrible tragedy," he said.

BP's chief executive, John Browne, set off an industry-changing wave of consolidation in the late 1990s, when oil prices were low. Big oil companies gobbled up competitors and cut costs to stay profitable. Lord Browne and his management team won kudos for the effort, especially as oil prices recovered later, leading to currently flush industry profits. BP took over the Texas City refinery when it purchased Amoco Corp. in 1998.

In July 2005, The Wall Street Journal detailed in a page-one article how cost cuts and staffing reductions preceded the blast. Current and former workers interviewed blamed the cuts for reducing safety and causing equipment problems at the refinery. BP denied those claims.

In an interview, Don Holmstrom, the safety board's top investigator in the BP inquiry, said BP executives had been sent company documents months or years before the accident that indicated cost-cutting had undermined safety at the plant. The agency said it wouldn't release those documents at the present time.

"The documents themselves that we have reviewed identify the impact of the cost-cutting on the integrity of the refinery," Mr. Holmstrom said.

The board also said internal BP documents indicated managers were aware of safety problems at 34 other unnamed BP businesses world-wide. "Every successful corporation must contain its costs," the board's chairwoman, Carolyn Merritt, said in the statement. "But at an aging facility like Texas City, it is not responsible to cut budgets related to safety and maintenance without thoroughly examining the impact on the risk of catastrophic accident." Ms. Merritt linked BP's cost-cutting and the accident in an interview broadcast Sunday on the CBS television network's "60 Minutes" program.

Mr. Chappell, the BP spokesman, said BP agrees "that the explosion and fire was preventable, but we don't understand the basis for some of the comments made by the [safety board]" in its statement. He said BP won't comment publicly on specific statements made by the safety board until the agency issues its final report, expected in March.

The board listed BP financial decisions that the agency determined played a role in the accident. For instance, in order to save money, BP decided in 2002 not to replace a venting system that failed during the accident with a safer system, the agency said.

It also found that BP cut the size of the training staff at the refinery to eight people in 2004 from about 30 in 1997. The training department's budget was reduced by half from 1998 to 2004, it found.

The board also said that it determined BP cut fixed costs at the refinery about 25% from 1998 to 2000 and that those cuts "adversely impacted maintenance expenditures and infrastructure at the refinery."

BP 'knew Of Safety Problems' At Refineries (FT)

By Sheila McNulty In Houston

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

BP's global management was aware of "significant safety problems" at the Texas City refinery and 34 other locations around the world well before last year's deadly explosion at the US plant, investigators said on Monday.

The US Chemical Safety Board, an independent federal agency charged with investigating industrial chemical accidents, said internal BP documents prepared between 2002 and 2005 revealed knowledge of those problems before the March 2005 explosion killed 15 and injured 500 people in and around BP's biggest refinery. The Texas blast was the worst US industrial accident in more than a decade.

The CSB report comes a week before BP's first civil trial arising from the explosion and is likely to lead the UK company to step up negotiations to settle the case, as it has most of the 1,000 or so others arising from the blast. The report will also likely be used by the federal grand jury investigating whether to bring criminal charges against BP and its executives for the Texas explosion.

BP has been under scrutiny by regulators, Congress and the US Department of Justice following the explosion and closure of half of BP's Alaskan oilfield for severe corrosion. The CSB has led the investigation of the Texas City explosion.

"The CSB's investigation shows that BP's global management was aware of problems with maintenance, spending and infrastructure well before March 2005," said Carolyn Merritt, CSB chairwoman. She said BP did make some safety improvements, though the focus was on improving procedural compliance and reducing occupational injury rates, "while catastrophic safety risks remained".

"Unsafe and antiquated equipment designs were left in place, and unacceptable deficiencies in preventative maintenance were tolerated," Ms Merritt said.

Ms Merritt said budget cuts throughout the BP system caused a progressive deterioration of safety at the Texas City refinery, referring to the 25 per cent cut on fixed costs from 1998 to 2000.

Ronnie Chappell, BP spokesman, said: "BP agrees with CSB that the March 23, 2005 explosion and fire was a preventable tragedy. However, we do not understand the basis for some of the comments made by the CSB."

Mr Chappell said the BP Texas City fatal accident investigation team did not identify previous budget decisions or lack of expenditure as a critical factor, or immediate cause of the accident. Indeed, he said, maintenance spending had increased 40 per cent over the previous five years and was higher than the industry average per barrel of throughput.

Cost-Cutting Led To Blast At BP Plant, Probe Finds (WP)

By Steven Mufson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

BP PLC's cost-cutting efforts contributed to a Texas refinery explosion that killed 15 workers and injured 180 others in March 2005, a federal agency said yesterday.

Carolyn W. Merritt, chairman of the Chemical Safety Board, also said that BP senior management knew of "significant safety problems" at the Texas plant and 34 other BP facilities months or years before the explosion but that "unsafe and antiquated equipment designs were left in place, and unacceptable deficiencies in preventative maintenance were tolerated."

The conclusions, contained in a preliminary report by the board, may raise additional legal problems for the London oil company, which has already set aside $1.6 billion to resolve claims from the accident.

The company said it has settled with the families of all but one of the workers killed in the Texas City, Tex., incident and with hundreds injured. But Brent Coon, the lead plaintiffs' lawyer in the refinery case scheduled to start next week, said that the Justice Department had been asking for documents for its own investigation. "It's a good report," Coon said. "It says many of the things we've said all along."

Merritt said that "BP implemented a 25 percent cut on fixed costs from 1998 to 2000 that adversely impacted maintenance expenditures and infrastructure at the refinery." She said maintenance spending had declined throughout the 1990s, when the refinery belonged to Amoco Corp. Once Amoco merged with BP, she said, further cuts were imposed.

"Every successful corporation must contain its costs," Merritt said. "But at an aging facility like Texas City, it is not responsible to cut budgets related to safety and maintenance without thoroughly examining the impact on the risk of a catastrophic accident."

In the 30 years before the explosion, a worker had died in an accident at the Texas City refinery on average of once every 16 months.

BP, while conceding responsibility, disputed Merritt's conclusions. Company spokesman Ronnie W. Chappell said that BP had boosted maintenance spending by 40 percent in the five years before the accident and that an internal investigation "did not identify previous budget decisions or lack of expenditure as a critical factor or immediate cause of the accident."

He also said the number of injuries at Texas City had fallen 70 percent. "The significant reduction in workplace injury rates led the company to believe that conditions at the refinery were improving," Chappell said.

Don Holmstrom, the CSB's supervisory investigator, said that BP's safety initiatives had "focused largely on improving personnel safety -- such as slips, trips and falls -- rather than management systems, equipment design, and preventative maintenance programs to help prevent the growing risk of major process accidents."

The CSB also said that the training staff at the refinery was cut to eight in 2004 from 30 in 1997 and that the training budget was cut in half, that a 2003 BP audit called the Texas City infrastructure "poor" and cited a "checkbook mentality," that pre-explosion internal reports cited workers who said safety complaints were not heeded, and that a 2002 plan to eliminate a unit (known as a blowdown drum) was never implemented and that the unit exploded in 2005.

BP says it will eliminate blowdown drum units such as the one in Texas City from all its refineries by 2008. It has also moved more than 200 trailers that are used to house workers away from refinery processing equipment. It will spend more than $1 billion to refurbish the Texas City refinery over the next five years.

Coon wants to depose BP chief executive John Browne, but Chappell said Browne has "no unique knowledge" about the explosion. A Texas judge has ruled that Browne must submit to a deposition, but BP has appealed. BP's John Manzoni, head of global refining and marketing, and Mike Hoffman, a global refining executive, have already been deposed in the case.

"We are deeply sorry for what occurred and for the suffering caused by our mistakes," Chappell said.

Ex-FBI Agent Is Sentenced In Plea Agreement (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

Denise K. Woo is put on probation and fined for passing information to a suspected Chinese spy.

Seven years after she was suspended for allegedly disclosing classified material to a suspected Chinese spy, former FBI agent Denise K. Woo was sentenced Monday to probation and a $1,000 fine for improperly sharing confidential information, a misdemeanor.

Woo, 47, of Redondo Beach was transferred from white-collar investigations to a counterintelligence squad pursuing Chinese intelligence agents after her bosses learned in 1999 that she was friends with Jeffrey Wang, a Torrance engineer suspected by the FBI of committing espionage for China. Wang was never charged with a crime.

After her transfer, interviews show, she became convinced that Wang was innocent of wrongdoing and had been falsely accused of espionage by an FBI informant.

Though no charges were filed against Wang, Woo was accused by the FBI of inappropriately disclosing information about the probe to Wang. Suspended and later fired, Woo was then indicted two years ago for allegedly disclosing the existence of a national security wiretap on Wang's home telephone, revealing to Wang the identity of the FBI's confidential informant and lying to FBI agents.

Those felony charges, which carried a minimum 10-year prison sentence, were subsequently dismissed when Woo acknowledged in June that she had improperly passed along information about the FBI's confidential operative to Wang in October 1999.

Though authorities had no comment about the plea agreement, Woo said she had been unjustly accused at great personal expense to her and her family.

"This is kind of a bittersweet ending to a long and continuing tragic injustice," Woo said minutes after U.S. District Judge Gary Klausner imposed the sentence. "I am relieved that after years of false allegations, my family and I can finally get on with our lives."

DOJ_NMG_0089164

Woo's attorney, Carolyn J. Kubota, was biting in her criticism of the FBI for firing Woo and the Justice Department for prosecuting her.

"Denise was made a scapegoat for the government's absolutely bungled investigation of Mr. Wang," Kubota said outside court, where Woo was surrounded by family and friends.

Wang, who continues to work for a Defense Department contractor, sharply criticized the government's investigation of him and its prosecution of Woo.

"Denise Woo is the only person who was courageous and principled enough to stand up for me when the government made me a target of a completely false accusation of espionage," Wang said.

"The government should be ashamed for its reprehensible treatment of me in their unwarranted investigation and for prosecuting and ruining the life of Denise Woo, a person of great integrity, who stood up for an innocent man. Tragically, justice was not served in either of our cases."

The Chinese counterintelligence squad to which Woo was assigned was later riven by controversy associated with FBI veteran James J. Smith, a longtime supervisor who retired a year after Woo arrived.

Several years later, Smith was charged with gross mishandling of sensitive documents. He later pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of lying about an affair with longtime informant Katrina Leung.

California Seizes Record Number Of Pot Plants (AP)

AP, October 31, 2006

SACRAMENTO - California authorities seized a record number of marijuana plants this harvest season, uprooting nearly 1.7 million plants they valued at more than $6.7 billion, the state Department of Justice said Monday.

The 1,675,681 plants seized under the Campaign Against Marijuana Planting program beat last year's record of 1.1 million plants.

The state Justice Department's Bureau of Narcotic Enforcement, which leads the program, said the increase is largely due to more eradication teams, better aerial surveillance and air transport of law enforcement officers to the illegal plots. Gardens also are getting bigger, it said.

The program includes local, state and federal agencies that conducted 477 raids in 34 counties between late July and early October. Authorities said they made 27 arrests and seized 29 weapons.

Lake County had the most plants seized, with 314,603. It was followed by Shasta County (227,488), Mendocino (135,736) and Fresno (102,814).

About 80 percent of the marijuana was found on public land such as parks and national forests, with the rest on remote private land, the department said.

The program is aimed at large outdoor marijuana farms, and the figures do not include the thousands of plants seized from suburban homes in the Sacramento and Stockton areas in recent weeks.

COP KID'S LOOSE COLLAR (NYPOST)

By Lukas I. Alpert

The New York Post, October 30, 2006

A nationally known law-enforcement official's son, who pleaded guilty nearly a year ago to trying to buy 400 pounds of pot from an undercover agent, is still free, while his co-defendant languishes in federal prison, The Post has learned.

Sean Timoney, 26, pleaded guilty on Dec. 21, 2005, to conspiring to possess with intent to distribute marijuana. Since then, his sentencing date has been postponed twice, allowing him to work and undergo drug counseling, his lawyer said.

The fact that his father, John Timoney, is currently the police chief in Miami, was the chief of the Philadelphia police, and was once second in command at the NYPD has raised questions as to whether his son is getting preferential treatment.

"I think when someone has pleaded guilty and he has not been incarcerated nearly a year after the fact, you can draw your own conclusions from that," said a source close to the case. "Does this mean he's getting special treatment because of who his dad is? I don't know."

The younger Timoney was busted Nov. 1, 2005, along with Jae Seu, 23, after they handed over a duffel bag stuffed with nearly $450,000 cash to a undercover Drug Enforcement Administration agent in a Rockland County motel room as a down payment for the marijuana.

DOJ_NMG_0089165

But the whole episode was a sting captured on tape, and Timoney and Seu were arrested as they left the motel. Timoney was released after his father and mother, Noreen, put up their Miami condo as collateral for his $100,000 bond. Seu, of Glenside, Pa., was also released on $100,000 bond.

Since pleading guilty, Timoney has been allowed to remain free - restricted to the states of New York and Pennsylvania - while awaiting sentencing.

Seu, on the other hand, pleaded guilty on Feb. 28 and was incarcerated immediately, said his lawyer, Lee Ginsberg. Seu was sentenced in August to 37 months in prison.

Timoney has had two sentencing dates - April 10 and Aug. 14 - postponed. His next date is set for Nov. 13.

Both his lawyer and the federal prosecutor handling the case insist there is nothing unusual about him being free for so long.

"It's not uncommon," said his lawyer, Ed Hayes. "He had no record. He went into a drug-treatment program and went to work in the construction trades.

"What we said to the probation department is give him a chance to turn his life around, and they agreed to be flexible. He was not the organizer or the mastermind of a drug ring, he was just a driver."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard Hartunian agreed.

"There's no holdup. It may have been adjourned once or twice; this happens in federal court from time to time," he said.

Colombia Has Long Way To Go, But It's On Right Path (SAE)

San Antonio Express, October 30, 2006

Editor's note: In late September and early October, San Antonian Henry Catto traveled to Venezuela, Colombia and Nicaragua with a group of seven former U.S. ambassadors. In Nicaragua and Venezuela, they witnessed threats to democracy. In contrast, Colombia is presided over by a pro-U.S. president who makes democracy work in the most difficult of situations.

If geography is destiny, as some say, Colombia is a fine example.

As Milton Drucker, deputy U.S. ambassador to the South American nation, told our group, Colombia is "a vast unoccupied space on the Amazon basin; 200 inches of rain a year on the Pacific Coast. And in the east, desert." A cordillera splits the country. Bogota is at 8,000 feet, and the Amazon jungles are almost impenetrable. In short, the place is hard to govern.

But among these extremes are amazingly fertile lands that produce coffee, tobacco, rice, flowers, cattle and bananas. It has oil, natural gas, coal and emeralds of the finest quality. Its 46 million people make it the third-largest in South America, while its land area makes it No. 4. It has a stable political system, its three branches of government being similar to those in the United States. Literacy is 92 percent, and life expectancy is 70 for men and 76 for woman.

Lest the reader think it is a new Garden of Eden, however, there is indeed a serpent, a deadly one. Among its crops, coca and poppies flourish.

Coca cultivation has a 4,000-year history in the Andean region, and the arrival of the Europeans and later the Americans simply made the market bigger. Modern trends in agriculture and communications and an insatiable desire among North Americans and Europeans for cocaine and heroine led to the growth of today's criminal narcogangs, which are prepared to do whatever it takes to supply these deadly habits. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration estimates that 90 percent of the cocaine powder smuggled into the United States comes from Colombia.

Three armed groups, known by their initials, predominate: FARC, ELN and AUC. The first two grew from the teachings of Karl Marx and sought a Soviet-style republic. The AUC was formed by rural interests frustrated by the inability of governments to protect their property from the other two.

Time and the collapse of the Soviet Union changed the scene. Money and power, not political action, became the engine of growth for the drug trade. For the FARC, drugs and terror became the means; the ELN added kidnapping to the mix. The AUC took up the drug trade as well.

Democracy seems to have provided some hope of solving these problems. Two good presidents in a row, Andres Pastrana and Alvaro Uribe, have made a difference. Uribe was elected to a second term this year, and while he is a liberal, he has not hesitated to use the military against the drug lords. Military budgets have grown dramatically. The growth has not, however, been at the expense of social programs. Colombian tax rates, as a result, are among the highest in Latin America.

The president has negotiated with drug barons, but when negotiation fails, he goes to war. In the case of the AUC, negotiation has worked well. Some 30,000 members and 7,000 guerillas have turned in their arms and been accepted back into society.

Colombian officials are proud of the improved situation. We were told it is now safe to drive from Bogota to remote areas and there is, for the first time in recent history, a government presence in all 1,098 municipalities.

Uribe has been willing to talk about prisoner swaps, but the FARC wants lopsided deals, such as 500 guerrillas for 63 kidnapped civilians. The hostages are noncombatants, and among them are three American contractors, held for years. Ten of the 50 Americans kidnapped since 1992 have been murdered. Polls show public support for FARC at 1 percent.

Is this situation without hope? No. Some six years ago, the Colombian government, with U.S. support, started Plan Colombia, which pays small coca growers in remote areas to change crops. The plan also involves massive spraying of coca growth with insecticide and promotes human rights, alternative development and judicial reform.

Has it been a success? That is hard to judge. "Notes from Putumayo," a running commentary on the Center for International Policy's Web site by a visitor to that remote border state, left one thinking the "troubles" are better, though there is a long way to go. One problem is that the lack of roads makes getting any new crops to market difficult.

A personal observation: The trip left me feeling good about our ally in South America. One has to wish for the equal of President Uribe throughout the continent.

Henry Catto is a San Antonian who served as deputy ambassador to the Organization of American States and as ambassador to El Salvador, the European Offices of the United Nations and Great Britain. He is author of "Ambassadors at Sea: The High and Low Adventures of a Diplomat."

DEA (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, October 30, 2006

A Greensburg man is in the Westmoreland County Prison after allegedly impersonating a federal Drug Enforcement Administration agent and choking a man at a Donegal Township bar.

State police at Greensburg said the incident occurred about 10:30 p.m. Friday at the Fireside Inn on Route 31. Police said Richard McCormick allegedly grabbed Michael Cordell, of Somerset, around the neck, without provocation, and began to choke him.

According to police, McCormick told police he was a DEA agent and was attempting to get Cordell to comply with his instructions. McCormick allegedly pulled out a gun, again stating he was a DEA agent before leaving the bar.

Police caught up with McCormick in the bar's parking lot. First, he told police he was the complainant in the case. McCormick eventually had to be physically restrained and handcuffed before he was taken to prison, police said.

McCormick was found to be in possession of a Davis Derringer pistol, according to police.

The Immoral Majority (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

As usual, Republicans are hoping that righteous voters will come through for them on Election Day. But this year looks like the revenge of the sinners.

The sinners aren't easy to count, since they don't spend a lot of time doing grass-roots politicking. There is no Washington lobby for the Coalition of the Damned. They don't like to confess their urges to pollsters. But there are enough of them, particularly in places where Republicans are struggling, to cast doubt on the party's long-standing strategy.

Why did Republicans assume there was a Moral Majority? Where in the Bible does it say that the virtuous outnumber the wicked? When you define wickedness the way Republicans do, the numbers are daunting.

One of the G.O.P. Congress's few achievements this year was a law to crack down on Internet gambling, an industry that counted eight million American customers last year — about four times the membership of the Christian Coalition. The new law hasn't stopped the online gamblers from betting, but it will give them second thoughts about voting Republican.

The Republican war on marijuana — the chief priority of the current drug czar — isn't playing any better in the heartland. More than 40 percent of people over the age of 12 have tried marijuana, and more than three-quarters of Americans support legalizing it for medical purposes. The White House and the Justice Department have had little luck in their attempts to stop states from legalizing medical marijuana, but they have succeeded in alienating voters.

These federal intrusions are especially scorned by independent voters in the Western states where Republicans have been losing ground, like Colorado, Nevada, Arizona and Montana. Western Democrats have been siphoning off libertarian voters by moderating their liberal views on issues like gun control, but Republicans have been driving libertarians away with their wars on vice and their jeremiads against gay marriage (and their attempt to regulate that from Washington, too).

Libertarian voters tend to get ignored by political strategists because they're not easy to categorize or organize. They don't congregate in churches or union halls; they don't unite to push political agendas. Many don't even call themselves libertarians, although they qualify because of their social liberalism and economic conservatism: they want the government out of their bedrooms as well as their wallets.

They distrust moral busybodies of both parties, and they may well be the most important bloc of swing voters this election, as David Boaz and David Kirby conclude in a new study for the Cato Institute. Analyzing a variety of voter surveys, they estimate that libertarians make up about 15 percent of voters — a bloc roughly comparable in size to liberals and to conservative Christians, and far bigger than blocs like Nascar dads or soccer moms.

They're especially prevalent in the West, where half a dozen states have legalized medical marijuana. When Californians approved one of the first medical marijuana laws, in 1996, drug warriors were so convinced it would lead to a catastrophic spike in illegal use by teenagers that they sponsored a study to document the damage. But there was no catastrophe: after the law, marijuana use by teenagers actually declined in California.

In the decade since, as the Marijuana Policy Project documented in a recent study, popular support for legalized medical marijuana has increased in California and in virtually every other state with a similar law. Last year it was favored by 78 percent of respondents in a Gallup poll.

Yet these realities still haven't registered with Republicans in Washington. This year the White House drug czar, John Walters, and his minions have been out campaigning in Nevada, Colorado and South Dakota, which have marijuana initiatives on the ballot. The drug warriors are still sounding the discredited alarms about youths turning into potheads. Their fervor's not surprising — they may even believe their own hype.

What's surprising is the political stupidity of the meddling. Westerners, no matter what they think of marijuana, don't appreciate sermons from federal officials on how to vote. In 2002, when the White House campaigned against another marijuana ballot initiative in Nevada, the state's attorney general said it was "disturbing" to see the federal interference in a state election.

This year, with Republicans in so much trouble in the West, the missionaries from Washington aren't doing them any favors. They need every sinner's vote they can get.

Richmond Graduate Fuels Colorado Pot Movement (WT)

By Valerie Richardson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

DENVER -- If Coloradans vote to legalize marijuana statewide next week, it will be almost entirely because of the efforts of a pudgy, clean-shaven 24-year-old University of Richmond graduate.

Mason Tvert, campaign manager for Safer Alternatives for Enjoyable Recreation, has pushed Colorado to the forefront of the marijuana movement, first with his successful 2004 Denver campaign and now with the statewide Amendment 44.

The amendment would allow people 21 and older to possess up to 1 ounce of marijuana for personal use. If approved, it would make Colorado the first state to decriminalize marijuana.

It's a lofty goal for a campaign that, as Mr. Tvert describes it, consists of "two guys in a rental car." Mr. Tvert is running the effort from his cell phone and laptop, but that doesn't mean his opponents aren't taking him seriously.

Federal drug czar John P. Walters visited Colorado three times this year to denounce the effort, which almost every state lawmaker opposes. What Mr. Tvert brings to the table are energy, imagination, a knack for attracting free press and relentless tactics.

A case in point was an anti-Amendment 44 press conference Friday at the state capitol. Gov. Bill Owens, a Republican, and other state officials were expecting to address reporters on the dangers of pot, but instead were bombarded by more than 100 marijuana advocates, led by Mr. Tvert, chanting slogans and waving green campaign signs.

The protesters tried to drown out Mr. Owens and other speakers with jeers such as "Lie louder, Bill." A frustrated Mr. Owens finally responded, "Ladies and gentlemen, this is a sad day for Colorado."

Attorney General John Suthers chided Mr. Tvert for interrupting the governor's message. "I thought his behavior was reprehensible," he said.

Whether such tactics will Mr. Tvert him any votes is debatable. A Denver Post poll showed Amendment 44 trailing 57 percent to 34 percent, with 9 percent undecided.

Mr. Tvert, who is counting on a big turnout from students after his campus voter-registration drives, said his supporters aren't easily reached on land lines. What is clear is that Mr. Tvert has hit a chord with his primary message: Alcohol is more dangerous than marijuana, and therefore, marijuana should be legalized.

His message is backed by personal experience. He said that the summer before entering the University of Richmond, he drank himself unconscious during a concert and woke up in the emergency room.

He wasn't cited or punished, even though he was underage. He was subpoenaed later to testify against a fellow student who had been arrested for marijuana possession.

DOJ_NMG_0089168

"What it shows is that our government's priorities on drug education are so skewed," Mr. Tvert said. "Have you ever seen a government committee warning that you could die of drinking? No. But I've seen plenty of commercials telling people they could ruin their lives smoking pot."

Riverside County Cannot Join Medical Marijuana Suit (DS)

Desert Sun, October 30, 2006

Riverside County will not join a legal challenge to California's medical marijuana law, scheduled to be heard in San Diego Superior Court Nov. 16.

The county Board of Supervisors voted earlier this month to join the suit originally filed by San Diego, San Bernardino and Merced counties, but the court ruled Friday that Riverside would not be allowed to join the case.

"The court felt it was too late to intervene in the pending action in San Diego," said Pam Walls, assistant county counsel. "There was a briefing schedule and allowing (the county) to intervene, that would delay or alter the briefing schedule."

The suit seeks to overturn state requirements that counties issue medical marijuana identification cards to patients with a doctor's recommendation to use the drug.

Americans for Safe Access, and the California Chapter of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, both medical marijuana advocacy groups, and the American Civil Liberties Union are arguing against the counties' suit.

Both sides are looking to the court to resolve the conflict between federal law banning any use or cultivation of marijuana and California law allowing medical use.

Merriman Is Expected To Drop His Appeal (NYT)

By Michael S. Schmidt

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

San Diego Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman plans to drop his appeal of the four-game suspension he has received for testing positive for a performance-enhancing substance.

A deal between Merriman's lawyer and officials from the National Football League over when the suspension would take effect was being worked out last night.

Merriman's lawyer, David Cornwell, and Adolpho A. Birch III, the N.F.L. official who oversees testing, were trying to figure out a way for Merriman to drop the appeal and still make an appearance at the team's practice facility tomorrow to speak with his teammates before the suspension begins, according to a person briefed on the discussions between Cornwell and the league. A suspended player is barred from his team's headquarters.

The Chargers do not practice today, so Merriman would have to wait until tomorrow to address the team.

If Merriman does not drop the appeal by noon today, he must proceed with the appeal hearing that is scheduled for Nov. 7 in New York.

The N.F.L., which has not commented directly on Merriman's case, is expected to announce the suspension as soon as Merriman drops the appeal.

Word of Merriman's positive test was leaked to the news media before his appeal was resolved, creating an unusual situation in which he continued to play after the public had learned of his situation.

Typically, when a player tests positive, the league does not disclose details of the case until after the appeals process.

Cornwell said the steroid nandrolone was discovered in Merriman's system after he took a tainted over-the-counter dietary supplement. But under the N.F.L.'s rules, players are responsible for positive tests regardless of the supplements they take.

Merriman would miss the Chargers' next four games, against the Cleveland Browns, the Cincinnati Bengals, the Denver Broncos and the Oakland Raiders. He would return against the Buffalo Bills on Dec. 3.

The Chargers (5-2) are tied with the Broncos for first place in the American Football Conference West, and San Diego plays Denver on Dec. 10.

On Sunday, Merriman tied a career high with three sacks as the Chargers defeated the St. Louis Rams, 38-24, in San Diego. Throughout the game, fans loudly cheered him. Merriman has eight and a half sacks and is tied with Aaron Kampman of Green Bay for the league lead.

The use of largely unregulated over-the-counter supplements is so widespread that the N.F.L. certifies five products that are viewed to be clean of banned substances. Merriman said yesterday that the product he took was not one the league had certified. It is illegal to sell nandrolone, or any of its precursors, over the counter in the United States.

At practice yesterday, Merriman wore a boot on his right foot to protect his right heel, which he injured Sunday against the Rams.

When reporters asked him if his heel injury would affect his decision to drop the appeal, giving him four weeks to recover, Merriman winked.

"Yeah, my heel is hurt so bad I think I will probably be out three to four weeks," he said, according to The Associated Press. He added: "No, my heel is fine. I'm just trying to stay off it a little bit today."

Merriman May Drop Suspension Appeal (SDUT)

By Kevin Acee, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 30, 2006

After his three-sack day against the St. Louis Rams, Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman planned to speak with his advisers last night and discuss the possibility of dropping the appeal of his four-game suspension.

Merriman, who tested positive for the banned steroid Nandrolone earlier this month, maintains he was the victim of a tainted supplement. But he also knows he is unlikely to win his appeal based on the NFL's clearly stated policy that players are responsible for what they put in their body.

Merriman's appeal is to be heard Nov. 7, two days after the Chargers' next game. Dropping the appeal, which could happen as early as today, would mean Merriman would miss Sunday's game against the Browns and the three that follow it. If Merriman saw the appeal through to the Nov. 7 hearing, and the NFL took its time ruling on the appeal, there would be the possibility the suspension would not start until Nov. 19 and would encompass two games against AFC West rival Denver.

"I want to do what's best for the team," Merriman said. "I don't know what is going to happen yet."

Merriman yesterday dropped St. Louis quarterback Marc Bulger three times to move into a tie for first in the league with 8½ sacks for the season. He also hurried Bulger three times and tackled running back Steven Jackson at the line of scrimmage.

"(Playing) is always the outlet for everything," Merriman said. "I always had that growing up, just to be on the field and playing with these guys I love. And to come out with a win definitely helps everything.

"I love to go out and have as many sacks as I can every week. Even before this, I was looking to go out and prove a point – that I am one of the best linebackers."

Merriman's introduction on the video board in the first quarter was met with a loud cheer, and the chorus only grew with every big play.

"To see all those 56 jerseys out there, you couldn't ask for anything more than that," he said. "Walking into the stadium and people telling me how much of a role model I still am, that's what I look at my job to be. I'm just going to keep going out and doing the things, being myself and just playing football."

Defensive effort The Chargers defense fell to No. 2 in the league in total yards allowed, as the Chicago Bears moved to No. 1.

Ranked No. 1 all season, the Chargers allowed a season-high 412 yards yesterday and are allowing an average of 265.5 compared with the Bears' 245.9.

The Chargers' tackling was better yesterday than the previous Sunday at Kansas City, but it remained an elusive discipline at times.

"We still had some tackles we missed," coach Marty Schottenheimer said. "We are on a mission, and we are going to continue to work on that every day."

The Rams also threw for 311 yards, the highest total against the Chargers (by 90) this season. The Rams completed four passes of 20 yards or more. Their 29 such completions rank second in the league, and they entered and left the game with the league's fourth-ranked passing offense.

"They pass the ball 40-plus times, they're going to get yards," cornerback Drayton Florence said. "But our main thing was to go out and stop (Torry Holt) and (Isaac Bruce), two Pro Bowl receivers. We did pretty good. They got some cheap yards on us. But that's going to happen when a team's behind."

Tough homecoming The Rams opted not to play linebacker Pisa Tinoisamoa, the Vista High alum who broke a bone in his left hand last week during practice. Rams coach Scott Linehan said Tinoisamoa "would have basically been playing with one arm" because of swelling in the hand.

"It was very uncomfortable," Linehan said. "We felt that if he played, we would really be taking a step back for next week and even the week after. If something happened to (Dexter) Coakley, he might have been able to play, but we just felt it was too much of a risk."

Cromartie impressive Facing an offense that often had three receivers in the game, rookie cornerback Antonio Cromartie played more yesterday.

His role has increased almost every game, but yesterday was the most demanding, as he was assigned to Holt much of the time. Holt caught five passes for 48 yards, his third-lowest total this season.

DOJ_NMG_0089170

"I was with an All-Pro," Cromartie said.

Nuts 'n' Bolts Safety Bhawoh Jue was active for the first time since the season's second game. He did not start but played in certain packages.

Keenan McCardell's streak of games without a touchdown reached nine, the longest stretch since a 10-game drought in 1996.

Schottenheimer's 191st regular-season victory moved him into sole possession of fifth place all-time.

L.T. Goes Bananas; Merriman Uncertain About Drug Test Appeal (AP)

By Bernie Wilson

AP, October 30, 2006

SAN DIEGO - Halloween came a day early for the San Diego Chargers.

LaDainian Tomlinson wore a gorilla mask to his weekly news conference a day after he reminded everyone how good he is by gaining 240 yards from scrimmage and scoring three touchdowns.

Shawne Merriman didn't wear a mask, but the star outside linebacker was disguising his intentions regarding the appeal of his positive drug test.

After he had three sacks in Sunday's 38-24 win over the St. Louis Rams, Merriman said he'd speak with his attorney to discuss the possibility that he'd drop his appeal and begin serving a four-game suspension for testing positive for the steroid nandrolone.

But nothing had changed by Monday, except that Merriman was wearing a boot on his right foot to protect the heel he injured against the Rams.

"I don't know what is going to happen yet and someone has already said I'm thinking about dropping the appeal and what not, but I still have to find out what is going on myself," Merriman said. "I haven't decided anything yet. I'll find out sometime today or tomorrow what I am going to do, if I am going to do anything at all. It's just all part of the process.

Since his appeal is set for Nov. 7, Merriman was able to play against the Rams and would get to play in Sunday's home game against the Cleveland Browns, unless he decides to drop it.

Merriman said the positive drug test stems from a tainted supplement, and not many people give him a chance of avoiding a four-game suspension.

If the appeal process drags out and he loses, he could miss both of the Chargers' games against AFC West rival Denver, on the road Nov. 19 and at home on Dec. 10. The Chargers and Broncos are tied for the division lead at 5-2.

Asked if his heel injury would affect his decision, he said with a wink: "Yeah, my heel is hurt so bad I think I will probably be out three-to-four weeks."

Then he added: "No, my heel is fine. I'm just trying to stay off it a little bit today."

"I just want to stay on the field. That is all I'm considering right now," said Merriman, the 2005 Defensive Rookie of the Year who has a team-high 8 1/2 sacks. "Obviously I want to be back as soon as possible if anything is going to happen at all. But assuming that something might happen, I have to do what's best to get back on the field as soon as possible."

Merriman said he'd feel cheated if he didn't get to state his case. "But at the same time its not about me proving a point or proving anything anymore. It's about me playing football."

Tomlinson, meanwhile, had some fun a day after going bananas with 240 yards from scrimmage, the third-highest total in his six-year career.

His 183 yards rushing were his eighth-highest total, and he added 57 yards on three catches. He's the NFL's second-leading rusher with 656 yards, and is second with 959 yards from scrimmage.

Tomlinson quieted critics who thought he's lost a step.

"As a gorilla, I don't think he's lost a step. I don't think I could catch him," said the guy in the gorilla mask who sounded an awful lot like L.T.

Armed Man Shot By Police Has Previous Gun Conviction (PPG)

By Torsten Ove,

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 30, 2006

The man shot by a Pittsburgh police sergeant in Beltzhoover yesterday after police said he pointed a gun at them is a felon who wasn't allowed to have a weapon and had already spent time in prison for carrying an illegal gun.

DOJ_NMG_0089171

Court records indicate Jamaar A. Blakey, 22, was on probation following a gun conviction in U.S. District Court in 2004.

Mr. Blakey, who is in serious condition at Mercy Hospital with a wound to his chest, was indicted in June 2004 under Project Safe Neighborhoods, a U.S. Justice Department initiative to combat gun violence that has sent many Pittsburgh-area felons to federal prison in recent years. Under federal law, felons can't have guns or ammunition.

Mr. Blakey, who also has several drug convictions, was sentenced in November 2004 to 30 months in federal prison for possession of a handgun and ammunition on Feb. 28 of that year. He was released on Aug. 24 of this year and was serving three years of supervised release, the federal version of probation.

Pittsburgh police shot Mr. Blakey after they said he pointed a gun at an officer following a brief car chase.

Feds Make Arrest In SLC Library Bombing (SLT)

By Jason Bergreen, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, October 31, 2006

Federal authorities have arrested a former Utah resident with possession of an unregistered destructive device stemming from a bomb explosion in September that caused the evacuation of the Salt Lake City Main Library.

The single federal charge againstThomas James Zajac, formerly of Salt Lake City and Provo, was filed Friday and unsealed Monday after a joint investigation by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the Salt Lake City Police Department and the FBI.

Investigators believe that Zajac, age unavailable, entered the library, 210 E. 400 South, on Sept. 15 carrying a 1 3/4 inch by 1/2 inch pipe bomb concealed in a white paper bag from Arby's restaurant, court documents state.

The bomb also consisted of a rocket igniter believed to have been purchased at an out-of state hobby store that was apparently mounted on a piece of cardboard that had an unknown handwritten message on it.

The bomb, which had been in the library for up to 60 minutes, exploded on the third floor, destroying a large, double-paned window, but it caused no injuries.

A witness told authorities he was on the third floor and heard a hissing noise before the explosion, but didn't recognize anyone in the area leaving, court documents state.

But another witness told a Salt Lake City police detective that he saw a heavy-set man wearing a green polo shirt and Khaki pants sit down in a chair next to the first witness and near a column where the bomb exploded. He described the man as being about 5 feet 10 inches tall, with dark hair and between 30 and 50 years old.

The witness told the detective that the man avoided making eye contact with him and kept looking down at the floor. He was not close enough to see what, if anything, was in the man's hands, court documents state.

Surveillance video from the library captured a man with the same description entering the east side of the library carrying a paper bag. The man entered restrooms on the second and third floors.

IMMIGRATION:

Government Says Border Arrests Decline (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, October 31, 2006

U.S. Customs and Border Patrol agents made fewer arrests of illegal immigrants trying to enter the country last year, the government said Monday in a report that credits stronger enforcement.

Arrests fell 8.4 percent from 1.2 million in fiscal year 2005 to 1.1 million last year. It was the first decrease since 2003, the Homeland Security Department said in releasing its annual statistics on illegal immigration.

"What we ideally would like to do is stop them from coming in the first place. The extent that we see fewer crossing the border, that suggests that line of defense is working," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said in a news briefing.

He noted that the department added more than 1,900 border patrol agents in the last year and installed fencing and other security measures such as electronic sensors and cameras.

"These kinds of successes underscore the importance of viewing what we do to protect our borders as part of a comprehensive solution, one that allows us to target the worst of the worst," Chertoff said.

Statistics released Monday also show the government:

_Removed a record 186,600 illegal immigrants from the United States in the past year. That's a 10 percent increase from 2005.

_Seized more than 1.3 million pounds of marijuana, a 13 percent increase from the previous year.

DOJ_NMG_0089172

_Nearly tripled the number of fugitive operations teams, from 18 to 50, as part of efforts to locate, apprehend and remove criminal aliens.

The figures, which were complete a month ago, were released a week after President Bush signed a bill authorizing 700 miles of new fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

The new law, which didn't come up with new funding beyond the $1.2 billion previously approved by Congress, gives Republican candidates a pre-election platform for asserting they're tough on illegal immigration. Congressional elections are Nov. 7.

On Monday, Chertoff said improved border security will not be enough. The centerpiece of Bush's immigration policy, a guest worker program, remains stalled in Congress.

"Without a temporary worker program, getting control of the border by the end of 2008 would be very, very difficult," Chertoff said.

Immigration Arrests Down 8% For Year (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

The U.S. Border Patrol apprehended 8 percent fewer illegal immigrants last fiscal year than the year before, reversing a two-year increase in the historically volatile benchmark, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced yesterday.

Chertoff credited the drop of nearly 100,000 apprehensions largely to the Bush administration's strategy of deporting virtually all non-Mexican border crossers as fast as they are caught, deterring them and others in what had been the fastest-growing group of illegal immigrants. After quadrupling the previous four years, apprehensions of "other than Mexican" border crossers fell 57,144, or 35 percent, to 108,026 last year.

The total number of apprehensions in the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30 was nearly 1.1 million.

"We have begun to see, for the first time, a significant turnaround in terms of the number of illegals that we are finding crossing the border," Chertoff said. "The message here is not 'Time to celebrate, we've done the job.' But rather, we ought to be encouraged, but even more determined to get the job completed."

Analysts immediately disputed Chertoff's claim of an unprecedented decline in arrests. Border Patrol apprehensions have risen and fallen like a roller coaster over the years, peaking at almost 1.7 million in 2000 before bottoming out at 932,000 in 2003. Causes include earlier threats of congressional crackdowns; the security climate after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks; and changes in Border Patrol funding and strategies.

Experts instead called yesterday's announcement the administration's latest effort to walk a political tightrope in its handling of illegal immigration heading into the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

They said President Bush's aides are trying to placate conservative and other critics by citing progress in enforcement at the border. At the same time, the White House is continuing to push for a broader overhaul of immigration policy, including a temporary-worker program and a chance for 12 million illegal immigrants to earn citizenship, that is stalled in Congress.

Chertoff backed away yesterday from the Bush administration's pledge to control the nation's borders by 2008, saying it would be "very, very difficult" without a guest-worker program, which the House has resisted. Proponents in Congress say it would take 18 months to six years to set up such a program, after paying for a long-needed computerized worker-verification system to manage it.

"Certainly, I don't think an 8 percent drop in apprehensions is something that we should even be paying attention to," said Demetrios Papademetriou, president of the Migration Policy Institute, which recently called for a comprehensive overhaul of immigration policy. "We don't see a trend line in apprehensions, and apprehensions are not the right yardstick," Papademetriou said.

The arrest total does not measure the number of illegal immigrants who evade capture, experts said, and is affected by fluctuations in law enforcement efforts to catch border crossers.

Steven A. Camarota, research director for the Center for Immigration Studies, which backs stronger enforcement and decreased immigration, congratulated the administration for making significant gains, albeit "very late in the game . . . from a very low starting point." Citing public polling on Americans' attitude toward immigration, he said, "The administration finally understands" that enforcement "is the prerequisite, the starting point, the key to any discussion."

Chertoff denied any political motivation for the early release of the Border Patrol statistics, which are usually reported in January. He said he "owed the public kind of a year-end closeout," since he made similar reports every few months.

Chertoff cited "a very, very significant increase" and "dramatic" shift in U.S. targeting of employers whose business models are based on the use of illegal labor. The United States brought 716 criminal worksite enforcement arrests and charges in 2006, up from 24 in 1999 and 25 in 2002, Chertoff said.

"Although people will squawk about it, the answer to those squawks is to go ahead and finish the job of a comprehensive strategy," Chertoff said. "The answer to the complaints is not to simply turn our backs on violations of the law."

Under the old catch-and-release policy in the summer of 2005, 80 percent of non-Mexicans apprehended at the border were let go inside the United States, pending their hearings, because of a shortage of detention space. But for the past three months, all non-Mexicans have been held pending expedited deportation. Word has filtered back to potential border crossers, who are less likely to try to enter the United States illegally, Chertoff said, and Border Patrol agents have more time to work on other cases.

Chertoff declined to say whether or when DHS would complete 700 miles of a double-layered fence on the U.S.-Mexico border recently approved by Congress and the president. Instead, he cited plans over the next three to six years to build a "virtual fence" that includes physical barriers, electronic remote sensing and vehicle barriers, or other measures where fencing is impractical or ineffective.

"I think our ultimate view is that we want to have a virtual fence across the entire border," Chertoff said. "My disposition is to let the professionals decide what is the best lay-down of all of this."

Since the United States began building a 14-mile barrier south of San Diego in 1990, illegal immigration has shifted to more remote areas. But at 1.1 million, the annual number of apprehensions is about the same as it was in 1991.

Drop In Border Arrests Tied To Enhanced Security (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

An 8 percent drop in the number of apprehensions of illegal aliens on U.S. borders in fiscal 2006 was hailed yesterday by the Department of Homeland Security as the result of enhanced border enforcement, but both immigration advocates and proponents questioned the claim.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said that the challenge of controlling the borders "has been with us for 30 years," and that the problem will not be solved in 30 minutes or in 30 days.

"But what is important is to put into place a strategy that, if consistently followed, will put us on a course that will get us security at the border," he said at a press conference at the Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center in Washington. "That's what the public has a right to expect."

Mr. Chertoff also said a guest-worker program was needed to slow the flow of illegals into the United States, although conservative House Republicans have blocked efforts by the Bush administration to pass a temporary-worker bill. He said getting control of the border without such a program would be "very, very difficult."

Frank Sherry, executive director of the National Immigration Forum, said enhanced border security measures by the administration and Congress may have had an effect on the number of illegal entries, but the government's interpretation had the sound of "an infamous general who once said there was a light at the end of the tunnel."

"The problem of illegal immigration didn't start at the border, and it's not going to end at the border," said Mr. Sherry, whose organization builds support for public policies that welcome immigrants and refugees. He said the government has to deal with the 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens now in the United States and their employers.

Mr. Sherry said the drop in the number of border apprehensions may be the result of "smugglers and migrants trying to figure out where the border is most vulnerable."

Steven A. Camarota, research director at the Center for Immigration Studies, which seeks to limit immigration, said it was difficult to determine what the decline meant because there is "no solid body of information" on how many undetected people cross daily into the United States.

Mr. Camarota also said migrants looking to come to this country may simply have opted for other methods, including readily available border-crossing cards and temporary visas, which often result in overstays.

"This well may be a sign that the modest steps taken by the Bush administration to deal with illegal immigration have been effective," he said. "But we just don't know. With a number that falls into the margin of error, it's very hard to tell if this is a trend or just a dip."

In fiscal 2006, apprehensions dropped to 1.1 million from 1.2 million in fiscal 2005, which Homeland Security officials attributed to additional U.S. Border Patrol agents, enhanced technology and the presence of 6,000 National Guard troops.

But it is not known how many people enter the country illegally each year, with estimates on undetected aliens ranging from two to 10 for every one who is caught.

DOJ_NMG_0089174

Homeland Secretary Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers, who heads U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said ICE set records for enforcement activity, ending the long-standing practice of "catch and release" on the nation's borders.

She said that ICE removed 186,600 illegal aliens from the country in fiscal 2006, a 10 percent increase over fiscal 2005, and that there were more than seven times as many worksite enforcement cases as in 2002.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Treasury May Trim Note Offerings Borrowing Estimate Is Cut Amid Lower Deficit, Surge In Corporate-Tax Receipts By CAMPION WALSH And BENTON IVES-HALPERIN (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

NEW YORK -- The Treasury is expected to pare its three-year note offerings in this quarter's refunding, a move analysts say is a minor adjustment after the drop in the budget deficit.

The Treasury is likely to announce tomorrow the sale of $33 billion in debt securities, comprising $20 billion in three-year notes and $13 billion in 10-year notes, according to the median estimate of eight dealers surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires. That amount of three-year notes would be $1 billion less than last quarter's sale. "I really see no reason to change the [refunding] offering amounts substantially," said Citigroup Inc. economist Christopher Wiegand. "Treasury borrowing needs are running smaller than even optimists on the budget deficit thought they would be at this point."

The Treasury yesterday reduced its estimate of the quarter's borrowing needs by 39% to $63 billion, citing a surge in corporate-tax receipts that left it with more cash than expected. But it also said borrowing needs would rise to a quarterly record of $175 billion in the January-March period. A Treasury official said government-debt managers would have to re-examine issuance plans if deficits continue to narrow.

The budget deficit fell 22% in the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30 to $247.7 billion, as an expanding economy lifted tax revenues. Government-debt managers will make most of their adjustments for the deficit in issues of short-term bills, preferring to keep stable supplies of longer-maturity debt, analysts said.

Primary dealers are divided over how long the narrowing of the deficit will continue, with several projecting increased red ink this fiscal year as economic growth slows. The budget outlook could hinge on whether Democrats take control of Congress after next week's midterm elections, said William O'Donnell, head of interest-rate strategy and research for UBS AG.

Separately, Treasury bonds ended little changed yesterday. At 4 p.m., the benchmark 10-year note rose 3/32 point, or 93.75 cents per $1,000 face value, at 101 19/32. Its yield fell to 4.671% from 4.681% Friday, as yields move inversely to prices. The 30-year bond was up 7/32 point at 95 17/32 to yield 4.785%.

Hybrids Aim at Retail Investors

A string of new hybrid offerings, which carry features of both debt and equity, hit the investment-grade corporate-bond market, with two borrowers selling securities in small denominations to woo individual investors. Countrywide Financial Corp. will sell $300 million of 60-year notes that will be noncallable for five years. The deal, which is rated Baa3 by Moody's Investors Service and BBB-plus by Standard & Poor's Ratings Service, will consist of 12 million shares to be sold at $25 each.

Countrywide, which has earmarked about $1.8 billion for hybrid issuance, will use the proceeds from the sale to repurchase common stock. The company said last week that it plans to buy back up to $2 billion of stock in the fourth quarter. Bank of America Corp. was in the market with a benchmark-size perpetual offering that also will price at a face value of $25.

Such deals aimed at individuals, who typically invest between $25,000 and $50,000 per transaction, have become popular with borrowers as buyers have lined up to include hybrids in their portfolios. The smaller denominations make it easier for this type of investor to digest, as the $1,000 denomination more typically sold to institutional investors is too big.

Merc Taps Credit Derivatives

The Chicago Mercantile Exchange is taking its first steps to tap into the $26 trillion credit-derivatives market by seeking regulatory approval to list credit-event futures on three companies.

The largest U.S. futures exchange filed documents earlier this month with the Commodity Futures Trading Commission seeking approval to list credit-event futures for Centex Corp., Tribune Co. and Jones Apparel Group Inc.

The futures are five-year contracts that allow participants to hedge their risk against such events as bankruptcy, default, nonpayment and debt restructuring. All three companies have credit ratings near or below the investment grade-junk barrier. The Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. unit chose the companies based, in part, on their credit ratings and their level of liquidity in five-year credit-default swaps, said Merc spokeswoman Pamela Plehn. She also said the Merc wanted to pick firms from different industries. Credit-default swaps also allow investors to protect their debt holdings against default.

Ms. Plehn said the exchange plans to add other companies to its credit-event product line. The exchange hopes to begin trading credit-event futures on its Globex electronic platform in the first quarter, she said.

IGs' Increasing Influence (FEDTIMES)

By Daniel Friedman

Federal Times, October 31, 2006

Outsourcing, terrorism drive more work to investigators

Under a cover that includes an image of a woman's midriff, a report released last month by the Interior Department's inspector general sums up thousands of employee visits to pornographic and gambling Web sites on office computers.

An Oct. 11 report by the Justice Department IG details a former Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives Bureau director's request for a lavish office with features like remote-controlled doors.

And at the Education Department, a September IG report describes officials' efforts to steer purchases away from disfavored textbook makers. The report quotes an e-mail in which a program director wrote, "They are trying to crash our party and we need to beat the [expletive] out of them."

The spate of headline-grabbing revelations underscores a trend. With the explosion of government procurement and more contracts to audit, and with an expanded law enforcement role in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks, inspectors general have more work and responsibilities, observers of the oversight community say.

"The mission of the inspector general has broadened very substantially over the years," said former Transportation Department IG Kenneth Mead.

And more responsibility may mean more clout. The Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction got expanded budgetary purview through legislation signed Oct. 17 by the president. Earlier this month, the Justice Department announced the formation of a task force, composed mostly of IGs, to investigate procurement fraud. A House bill, currently before the Government Reform Committee, would make IGs harder to fire and allow them to submit budgets straight to Congress and the Office of Management and Budget, instead of agency heads. The legislation could include steps to increase coordination among IGs and other oversight organizations. The measures are intended to increase IGs' independence, which some think is lacking at agencies where IG budgets are controlled by management.

Some say IGs are overreaching.

"Audit demands and the scope of demands [are] growing, because of some real and some perceived problems in the process over the last few years," said Stan Soloway, president of the Professional Services Council, an association of government contractors. Soloway said the result is unnecessary and wasteful audits.

Many IGs, meanwhile, said they are struggling to meet the growing demands despite flat budgets and staff levels. And with no authority to enforce recommendations, they must develop strategies to effect change.

Growth areas

Much of the added demand on IGs comes from the growth of government procurement. Federal contracting increased 83 percent from 2000 to 2005, according to data on Fedspending.org, a Web site maintained by the nonprofit group OMB Watch.

While General Services Administration Administrator Lurita Doan recently announced plans to use private firms for pre-award audits of contracts, work currently done by the agency's IG, that appears to be an exception. Across government, IG auditors say they are reviewing more and bigger contracts.

"Procurement is one of the major challenges in almost every agency," said Energy Department IG Gregory Friedman, who is vice chairman of the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency, a group that includes the 29 presidentially appointed IGs.

But Soloway said IGs have increased contract audits at a pace unjustified by rising outsourcing. He said, for example, that IGs are wasting money auditing fixed-price contracts, which are intended to alleviate the need for extensive reviews.

"I think you see some overreach in some cases," he said.

The FBI's 2001 decision to focus more on preventing terrorism also contributes to the increase in the IGs' workload. The decision required the FBI to cut back on some criminal investigations, and IG investigators have helped pick up the slack in areas like public corruption and contract fraud.

The Patriot Act gave many IGs expanded law enforcement capabilities. And IGs' broad subpoena power and ability to investigate both criminal and civil matters already gives them power that many law enforcement agencies lack.

IGs in 2005 doubled over the previous year the number of companies and individuals barred from doing business with the government, helped convict more criminals and convinced managers to cut more costs in programs they audited, according to an annual report summarizing IG work across government. The number of federal employees, local officials and contractors who faced adverse action, such as termination, due to IG investigations jumped 40 percent from the prior year, according to the report.

Hurricane Katrina and the completion of an unusual number of investigations may have inflated those numbers, Friedman said. But he said IGs have certainly become more active than in past years.

Some observers say IGs are addressing a role left vacant by Congress' abandonment of assertive oversight. "That stuff isn't going on on the Hill anymore," said Linda Gustitus, a former chief of staff to Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich. "This Congress has absolutely been pathetic in terms of oversight," Gustitus added, citing, for example, a lack of hearings on Iraqi contracting problems.

IGs are also responding to a growth in information technology spending and increased demand for data security. In their annual management challenge lists, about three-quarters of IGs called IT and cybersecurity major challenges at their agencies, Friedman said.

Of the 600 employees at Homeland Security's IG office, 40 now work full time on IT audits, up from 25 in 2003, according to James Taylor, the deputy IG.

With the number of employees in the 57 federal IG offices up just 600, to about 11,600, since 2001, new demands force tough choices about how to deploy staff, IGs said.

"We are forced to do a form of triage and deal with the most pressing issues," Friedman said.

The Homeland Security IG got extra funds to review programs created after Hurricane Katrina, but it still had to reduce attention to areas like intelligence and science and technology to meet new demands, Taylor said.

Mead said that during his tenure, other priorities forced him to devote less attention to aviation and highway programs than he would have liked.

"In effect, you have to make choices about where you're going to get the bigger bang for your buck," he said.

Leading reform

IGs are required to produce regular reports, but they have no formal power to implement recommendations. They use varying tactics to exert influence. Their relationship with management helps determine their approach.

Interior's IG, Earl Devaney, in congressional testimony last month, said he grew frustrated over the years by former Secretary Gale Norton's failure to address ethics violations by top officials. As a result, he began blasting Interior in a manner designed to generate media attention. And despite what he calls a better relationship with the current secretary, Dirk Kempthorne, Devaney's office has stayed vocal.

"If you don't get a certain amount of publicity for the reports, you're not going to be able to have as much clout to change the system as you'd want," said Kris Kolesnik, a Devaney spokesman. "The purpose is to get it out in the public domain, so there's more of an incentive for the people in the department to get it right."

At Homeland Security, where officials struggle with the challenges of a hastily assembled organization, Taylor, a former chief financial officer, described a different dynamic.

Homeland Security officials regularly ask for IG opinions on management challenges, and under Inspector General Richard Skinner, the office works to provide timely and actionable reports, Taylor said. The office has also hired people with experience doing the work they are evaluating.

"We want to make sure our goals and objectives are matching up with [management's]," Taylor said.

"We don't play gotcha," he noted. "We don't do interviews. . . . It really discourages risk-taking when you've got so many people waiting to find something wrong."

Many IGs say they balance their partnership with management and their independence. They seek a level of closeness with management that does not compromise their independence, and a degree of separation that does not render them impotent.

"It's a fine line to walk," said Justice Department IG Glenn Fine. "You have got to be independent, but on the other hand, you have got to communicate because the goals are similiar."

Many managers advocate sustained and meaningful communication with IGs. While management and auditors may not agree, they should share certain expectations, officials said.

"We need to have consistency and agreement around . . . the rules of the game," Soloway said.

At a panel this month on IGs' effect on IT, Labor Department CFO Samuel Mok said he works to keep his IG in the loop. Mok said he appoints staff to liaison with OIG.

"If something happens and you can't pick up the phone and get some informal feedback, you're not doing your job," he said, though he admits his approach can backfire.

Doug Glenn, GSA's deputy CFO speaking at the same event, said IG reports can be an alternative way to get "the powers that be" to address problems.

DOJ_NMG_0089177

"A lot of times we need an IG report or an auditor report that says, 'Hey, this is an issue,'" he said.

Fights Brew Over House Posts (WP)

By Lois Romano And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

As Democrats enter the final days of their push to take back control of the House in next week's election, two divisive backroom leadership fights are brewing within the party, raising fears that Democratic unity could be fraying even before the first votes are cast.

For some Democrats, the battle between Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), the minority whip, who had been expected to ascend to majority leader without opposition, and Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) threatens the party's efforts to appear ready to govern.

In what could be another high-profile showdown, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the ambitious former White House aide who runs the Democratic campaign arm of the House, may seek the third-ranking post of majority whip, pitting him against Democratic Caucus Chairman James E. Clyburn (S.C.), the only African American in a leadership position.

This could exacerbate racial strains in the House, since both the Congressional Black Caucus and the Congressional Hispanic Caucus have complained that Emanuel is insensitive to minority concerns. Members of the black caucus accused him of using strong-arm tactics to collect dues for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, and the Hispanic caucus withheld its dues last year until Emanuel hired a Hispanic staffer at the DCCC.

On one point there is no disagreement: If the Democrats win, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) will be elected speaker. While she has not taken a public position in the Hoyer-Murtha battle, she is politically and personally much closer to Murtha and has a long-standing rivalry with Hoyer.

But members, aides and outside consultants who are closely watching the contest said Murtha has an uphill battle because Hoyer has worked for a decade to rebuild the majority, raising millions of dollars for his colleagues and recruiting Democrats to run.

And Pelosi may be irked that Murtha publicly picked this fight, according to some Democrats.

"I suspect that she feels like most other members, that we'd rather not have this divisive contest," Clyburn said of the majority leader's race. "We've spent a lot of the last two years getting the caucus together. We're more cohesive than we've been in a long time, and most people appreciate the climate we're currently operating in."

Murtha is seen by many in the House as an old-school political insider whose power is derived from his position as ranking member of the Appropriations subcommittee on defense and from the money he can direct to members' districts. A former Marine who has always been pro-military, the 16-term congressman was embraced by his liberal colleagues last year when he called for the immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. But Murtha's stand on the war has not automatically gained him support from the left in his quest to become majority leader.

Hoyer, a moderate, actively solicited support from a number of liberals who are not comfortable with Murtha's conservative positions opposing abortion and gun control. Rep. Maxine Waters (Calif.), chairman of the Out of Iraq Caucus, announced her support for Hoyer, although she praised Murtha's plan for troop withdrawal. Other liberals supporting Hoyer include Reps. Barney Frank (Mass.), John Lewis (Ga.) and Jerrold Nadler (N.Y.).

"Steny has done a tireless job to get back the House for us for more than a decade," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (Calif.), a strong Pelosi ally who is in line to become chairman of the Government Reform Committee if the Democrats win. "Given the leadership he has shown and his ability to unite Democrats, he's the logical choice."

Other Hoyer supporters question why Murtha has chosen to pick a fight now when the Democrats are the most unified they have been in 50 years and are on the verge of taking control of the House.

"I have a lot of respect for Jack Murtha, but I remain shocked that he is talking about making a run for majority leader," said Rep. Ellen Tauscher (Calif.), a Hoyer supporter and a leading Democratic moderate. "I don't understand it. I'm not supportive of it, and it's having a deleterious effect on what I think and hope will be a huge win on November 7."

Murtha's supporters are quick to dismiss charges that the veteran lawmaker is sowing discord. They say Hoyer's supporters are acting as if he has a right to the majority leader's post, when in fact such leadership contests are routine.

"This decision is going to get made the week we get back," said Rep. Michael E. Capuano (Mass.), a Murtha supporter. "There's not going to be a lot of time for it to fester. The minute it's over, we will all be pushing in the same direction."

Hoyer and Murtha have long had a rocky relationship, according to Democratic sources, and Hoyer's allies say he is not happy that he has had to spend valuable time before an important election shoring up his support. "There isn't going to be a majority leader's race if we don't win this election," Hoyer said in a brief interview last weekend.

Murtha said recently that he is running because he believes that Hoyer has been disloyal to Pelosi, an accusation that Hoyer has denied. "The guy has been trying to undercut her ever since she was elected minority leader," Murtha said. "Damn right it's true."

Some Democrats predicted that Murtha will not stay in the race if he is not fairly certain he can win, for fear of diluting his power. But Murtha supporters say he will stick it out because it is difficult to predict what members will do in secret balloting. "Look, both have duplicate names on their list," said Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (Va.), a Murtha supporter. "No one wants to get on the wrong side of either of them."

The Murtha-Hoyer competition could be eclipsed in bitterness if Emanuel presses ahead with a campaign for the whip's post. Kathleen Connery, a spokeswoman for Emanuel, said the lawmaker "morally feels obligated to the contributors, candidates and the caucus to focus like a laser on November 7, and anyone not doing that is not delivering for the caucus."

That said, aides close to Emanuel said he has not ruled out a challenge.

"That would be a hotly contested race," said Rep. Melvin Watt (N.C.), the chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus.

Staff researcher Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

If Dems Take Over The House ... (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Democratic takeover of the U.S. House would put more women and minorities in positions of power, as well as more senior citizens. That much is certain.

What else a Democratic majority might bring is a topic of heated debate as the campaign for control of Congress moves into its final days.

Democrats say it will mean longer workweeks in the House of Representatives to pass tax cuts for the middle class and to devise a strategy to get U.S. troops out of Iraq. They promise more time in the hot seat for members of the Bush administration. "We have a broad agenda," says Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., a co-chairman of his party's House campaign.

President Bush and other Republicans say Democrats in charge will be bad for the economy and the war on terrorism. "The Democrats want to raise your taxes," Bush said Monday in Georgia. "However they put it, the Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses."

Bush stressed that "this election is far from over." Polls give Democrats their best chance in 12 years of gaining control of the House. They need to pick up 15 seats. Democrats need six seats for a Senate takeover. Though less likely, it's not out of the question.

Except for 20 months during his first two years in office, when Democrats held a one-vote Senate majority, Bush has worked with a GOP-led Congress. Even with a Democratic one, the president will still be able to block bills he doesn't like with a veto.

Changing priorities

Even so, a Democratic House would radically alter the balance of power in Washington. That's because House rules — unlike those in the Senate — give the majority sweeping authority to set the legislative agenda.

Some possible changes:

·New power brokers. The most dramatic difference would come at the top. House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi is poised to become the first woman to serve as speaker of the House. Under the Constitution, the San Franciscan would be behind Vice President Cheney to succeed Bush.

Pelosi already has signaled that she will name committee chairpersons based on seniority. Republican Speakers Newt Gingrich and Dennis Hastert sometimes did not do so. The gavel would go to at least four African-Americans, including John Conyers of Michigan at the Judiciary Committee helm and three women, including California's Juanita Millender-McDonald and New York's Nydia Velázquez, who would be the only Hispanic committee leader. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, who is openly gay, would lead a committee.

Currently, all of the House GOP committee chairmen are white and male.

It would also increase the age of House chairpersons. In January 2005, 11 Republican committee leaders were younger than 60. Seven prospective Democratic chairpersons will be over 70 when the 110th Congress convenes in January. "Just because they are old doesn't mean they aren't good," says Matt Angle, a former congressional aide and Democratic political consultant.

Republicans see it differently. "The House will have chairmen who come from the old order," says House Republicans' former No. 2 leader Tom DeLay, suggesting they will be heavy-handed and unyielding to anything but Democratic Party orthodoxy.

DOJ_NMG_0089179

One committee chairmanship appears uncertain. Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., is at the end of her term on the Intelligence Committee. Pelosi has not said she would renew Harman's term.

·New issues. Pelosi wants to raise the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour. She wants to halve the interest rate on student loans and enact the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission to fight terrorism.

On health care, Democrats want to give the federal government the authority to negotiate lower prescription-drug prices for seniors and expand research using embryonic stem cells.

And Pelosi wants to do all of that in her first 100 hours as speaker.

Pelosi also has promised a bill that would ban lobbyists from underwriting lawmakers' trips and prohibit corporations from providing discount travel on private jets. That goes beyond legislation that is currently stalled.

On Iraq, Democrats are likely to press for withdrawal of U.S. troops, but Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a leading critic of the Iraq war, says any policy changes must be made "in conjunction with the White House."

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., says the House Energy and Commerce Committee under his leadership would explore universal health care and debate ways to diversify the nation's energy supplies.

Prospects for a sweeping immigration overhaul could improve if Democrats controlled the House. A bipartisan bill that passed the Senate and won Bush's support has been blocked by Hastert and other GOP leaders who oppose provisions that would offer a chance at citizenship to estimated 12 million people now living in the USA illegally.

Taxes and compromise

Rep. Charles Rangel of New York, who would head the Ways and Means Committee, wants tax cuts for child care and tuition assistance, but has called for rolling back those he says benefit wealthier Americans such as estate tax.

DeLay predicts that Americans who don't consider themselves wealthy will find their tax bills going up: "They think if you make $100,000, you're rich."

·A new atmosphere? Murtha, a Pelosi confidant, says Democrats won't try to impeach, even though that's the hope of some people he calls "rabid" Democrats. Pelosi says she wants probes of Bush's first-term energy task force and the intelligence leading to the Iraq war.

Even so, Murtha says, Democrats will try to reduce partisan tensions. One plan: extending the amount of time House members spend in Washington, which shrunk to three days or less per week under the GOP. "You spend time together, you get to know each other," Murtha says.

Some of the Democratic candidates now running, such as North Carolina's Heath Shuler, are centrists from swing districts who will want to reach out to Republicans, says Tim Roemer, a former Indiana congressman. "They want to be re-elected," Roemer says.

They could find a willing partner in Bush, says Martin Frost, a former Democratic congressman from Texas. When Bush was governor there, he was known for his ability to get along with the Democrats who led the state House. "It made him seek middle ground," Frost says.

Others predict there won't be much appetite for compromise after a bitter campaign that's likely to thin the GOP of its moderates. "The president's veto record will go sky-high," says DeLay.

Some bills, such as one to expand federal funding of embryonic stem cell research that Bush vetoed, are likely to be offered even if Bush or Republicans don't support them. Democrats "will want to lay down markers for the 2008 campaign," Frost says.

Dingell counsels his fellow Democrats to focus first on Election Day: "Before you sell the bear's hide, you first have to shoot the bear."

NASA Invests In Its Future With Venture Capital Firm (WP)

By Marc Kaufman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

'Red Planet' Nonprofit to Fund Aerospace Innovation

Hoping to tap the innovation and daring of small aerospace and biomedical companies, NASA has created and funded a nonprofit venture capital firm that will invest government money in promising but underfinanced companies.

The fund, called Red Planet Capital, is the government's third experiment with venture capitalism, after similar efforts sponsored by the CIA and the Army.

Red Planet marks the first time that the federal government has started a venture capital fund for civilian purposes, but it is hardly a stretch. That is because a former president of the CIA-sponsored venture fund is Michael D. Griffin -- now the administrator of NASA.

"NASA could see that a lot of technical innovation is coming out of companies that don't traditionally do business with the government, and we wanted better and faster access to that creativity," said Lisa L. Lockyer, NASA program manager for the project. "The administrator has been very supportive of the idea."

She said the fund will not only invest on its own in cutting-edge companies but will also join private venture capital firms to form investment syndicates. Together, she said, those partnerships will be able to invest far more money in selected companies than the government could.

The NASA fund, which will be managed by three venture fund veterans selected by the agency through a competitive process, will receive $75 million in taxpayer funds over five years. The money is to be invested only in emerging technologies that might someday be useful to NASA.

"We will invest with others in companies making products that aren't being made elsewhere and that NASA might be able to use," said Peter Banks, one of the organizers and managers of Red Planet. "We don't really expect the companies to be making products that can be used as is on the moon, or in other low-gravity environments. NASA would do the adapting once the technology is developed."

The focus of the initiative is captured in the fund's name. Under President Bush's 2004 space initiative, NASA will be returning astronauts to the moon by 2020 and potentially sending them later to Mars.

"Our focus is not on today or the near tomorrows, since nothing from these new companies can be used before at least the three-to-five-year time frame," Banks said. "What this fund does is set a trajectory towards Mars, and human exploration of Mars."

Banks said that Griffin, an advocate of the moon-Mars initiative, played a major role in selecting the name for the fund.

Griffin, a longtime NASA aerospace engineer and manager, with stints as an academic and business executive, was president of the CIA-sponsored venture capital fund In-Q-Tel for two years. Founded in 1999, In-Q-Tel has a mission parallel to that of Red Planet -- to invest in small companies working on cutting-edge technologies that could be adapted for the agency's use.

The CIA fund reports investments in more than 90 companies that delivered more than 130 technologies to the agency -- sometimes from companies that never knew why the CIA had invested in them. The effort was considered enough of a success that some other intelligence agencies now work through In-Q-Tel.

In-Q-Tel, however, had a number of policies that caused some public controversy -- including generous compensation for its executives, and a system that allows employees to share in profits when stakes in fund-owned companies are sold at prices above the initial investment. Documents filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission showed, for instance, that 45 In-Q-Tel employees profited from the sale of the fund's holdings in fledgling laser weapons maker Ionatron in 2005, and that 17 of them earned more than $50,000 each from the sale.

Lockyer said that Red Planet will have a similar policy of distributing some profits -- sales above the cost of the initial fund investment -- with company managers. She said that the annual salaries of the three partners have not been determined, but that they will be competitive with other venture capital operations, which are far higher than salaries of government employees.

While NASA is very interested in the newest thinking in rocket and space technology, the agency is also looking for strategies and products related to keeping astronauts safe and healthy in space for long periods of time, Lockyer said. The kind of cosmic radiation astronauts will face if they go to Mars or remain on the moon for long periods is known to cause significant bone loss and can lead to central-nervous-system injury and increased risk of cancer. If innovators and researchers cannot find ways to protect the astronauts, then long-term space travel will be impossible.

"This kind of biomedical work is definitely something we're interested in," Lockyer said. "It could be very useful to NASA and could also come up with discoveries that will be useful to people on Earth and so could be commercially profitable."

The Red Planet managers and staff will have an advantage that most other venture capital funds do not have: They will have constant input from NASA officials about what kinds of technologies and services the agency is looking for. As a result, they will be able to invest in companies that may have a better-than-usual chance of someday selling a product to NASA.

"Given our special circumstances," Banks said, "we're hoping that other private venture capital firms will be interested in joining us in our investments.

Daring Hubble Repair Plan Awaits 'go' (USAT)

By Traci Watson, Usa Today

USA Today, October 31, 2006

NASA to say today whether mission to fix telescope is on

For 2½ years, top NASA officials have fretted over whether to send astronauts to revive the critically ill Hubble Space Telescope.

DOJ_NMG_0089181

The answer comes today, when NASA Administrator Michael Griffin announces whether the space shuttle will pay a service call to Hubble. If Griffin says yes, a flight to install two new scientific instruments, fix a third and upgrade telescope systems could launch as early as next winter.

Despite the uncertainty, NASA engineers and astronauts have been quietly toiling on a plan to rescue the telescope.

Space agency personnel have created new Hubble repair tools. They have outlined a rough mission schedule. And they have developed new repair techniques in hopes of fixing one of America's most cherished scientific instruments.

The 2002 shuttle flight to Hubble, the most recent of four, was tough enough, says astronaut John Grunsfeld, who made spacewalks to fix the telescope in 1999 and 2002. “If that was heart surgery, this time we're planning to do brain surgery — that next level of delicacy,” he says.

Some of the tasks on the flight, such as opening a door fastened with more than 100 tiny screws, “would seem to be impossible,” says astronaut Michael Massimino, who also did a spacewalk in 2002 to repair the telescope. “This one, I think, is about as challenging as you can get,” Massimino says.

A bit of Velcro falling into the telescope's guts could spoil its vision. One misplaced nudge of a spacewalking astronaut's foot could derail a telescope that, while wounded, is still snapping pictures of the cosmos.

“You want to be very, very careful,” says Massimino, yet “you want to get as much done as you possibly can, because you're up there for a finite time.” He notes that the astronauts who live on the space station can polish off chores that weren't finished during spacewalks. Hubble has no such backup.

NASA has added new safety precautions to every shuttle flight since shuttle Columbia disintegrated in 2003. Now every shuttle crew must spend an entire day in orbit inspecting the ship's thermal shield, a procedure that demands precious time and fuel.

“The biggest challenge … (is) how do we pack everything we need to do to assure a safe vehicle into a typical Hubble mission?” says astronaut Joseph Tanner, whose four shuttle flights included one to Hubble in 1997. “It's not business like it used to be.”

It was safety that led then-NASA administrator Sean O'Keefe in 2004 to cancel the fifth shuttle mission to Hubble. Since the Columbia accident, NASA has made sure that in an emergency, every shuttle crew could hole up on the International Space Station and wait for rescue by another shuttle. But a shuttle visiting Hubble couldn't reach the station, which follows a path around the Earth more than 100 miles away from the Hubble's orbit.

O'Keefe's decision meant curtains for Hubble, since no other space vehicle in the world can stay in space long enough to upgrade the telescope.

When Griffin took over the space agency in early 2005, he changed course. NASA, he said, would send a shuttle to save Hubble if the first flights after the Columbia accident went well. The three flights since the accident — one in 2005, another in July, and one in September — all returned safely to Earth.

The long to-do list for the next Hubble mission means that the crew would probably make five spacewalks in five days. Missions to the station usually include only three spacewalks, with a day of rest between them.

The punishing work schedule on a Hubble mission, combined with the extra task of inspecting the shuttle, adds up to a “crew workload (that) is going to be outrageous,” Grunsfeld says. “There's going to be no sleeping on this mission.” That can lead to risky fatigue.

By far the most difficult task on a fifth Hubble flight would be fixing the Space Telescope Imaging Spectrograph, which analyzes the light from distant objects in the cosmos. The spectrograph, dead since 2004 because of a faulty electronics board, gives information on temperature and density. It was not designed to be fixed in orbit, posing these challenges:

·The door to the compartment containing the faulty part is held down by 111 tiny screws, which an astronaut in a spacesuit would find nearly impossible to remove. Once freed, the screws could easily float away and vanish into the workings of the telescope.

Engineers at the Goddard Space Flight Center devised a special miniature screwdriver and a device that will improve the astronauts' aim as they work on the screws and clamp onto them once they're loose.

·The edges of the electronics board are sharp — a peril to the astronauts, whose spacesuits are inflated with air. That means the spacewalkers can't touch the board for fear of puncturing their suits.

The board is held in place by locks akin to “Chinese finger handcuffs,” says Hubble program manager Preston Burch. “As you pull on them, they get tighter and tighter.” On Earth, it may take an hour to coax one out. A “card-puller” has been devised for the astronauts to use to yank the board free.

·The spectrograph lies so deep inside Hubble that the astronauts can't work as usual. On a normal Hubble task, two astronauts stand on the shuttle's robotic arm, one doing the work, and the second handing tools to the first.

The Hubble team now thinks the repair astronaut can stand on a portable scaffold attached to the telescope. The shuttle's robot arm might hover nearby and act as a tool caddy.

Because of the time pressure the astronauts face, the planning team has also worked on how to make the routine Hubble chores easier.

Engineers have cooked up an alignment device that will help the spacewalkers load Hubble with new scientific instruments, which have to be slid into their slots just so. They're building exact replicas of parts of the telescope so the astronauts can practice their moves. They're rethinking how to load items on the shuttle, to cut the time spent hunting for supplies.

"We don't leave anything to chance," Burch says. "We work real hard to make sure that we can't get fooled."

FEDERAL DIARY: Transition To Pay For Performance Makes Some Anxious (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Many federal employees fear that as many tricks as treats lie ahead with their new pay systems.

Perhaps that's a bit of an exaggeration, but it is fair to say that transitions to new pay and management systems involve hard work, especially for federal managers asked to more rigorously rate job performance and link that rating to a pay raise. Bush administration officials acknowledge that changes planned for two large departments, Defense and Homeland Security, have created a fair share of anxious employees.

Some of that anxiety appears based on concerns that the new pay-for-performance systems could be manipulated to lower the government's payroll (about $456 million per day in the executive branch) and pension costs. That should not happen, according to the Office of Personnel Management, which had a hand in designing the new systems for the Defense and Homeland Security departments.

"These systems' assumptions, principles and requirements all point to ensuring no reduction in the overall amount spent on basic pay increases. Consequently, we would not expect any reduction in pension obligations," the OPM said in a briefing paper.

Congress approved the new pay systems following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks for the Defense and Homeland Security departments after the Bush administration contended it needed more leeway in how civil-service employees are paid and managed.

Under the new approach, the decades-old General Schedule, which provided predictable pay raises, will be replaced with the National Security Personnel System, which is being phased in at Defense, and with MaxHR, which is still on the drawing board at Homeland Security.

The two systems emphasize the importance of an employee's job performance and seek to change the government's traditional compensation practice. Instead of providing an across-the-board raise to all employees, as the General Schedule permits, the two departments will provide higher raises to their best workers and smaller or no raises to their low-rated employees.

Over time, performance pay may affect a worker's pension. Part of the formula used to set federal pensions involves multiplying years of service by a percentage applied to the "high-3" -- the average of the three highest-paid years of consecutive service. Under the pay-for-performance systems, the employee with high ratings should have an enhanced high-3, while employees with lower job ratings will see a smaller high-3.

"That's fundamental to a pay design that makes performance distinctions, but overall the government would not achieve savings," the OPM said.

The new pay systems also introduced another variable for employees -- bonuses. Lump-sum awards and bonuses do not count toward retirement. Under the NSPS, managers can determine what portion of an employee's annual raise should be given as a base pay increase or as a bonus. In certain circumstances, employees may find that their pay has been capped and that they can receive only bonuses.

Administration officials have promised to Congress that managers will receive extensive training on how to administer the new systems to ensure that employees are treated fairly.

According to the OPM, federal managers, in addition to job performance ratings, will have several other factors to take into account when setting pay every year, such as recent promotions, local labor-market conditions, turnover rates and how much money has been made available by Congress for salaries.

That's about as many ingredients as you would find in a witch's cauldron. Don't be surprised if this pay transition continues to next Halloween.Award Winner

The International Public Management Association for Human Resources has honored John Palguta , vice president for policy at the Partnership for Public Service.

DOJ_NMG_0089183

Palguta was named this year's winner of the Warner W. Stockberger Achievement Award, named after the first director of personnel for the Agriculture Department. The award goes to a person in public or private life who has made an outstanding contribution toward the improvement of public personnel management at any level of government.Retirement

Gwendolyn Aughtry , staff assistant in the Justice Department's commercial litigation branch, retires today after 34 years of federal service.

Federal Agencies' Outward Migration Irks Area Officials (WP)

By Alec Macgillis

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Relocations Undermine Efforts To Limit Sprawl, Planners Say

As they battle sprawl, Washington area leaders say they face a stubborn foe, and it's not greedy developers or the tyranny of the automobile or the desire for big houses. It is the United States government.

In scattering employees to the region's outer edges, local officials and planners say, the federal government has undermined efforts to concentrate growth near public transit and the area's urban core -- the strategy local officials see as key to reducing traffic and conserving resources in a booming region.

The U.S. government, they say, has become a kind of master planner, making decisions, with little local input, that will shape Washington's commuting and development patterns for years.

"I continue to be amazed by the shortsightedness of the federal government," said Fairfax County Supervisor T. Dana Kauffman (D-Lee). "Whatever they do is 'here and now.' They seem to have no interest in trying to plan for the rational development of a sustainable community. I suppose if they had the chance to relocate to the moon, they would."

Sparking the most recent round of complaints were reports last week that the FBI is moving its Northern Virginia field office from Tysons Corner to Prince William County. The FBI says it needs more space and that the site near Manassas is less expensive and more secure than locations closer in. But some FBI employees note that it will result in higher commuting costs for many of the office's 300 workers and encourage some of them to move farther out. Agents will have to make long trips on overloaded Interstate 66 for their cases and for meetings with prosecutors in Alexandria, they say.

The move is reminiscent of another, far bigger dispersal: the Pentagon's transfer of 30,000 military and civilian employees from Arlington County, the District and other close-in locations to installations farther out, mostly to Fort Belvoir in southern Fairfax. Rather than being near Metro, the jobs, which will be followed by thousands of related contractors, will be in an area with crowded roads and little transit. Also getting thousands more workers are two other posts on the region's fringe, Fort Meade in Anne Arundel County and Quantico Marine Base in Prince William.

Local officials see a similar lack of federal foresight in the rejection of a proposal to build a Metrorail extension to Dulles International Airport underground through Tysons Corner instead of on an elevated track. Tunnel proponents said it would help achieve a key goal of Fairfax leaders to transform the county's downtown into a walkable urban center, but federal transit officials discouraged Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) against the tunnel, saying the delays and higher costs it would bring would imperil federal funding.

Critics also point to the consolidation of the Food and Drug Administration outside the Capital Beltway in White Oak and the transfer in the 1990s of the headquarters of the Naval Air Systems Command from Arlington to Southern Maryland. But not all agencies are moving outside the Beltway. The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms recently built new headquarters near the New York Avenue Metro station.

Other regions also must contend with the consequences of military relocations and other federal actions, but the dominance of the federal government in Washington makes the area uniquely dependent on it. Ideally, officials say, this could be a plus, if the government used its sway to drive unified planning across a region divided among three jurisdictions.

That happened to some extent in the 1990s, planners and officials say, when President Bill Clinton issued an executive order that federal agencies try to locate within downtowns. By dispersing agencies outward, critics say, the federal government is effectively undermining its $10 billion investment in Metro.

"Six or eight years ago, [the federal government] was moving in the right direction . . . but now you have a couple major decisions that undo" past successes, Arlington County Board member Jay Fisette (D) said.

At the heart of the federal government's justification for the recent decisions are cost savings and security. The Pentagon says the moves chosen by the Base Realignment and Closure Commission will save $49 billion nationwide, partly by moving employees out of leased space such as in Crystal City. Moving out of such close-in locations as Arlington and Alexandria to such closed posts as Belvoir also complies with new military requirements for 82-foot setbacks to guard against truck bombs.

Asked about local complaints, a Pentagon spokesman pointed to the commission's final report, which acknowledged local concerns that "quality of life could be reduced because of transportation problems such as increased traffic, lack of public transportation and increased commuting times, with the attendant issues of air pollution and increased fuel consumption." The report went on to say that "these concerns were carefully weighed and considered, but in the final analysis the commission found they did not collectively rise to the level of a substantial deviation" from other priorities.

The General Services Administration, which oversees the siting of federal facilities, mentions in its regulations the need to consider transportation access, environmental impact and a "community's economy, sense of place and social fabric." But security concerns apply even to agencies unrelated to the military or law enforcement -- all new federal buildings are supposed to have a minimum setback of 50 feet, though exemptions are possible in urban areas, depending on the agency's function.

Critics say that although security concerns are understandable in the wake of the 2001 terrorist attacks and the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, the recent moves go too far. They point out that other countries have found ways, from traffic restrictions to building design, to keep government buildings downtown in their capital cities.

"There seems to be a perception that federal agencies, no matter what they do, need to be protected," said Ronald F. Kirby, a transportation planner with the Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments. "Rather than mix in and have your offices spread around with other activities, it's, 'Let's all get together and build a fortress someplace, and no one can get near us.' "

Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.) said many of agencies being moved to Belvoir are obscure entities and hardly obvious targets. "The terrorists don't know who's in what office building, and even if they knew, they couldn't locate them because of all those acronyms," he said. "The security thing is overblown. It's not tempered by any measure of common sense."

George Vradenburg, a former America Online executive who is organizing a major regional planning exercise, said that the head of the GSA's buildings department had remarked at a recent conference that the agency would be willing to include local officials on the panel that makes siting decisions. But Vradenburg said nothing has come of that so far.

Some say the concerns over the federal dispersal are exaggerated. Other than the military relocations, there is little sign of a general outward move by other federal agencies, said Matthew J. Klein, president of the Akridge development company, which has federal tenants in several of its buildings. "Washington is the center of government operations, and my sense is that people still want to be closer to that center," he said. "Last I checked, no one was moving from the White House or Capitol Hill."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) disputed the inclusion of the Tysons tunnel decision as an example of federal narrow-mindedness. Fairfax officials were initially in support of an aboveground route for the Metro through Tysons, he said, and when local officials recently decided a tunnel was better, federal officials simply told them that it would be difficult to change plans. He agreed, however, with criticisms of the military relocation, which he called a "horrendous land-use decision."

Particularly aggravating to some about the transfers to Belvoir is that the Army has so far ruled out putting any of the elements at a huge, underused GSA warehouse in Springfield, a couple of miles from the post and adjacent to a Metro station. The Army says it is too complicated for it to get control of the site.

Other local officials hold out the hope that the relocations to Belvoir, which are supposed to be done by 2011, won't be carried out fully. It's possible, they say, that the road upgrades needed for the move will be found to be too costly or that a new defense secretary will soon replace Donald H. Rumsfeld, a top proponent of consolidating employees on posts.

But Pentagon spokesman Chris Isleib said it was unrealistic to expect a pullback on transfers. The relocation "is a matter of law, and we remain committed to it," he said.

Incomes Rose Last Month; Spending Was Restrained (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

Americans' incomes rose last month at the quickest pace since June, but consumers did not respond by rushing out to splurge as gasoline prices fell from their summer peak.

Instead, they spent at about the same pace and put more money aside. As a result, the nationwide personal savings rate came the closest it has in a year and a half to climbing out of the red.

The Commerce Department reported yesterday that personal income in September increased at a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 0.5 percent, compared with 0.4 percent in August. Personal consumption spending, meanwhile, rose 0.1 percent in September after a 0.2 percent increase in August.

The net personal savings figure improved in September to a seasonally adjusted annual pace of minus $15 billion, compared with minus $49 billion in August. And while Americans are still living richer lives than their paychecks can sustain, savings have not been healthier since May 2005. They have been in the red since the month before, in April 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0089185

With Americans earning more and spending more, economists expect that the gross domestic product will expand faster than it did in the third quarter. On Friday, the Commerce Department reported growth of 1.6 percent from July through September — by far the slowest quarter this year.

A number of factors, including falling gas prices and growing disposable income, are likely to lift consumer spending modestly in the months ahead.

"The current environment of declining energy prices and healthy wage growth is a pretty potent combination going forward," said Drew Matus, senior economist with Lehman Brothers. "It would not be surprising if you saw consumption continue to increase to some degree."

Most experts agree that any increase in consumer spending in the remainder of the year will not be a striking one. "This isn't going to unlock a spending frenzy," said Brian A. Bethune, an economist with the research firm Global Insight. "It's going to be moderate, but it's not going to be explosive."

When last month's spending figures are adjusted for inflation, they indicate more growth. Spending increased 0.4 percent in September when inflation was factored in, as distinct from 0.1 percent growth excluding price increases. The rise reflected an increase last month in purchases of durable goods — big-ticket items like vehicles and home appliances. Real disposable income grew 0.8 percent in September when adjusted for inflation, or 0.5 percent unadjusted.

Aggregate measures of income, like the one in yesterday's report, have had healthy gains over the last year. But government reports have consistently found that the pay of most Americans has not kept up with inflation, suggesting to economists that the overall gains are largely a result of big increases among households in the very top income brackets.

Yesterday's report also showed that inflation tempered somewhat in September. That is consistent with the Federal Reserve's view that the slowing economy will moderate rising prices. Still, a measure of inflation remains above what the Fed chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, has said is healthy.

In remarks yesterday in Baltimore, an inflation hawk, Jeffrey M. Lacker, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, Va., repeated his concern that inflation remained uncomfortably high. At the last three Fed meetings, Mr. Lacker has been the only member of the Fed's rate-setting committee to vote for an increase in the benchmark overnight lending rate. Since August, the Fed has voted three times to hold the rate steady at 5.25 percent.

The Fed prefers that the "core rate" of growth in personal consumption spending, which excludes the volatile prices of food and energy, not exceed 1 percent a year, and it regards anything over 2 percent as too high.

In September, the core measure was up 2.4 percent compared with September 2005. Still, that was a little better than August, when the core rate was up 2.5 percent, an 11-year high.

Gasoline Prices Inching Up Again (USAT)

By James R. Healey

USA Today, October 31, 2006

1-cent increase to $2.218 is first since Aug. 7

Gasoline prices are creeping back up after declining steadily for about three months. But there's disagreement about where prices go now.

The U.S. average for a gallon of regular is $2.218, the U.S. Energy Information Administration said Monday, up 1 cent from last week.

That's the first time the weekly number has risen since Aug. 7, when the average peaked at a near-record $3.038.

Prices this week generally were down in the West, up in the Midwest and East, the EIA reported.

Fred Rozell, gasoline price analyst at consulting firm Oil Price Information Service, says the increase is just a blip on the way to lower prices at the pump. The average "may yet drop to about $2.10 per gallon nationally before the year is out," Rozell says.

OPIS follows daily transaction prices at more than 60,000 service stations, a much larger survey than EIA's, though the two almost always track closely.

Unless something extraordinary happens, "I don't think we'll see any major increases until at least late February or early March," Rozell says. "Numbers will hold steady or bounce between a fairly narrow range for a few weeks."

EIA's latest fuel price outlook, published Oct. 10, isn't as optimistic. It forecasts an average of $2.29 for the current quarter. That means prices would drift back up about a nickel from the average $2.245 so far this quarter. Its next outlook is due out next Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0089186

A USA TODAY poll conducted in mid-September found that 42% of Americans believe the price of gasoline is being manipulated by the White House to help Republicans win the Nov. 7 elections. Lower prices benefit the party in power, the thinking goes.

Instead, prices vary with demand — up in spring and summer, when Americans drive a lot, and down other times — according to petroleum experts.

Iraj Ershaghi, director of the petroleum engineering program at the University of Southern California, has studied fuel price fluctuations. He says gasoline prices follow predictable patterns.

"Seasonal variations can be modeled very nicely and explain (prices) very nicely," he says. "The message is: Consumers can control the price if they cut consumption."

Cutting consumption 10% would lower the price of oil to $30 a barrel, he says. That's about half Monday's price of $58.36 a barrel, down $2.39. The price of oil accounts for about 55% of the price of gasoline. Refining costs and taxes make up most of the rest.

Economists Sharply Divided On Where Economy Goes From Here (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — November marks the five-year anniversary of the end of the last recession and the beginning of the latest U.S. economic expansion.

But whether the USA will have another five years of economic growth without sliding into recession — at least matching the record 10-year expansion that ended in 2001 — is an issue that sharply divides economists.

In a USA TODAY survey of economists conducted Oct. 13-18, 24 said the economy will continue to expand for at least another five years. But another 24 said the expansion will likely be truncated by a recession sometime before November 2011.

"Not a chance," says Tucker Hart Adams, owner of the Adams Group, an economic consulting firm in Colorado Springs, about the chances of the expansion hitting the 10-year mark. "Consumers can't continue to spend for another five years. They have too much debt."

But others are more optimistic.

"This is another one of those long expansions," says David Wyss, chief economist for Standard & Poor's in New York. He says with inflation relatively benign, the Federal Reserve will be able to keep interest rates at historically low levels. That will help support the economy, he says.

The previous expansion lasted from March 1991 to March 2001 and was followed by one of the mildest recessions in history. An expansion of 120 months was not just the longest ever, it far exceeded the average duration of expansions since World War II. The average length of expansions in the postwar period is 57 months, according to the National Bureau of Economic Research, a private group that is the nation's arbiter of business cycles.

"Very rarely are we in recession nowadays," says Scott Anderson, senior economist at Wells Fargo in Minneapolis.

He attributes that to the switch from a manufacturing-based economy to a service-based economy. Manufacturing is subject to more volatility, Anderson argues.

"We can remain in this expansion for another five or six years," Anderson says.

Merrit Baker, president of staffing firms MedX and 21st Century Staffing in Conshohocken, Pa., says companies are in a "hiring mode" and staffing is picking up in some areas, particularly for engineers and people in medical fields. That suggests the expansion is healthy.

"We are economy-sensitive," Baker says of his industry. "If the economy is not doing well, companies aren't hiring."

National Association of Manufacturers chief economist David Huether says strong productivity growth, a healthy global economy and firms' successful inventory management are all factors that could help the expansion hit the 10-year mark.

"The foundations for a long-lasting expansion are there," he says.

S&P's Wyss says expansions follow a typical pattern. At the beginning, the economy grows at a healthy clip. Somewhere around the midpoint, there is a slowdown and a "soft landing," in which the economy avoids recession. The economy then picks up speed again.

Wyss says the economy is currently in the soft-landing period, marked by below-average economic growth. The government reported last week that the economy grew at a tepid annual rate of 1.6% in the third quarter, slowed by a slumping housing sector. Such a period of slower growth reduces inflation and thus "buys you another expansion phase."

But the economy is not recession-proof. A number of issues, including a renewed surge in energy prices, a deeper-than-expected drop in the housing market or a sudden decline in foreign investment in the USA, could cause the expansion to end, Wyss says.

Economist Adams sees consumers as the biggest risk. Consumers' saving rates have been negative for a year, meaning they are spending more than they are earning. That means they are ill-prepared for a change, such as a job loss or increase in debt payments.

Adams notes many homeowners have adjustable-rate mortgages and their payments are rising as their fixed-rate periods are ending. The Federal Reserve estimates that 20% of outstanding mortgages have variable rates. Half of those are set to change interest rates this year, Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke told lawmakers earlier this year.

The change in mortgage payments, combined with a lack of saving, will make it too hard for consumers to keep up their spending habits, Adams says. Consumer spending accounts for more than two-thirds of all U.S. economic activity.

"The last recession was a business-led recession because of the over-investment in technology in the '90s and getting ready for Y2K. … With that exception, recessions are caused when consumers cut back on spending," says Adams, who says colleagues are calling her the Duchess of Doom.

Consumers are showing little optimism about the economy. In a USA TODAY/Gallup survey of 1,002 adults conducted Oct. 20-22, 44% rated the economy as "good" or "excellent," while 33% said the economy was "fair," and 22% said it was "poor." One percent did not register an opinion.

"I am not very positive about the economy. I think it's average at best," says Joel Libava, president of Franchise Selection Specialists in Cleveland. He doubts the economy will make it another five years without recession, particularly given his Midwestern vantage point, where companies are closing factories and laying off workers.

Some economists simply say the odds just aren't in the economy's favor. "Ten years is unusual, so for that reason alone, I say no," says Mike Englund, chief economist for Action Economics in Boulder, Colo.

Core Inflation Measure Eases But Leaves Questions For Fed (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And Campion Walsh

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A closely watched measure of consumer prices eased somewhat last month, but inflation remains a big question for Federal Reserve policy makers and the economy.

The Fed's preferred inflation measure -- the price index for personal consumption expenditures excluding food and energy -- rose 0.2% in September after an upwardly revised 0.3% gain in August, the Commerce Department said. Compared with a year earlier, this measure of "core" inflation was up 2.4% last month, less than the 2.5% pace in August.

Despite the slight downtick last month, the annual increase in the measure of core inflation remains well above the informal range of 1% to 2% that Fed policy makers would prefer. At the same time, the economy's growth rate in the third quarter was considerably below normal.

That combination, economists said, will continue to keep the Fed from raising or lowering interest rates until it becomes clear which is a more serious threat. "As long as there are no large changes on either side of this equation, a somewhat uneasy standstill is probably the most likely outcome for monetary policy," wrote Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at MFR Inc., in a research note.

The overall index of personal consumption expenditure prices fell 0.3% last month after a 0.3% rise in August, driven down by lower gasoline prices. Consumer spending rose a modest 0.1% in September, a bit lower than the 0.2% gain in August, the report showed. Given the overall drop in consumer prices last month, inflation-adjusted spending rose 0.4% last month.

Economists took these figures as a sign that lower gasoline prices are raising consumer spending. "We're seeing pretty good, respectable advances in real spending despite the fact that the housing market is weak," said Brian Bethune, an economist at Global Insight. "It looks like the drop in gasoline prices is having the bigger impact."

Personal income jumped 0.5% last month after a 0.4% gain in August, suggesting that solid gains in wages and other forms of compensation also are buoying spending growth. With income growth outpacing spending growth last month, the savings rate -- personal savings as a percentage of after-tax income -- improved to negative 0.2% in September from negative 0.5% the previous month.

Economists are also concerned that significant wage growth could put upward pressure on prices by raising business costs when productivity growth is slowing. The Labor Department will release its latest estimates on employee compensation and productivity trends, starting today with the release of third-quarter employment costs.

Meanwhile, the Fed's quarterly survey of senior loan officers found that "demand for most loan types declined somewhat" in August through October. U.S. banks reported weaker demand for commercial-real-estate and residential-mortgage loans amid the housing market's downturn. Lending standards for residential-mortgage loans tightened.

Demand for commercial and industrial loans was essentially flat from the previous survey, although U.S. banks reported easing lending standards for these loans.

We Support Simplicity (USAT)

By Ed Yingling

USA Today, October 31, 2006

With credit cards practically a necessity in today's marketplace, it's critical that consumers know how to use them. That's why the credit card industry is engaged in an effort, spearheaded by the Federal Reserve, to simplify and humanize the language we use. More important, this effort won't consist of lawyers and regulators imagining how consumers might react. The new disclosures will be tested with real, live consumers.

Simpler won't be easy. As a recent study by the Government Accountability Office (GAO) points out, the legalese in credit card disclosures results from issuers' need to meet statutory requirements and their desire to avoid being sued.

So, there's work to be done on the disclosures — and we're doing it. Credit card lenders fully support the Federal Reserve's effort to make disclosures easier to read and understand so that consumers can make informed decisions.

The GAO report also reveals many positive credit card trends.

Up until 1990, credit cards charged a higher, fixed interest rate, often came with an annual fee and were available to only the most credit-worthy consumers.

Today, technology and competition have helped make cards available to many more people, at a price consistent with the risk each person presents.

The result is that the majority of cardholders — 80%, according to the GAO study — enjoy interest rates below what they would have paid 15 years ago. And interest rates are effectively zero for about half of all account-holders, who pay their balances off each month.

Furthermore, the GAO found that cardholders paid 66% less in annual fees in 2004 than they did in 1990. It also concluded that most cardholders don't appear to be paying penalties, such as late or over-the-limit fees, which are avoidable.

Credit card customers have never had more choices or lower interest rates than they do today.

Broader access to credit for more people at lower rates — we think that's progress.

Bush: Democrats Lack Plan To Win Iraq War (AFP)

By Laurent Lozano

AFP, October 31, 2006

US President George W. Bush charged that "terrorists win and America loses" if opposition Democrats win November 7 legislative elections dominated by the unpopular Iraq war.

"If you listen carefully for a Democrat plan for success, they don't have one. Iraq is the central front in the war on terror, yet they don't have a plan for victory," he told cheering Republican faithful at a rally here.

The bloody war in Iraq has claimed the lives of more than 2,800 US troops, depressed Bush's poll numbers, and raised the prospect of a Democratic victory in looming mid-term elections that will shape Bush's last two years in office.

The president, kicking off an aggressive final week of campaigning, defiantly defended the March 2003 US-led invasion of Iraq and painted the opposition party as eager to leave "before the job is done" there.

"The Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses. That's what's at stake in this election. The Democrat goal is to get out of Iraq. The Republican goal is to win in Iraq," he said.

At a campaign stop in Georgia, Bush unapologetically stood by his decision to go to war in Iraq and urged Republican activists not to lose hope, declaring: "This election is far from over."

Bush acknowledged "tough" fighting in Iraq, where US forces have been locked in some of the bloodiest battles since the March 2003 US-led invasion to oust Saddam Hussein on grounds he possessed weapons of mass destruction.

While no such weapons were found, Bush said the world agreed with him that the Iraqi leader posed a threat, and declared: "Getting rid of Saddam Hussein was the right decision, and the world is better off."

As he spoke, the number of US soldiers and civilian contractors killed in October in Iraq reached 102 even as US national security adviser Stephen Hadley held unannounced talks with his Iraqi counterpart in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0089189

The White House said that Hadley's talks were "long-planned" and dismissed any link to "overblown" strains between Washington and the fledgling government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

Hadley and Iraq's national security adviser, Mowaffaq al-Rubaie, discussed "accelerating the training of the Iraqi armed forces" and giving them a broader role in Iraq, according to a statement from Iraq's government.

Maliki and US officials have sparred verbally over setting what the White House calls "benchmarks" for progress on the security and political fronts in Iraq, where 101 Americans have been killed in October.

Hadley's visit came after Bush and Maliki held a videophone summit on Saturday to iron out disagreements on how to improve security in Iraq and agreed to form a new US-Iraq security committee.

"I think that the press reports about the relationship being sensitive are overblown," Bush spokeswoman Dana Perino said aboard the president's Air Force One airplane as he kicked off a frenzied final week of campaigning.

Democrats, heartened by polls giving them an edge nationwide and in a handful of key races, need 15 seats to take control of the 435-seat House of Representatives and six seats to capture the 100-seat Senate.

Bush's Republicans, significant numbers of them publicly distancing themselves from the president and the party, hoped that their powerful get-out-the-vote machine would make the difference on election day.

"The point of the president going is to maximize turnout," said Perino. "A lot of these races are starting to close and there's some really highly competitive ones, and that's probably where you're going to see the president."

America Loses If Democrats Win, President Says (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

SUGAR LAND, Texas — Using the backdrop of the Iraq war to launch some of his toughest campaign attacks this political season, President Bush on Monday accused Democrats of being more concerned with pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq than with winning the war.

Kicking off the final week of a campaign that will determine whether his party will retain its House and Senate majorities, Bush went to the heart of issues that helped Republicans come out on top in 2002 and 2004: terrorism, taxes and a conservative social agenda.

Bush listed several key anti-terrorism measures opposed by Democrats, noting that when it came to eavesdropping on suspected terrorists, detaining them or trying them, members of that party "just say no."

"So when the Democrats ask for your vote, what's your answer?" he asked his audiences here in Texas and earlier in Statesboro, Ga., where more than 5,000 supporters gathered at Georgia Southern University.

"Just say no!" the crowd roared at each stop.

In the campaign's final week, Bush is barnstorming across the country, appearing at what the White House calls "2006 victory rallies" and serving up red-meat Republican issues to the party faithful to get these core GOP voters to the polls.

To reach that constituency, Bush also took to the airwaves Monday, as did Vice President Dick Cheney, with each giving an interview to programs on Fox News Channel.

Cheney told "Your World With Neil Cavuto" that insurgents in Iraq had timed the increase in violence — October has been the fourth-deadliest month for U.S. troops, with more than 100 killed — to the U.S. political calendar.

FOR THE RECORD:

An earlier version of this article incorrectly stated that there had been a steady decline in in the U.S.'s gross domestic product over the past three years. It's the GDP's rate of growth that has declined.—

"It's my belief that they're very sensitive to the fact that we've got an election scheduled," he said.

In an two-part interview that began Monday on "Hannity & Colmes," Bush said that some Democratic leaders "are becoming isolationists. And that's dangerous."

"Protecting this country and keeping this economy growing are the two most important issues," he said. "And you can't protect the country if you retreat from overseas, and you can't keep the economy growing if you raise taxes. And that's exactly what the Democrats in the House would like to do."

In Georgia, Bush drew sharp partisan distinctions as he belittled the opposition to the war, which is proving a powerful pro-Democrat issue: "The Democrat approach on Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win, and America loses," he said.

"The Democrat goal is to get out of Iraq. The Republican goal is to win in Iraq," he said. "You cannot win a war unless you are willing to fight the war."

DOJ_NMG_0089190

On the economy, Bush linked the growth of jobs — 6.6 million added since August 2003, he said — and a 2.2% increase in average wages over the last year with the tax cuts championed by his administration.

Adopting one of his signature campaign lines for the current week, he said, "If you want to keep that money in your pocket instead of sending it to Washington, D.C., you vote for Republicans on election day."

And he returned again to an issue important to evangelicals and other social conservatives, attacking last week's New Jersey state Supreme Court ruling that "raises doubt about the institution of marriage" to bolster his case for Republican candidates who would oppose judges who "legislate from the bench."

The president's opposition to same-sex marriage brought the audience to its feet: He could not have asked for a better response in motivating supporters to get to the polls.

"You can bet one thing — we're going to sprint to the finish line," Bush said, presaging a full-bore week of campaigning not only by him, but also by Cheney, who is traveling to Montana on Wednesday, and First Lady Laura Bush, who was in Pennsylvania and New Hampshire on Monday and will end up Thursday evening at a rally in Rocklin, Calif.

"When our voters show up at the polls," the president predicted, "we will keep control of the House and Senate."

Sugar Land is the hometown of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, who has come to symbolize ethical lapses in Congress. His indictment by a state grand jury on campaign finance charges and the attention paid to his association with lobbyist Jack Abramoff, convicted in an influence-peddling scandal, led him to abandon his reelection race in April and resign from the House in June.

Under Texas election laws, the candidate eventually endorsed by the Republican Party, Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, faces a complicated task: Because DeLay dropped out of the race after the Texas primary in March, her supporters will need to vote for her twice: once on the regular ballot as the candidate in a special election to finish out DeLay's current term, and again as a write-in candidate for the two-year term starting in January.

So, as dusk fell, there was Bush, in an airport hangar, delivering a message of Republican conservatism to Texans whose fervor would not normally need stoking.

Bush Rallies G.O.P. Faithful In Georgia And Texas (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

SUGAR LAND, Tex. Oct. 30 — President Bush zigzagged from Georgia to his home state of Texas today, stumping for Republicans in Bush-friendly districts while looking ever more like the candidate himself.

Here in the Houston suburb once represented by Tom DeLay, Mr. Bush was greeted at a campaign rally like a man whose public approval ratings are 73 percent, not 37 percent. Campaign volunteers who had jammed into an airplane hangar climbed atop one another's shoulders to catch a glimpse of him. Little children sported buttons with his likeness and waved tiny Texas flags. One supporter raised a handmade "Dubya" sign.

Mr. Bush, his shirt collar open, his sleeves rolled up, soaked it all in before delivering a speech that laid into Democrats for, among other things, opposing tax cuts and lacking a strategy in Iraq. It was a reprise of a fiery talk he gave hours earlier at a college gymnasium in Statesboro, Ga.

"It's a serious political party in the midst of a war, and they have no plan for success," Mr. Bush said in Sugar Land, after proclaiming, "We will not run from thugs and assassins." It was a moment when the president could defend his record in Iraq to thunderous applause.

The back-to-back rallies created just the image White House strategists are seeking for the president in the waning days of the campaign: that of a confident leader, surrounded by adoring supporters.

The intent is to fire up the party faithful and push them to the polls to vote, but at times it seemed as if Mr. Bush was the one getting fired up. The president seemed to relish playing the game of political expectations, as he tweaked Democrats for measuring for new curtains in Washington too soon.

"You might remember that around this time in 2004, some of them were picking out their new offices in the West Wing," Mr. Bush said in Georgia. He paused to absorb the laughter and applause, then added dryly, "The movers never got the call."

After weeks of focusing on the economy and the war on terror, Mr. Bush has also tweaked his standard stump speech. It has been refashioned to include a broad defense of his record in a range of areas: education, energy policy, border security, immigration, Medicare prescription drug benefits and the appointment of two conservative justices to the Supreme Court.

One of his biggest applause lines in Georgia was a reiteration of his position that "marriage is a union between a man and a woman.'' The line brought the crowd to its feet.

DOJ_NMG_0089191

"The most important issues to Republican voters are tax cuts to the economic conservatives, and judges and marriage, pro-life issues to the social conservatives," said Charlie Black, a Republican strategist with close ties to the White House. "So he's reminding them that he's got a good record on those things."

Mr. Bush, of course, is not on the ballot. But with analysts predicting Republicans could lose control of one or both chambers of Congress, White House strategists are sending the president to those districts where he might just drag a Republican candidate across the finish line.

One such district is Sugar Land, whose political landscape looks something like a Shakespeare play. The name of Mr. DeLay, who resigned from Congress after being indicted on charges of conspiring to violate Texas election laws, remains on the ballot, though he is not running. That left Mr. Bush to implore Republicans to write in the name of a candidate whose name is not easily written: Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, a dermatologist who serves on the Houston City Council.

She is running against Nick Lampson, a Democrat who lost his seat in a redistricting engineered by Mr. DeLay. Polls show the two running neck and neck, but Bruce Buchanan, a political science professor at the University of Texas at Austin, said Mr. Bush is still popular enough here to help Ms. Sekula-Gibbs.

"He's still got legs," Mr. Buchanan said.

Mr. Bush certainly showed his legs in Statesboro, Ga., where an estimated 6,000 people packed into the gymnasium at Georgia Southern University to see him campaign for Max Burns, a former congressman who two years ago lost his seat to Representative John Barrow, a Democrat. Hundreds more were lined up outside, apparently holding tickets but unable to get in.

In the crowd was Darin Van Tassell, a political scientist who said that if Mr. Bush could motivate Republicans anywhere in Mr. Barrow's district, it would be at Georgia Southern, where Mr. Burns was a professor of business administration before going into politics.

"Barrow has a chance to be the only incumbent Democrat who might lose," Mr. Van Tassell, who counts himself a Democrat, said. "I think this particular race has a chance to run completely counter to the rest of the country, which is probably why the president is here."

Bush Hits Hard At Gay Marriage (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 31, 2006

President Bush has for months cast the midterm elections as a choice about just two issues: taxes and terrorism. Now, with polls predicting bleak results for Republicans, he is trying to fire up his party by decrying gay marriage.

"For decades, activist judges have tried to redefine America by court order," Bush said Monday. "Just this last week in New Jersey, another activist court issued a ruling that raises doubt about the institution of marriage. We believe marriage is a union between a man and a woman, and should be defended."

The line earned Bush by far his most sustained applause at a rally of 5,000 people aimed at boosting former GOP Rep. Max Burns' effort to unseat a Democratic incumbent. In this conservative rural corner of eastern Georgia, even children jumped to their feet alongside their parents to cheer and clap for nearly 30 seconds — a near-eternity in political speechmaking.

The New Jersey Supreme Court ruled that same-sex couples must be given all the benefits of married couples, leaving it up to the state Legislature to decide whether to extend those rights under the structure of marriage or something else.

One alternative, civil unions, is an idea Bush supports. But he ignored that on the way to portraying the New Jersey decision as the kind of thing America should do without.

"I believe I should continue to appoint judges who strictly interpret the law and not legislate from the bench," the president said, earning more applause in the sweltering basketball arena at Georgia Southern University. He pointed to his nominations to the Supreme Court of Chief Justice John Roberts and Samuel Alito.

The gay-marriage theme became a staple in Bush's political remarks last Thursday, the day after the New Jersey ruling on a touchstone issue for religious conservatives who are crucial to Republican electoral calculations. White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino said it was added merely to respond to the ruling — not because his other messages were failing to connect.

But the lines, repeated to great enthusiasm at a second rally later Monday in Texas, mark one of the only substantive changes in the president's stump speech as he turns from raising money for Republican candidates to encouraging the GOP faithful to vote Nov. 7.

To that end, he was focusing on the South.

After campaigning for Burns, trying to win back the seat conservative Democrat John Barrow took from him in 2004, Bush flew to the district vacated by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas. DeLay resigned in June amid a series of investigations of his fundraising activities.

DOJ_NMG_0089192

Organizers said Bush's appearance in a partially filled airport hangar in Sugar Land, Texas, drew over 6,000 to support Republican Shelley Sekula-Gibbs' write-in campaign to replace DeLay. The former Republican party star and Bush ally on Capitol Hill was nowhere to be seen, and the president never mentioned DeLay's name.

The election in the reliably conservative district outside Houston is complicated. Republicans were legally barred from replacing DeLay's name on the ballot. So supporters must choose Sekula-Gibbs twice — once for the special election filling out DeLay's term and again for the general election for the next Congress.

She faces former congressman Nick Lampson, who has outraised and outspent her, giving Democrats a chance at a seat long in the GOP's hands. A Lampson victory would also be sweet revenge for an opposition party that DeLay fought at every turn while in office.

On Tuesday, Bush is heading back to Georgia, a state he twice won comfortably. Tuesday's rally, about 130 miles west of Statesboro, is aimed at helping another former GOP congressman, Mac Collins, oust Democratic Rep. Jim Marshall.

After Thursday, the president's schedule remains fluid, as his political advisers balance the need for help in tight races against the president's unpopularity.

"You might remember that about this time in 2004, some of them were picking out their new offices in the West Wing," he said. "The movers never got the call."

Democrats ridiculed him back, for an itinerary that took him to once-solid Republican areas.

"Clearly President Bush is more of a liability than an asset as he's forced to stump for candidates in districts that were once considered safe for Republicans," said Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Stacie Paxton.

The president played down the idea that next Tuesday's vote is a referendum on his embattled presidency. "This is different from a presidential campaign because it's not necessarily a national election, in that each congressional race really depends upon the candidates and how they carry the message," he said in an interview on Fox News Channel's "Hannity & Colmes."

Bush also rejected the idea he'll become a lame duck after the elections. "I promise you I'm going to be president up until the very last day, and I've got a lot to do," he said.

Bush Campaigns In GOP-friendly Georgia (AJC)

By Tom Baxter

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 31, 2006

Statesboro – With Republicans invoking Halloween images of what could happen if Democrats take over the House, President Bush on Monday focused on a section of the country that could help stave off a GOP nightmare Nov. 7: Georgia.

"It's great to realize that we are just as important as the rest of the country," said Edwin Brantley, who came with wife Brenda from Vidalia to rally with the President at Georgia Southern University in support of 12th District congressional candidate Max Burns.

GOP Staples Restored To Bush Campaigning (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

SUGAR LAND, Texas -- President Bush has started campaigning on conservative staples such as judicial nominees, border security and defining marriage as between a man and a woman -- themes that have been absent for most of the election season, but which he is now using to energize the party's base.

At rallies drawing a combined 12,000 people in Georgia and Texas yesterday, Mr. Bush said Republicans have delivered on those issues and drew gigantic applause for both his defense of marriage and his promise to secure the borders.

"We will win this election because Republicans understand the values and priorities of the American people," the president said as he visited two critical congressional districts.

The new themes are additions to tax cuts and the war in Iraq -- the standards Mr. Bush has focused on for the past two months, and on which he said last week that the election will be a referendum.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said themes were added because Mr. Bush is speaking to different audiences at the rallies and said this stump speech will carry Mr. Bush through Election Day.

Until now, Mr. Bush had filled his schedule with fundraisers. He only went to his first rally of this election season, in Indiana, on Saturday, and then held two rallies yesterday -- the second one, in Texas, complete with a fireworks send-off for Marine One, the president's helicopter.

DOJ_NMG_0089193

In that district, he was trying to help Republicans thread the needle by electing a write-in candidate to save the seat being vacated by former House Republican leader Tom DeLay. Earlier, in Georgia, the president rallied with Max Burns, a former congressman who lost re-election in 2004, but is in a tight race to reclaim his seat.

The Democratic National Committee said Mr. Bush's late arrival on the rally circuit is a sign of his unpopularity.

"Clearly, President Bush is more of a liability than an asset as he's forced to stump for candidates in districts that were once considered safe for Republicans," DNC spokeswoman Stacie Paxton said.

Mrs. Perino said Mr. Bush's appearance at get-out-the-vote rallies can help conservative turnout in races that could be swung by several thousand ballots.

Mr. Bush had not mentioned immigration on the campaign trail until these rallies.

"For decades, we haven't had complete control over our southern border, and illegal immigration has been on the rise. So I acted," he said, touting increases in the U.S. Border Patrol and his deployment of National Guard troops to support them. "We will reform our immigration system, and we will uphold the immigration laws."

Mr. Bush also returned to judges -- a theme that Republican senators say was worth several percentage points in seats across the country in the 2002 and 2004 congressional races, but which had been absent on the stump.

"I believe I should continue to appoint judges who strictly interpret the law and not legislate from the bench," he said. "America is better off because John Roberts and Sam Alito are serving on the Supreme Court of the United States."

Only a handful of write-in candidates have won election to Congress, and the challenge is steep, even in this conservative district. Mr. DeLay's name remains on the ballot, so Republicans are asking their voters to write in Houston City Council member Shelley Sekula-Gibbs.

Republicans have made several maneuvers, including scheduling a special election to fill the empty seat for the final two months of this Congress, which means voters will see Mrs. Sekula-Gibbs' name on at least one ballot.

Mr. Bush's visit, following an earlier one by Vice President Dick Cheney, is designed to boost her name recognition so voters will remember to write her in.

One indication of the challenge is Mrs. Sekula-Gibbs' name. She hyphenates it, but the most common electronic voting machine used in this district doesn't allow a hyphen for a write-in, so she's changed her Web site and campaign signs to drop the hyphen. Still, the legacy is tough to change -- some of those at yesterday's rally wore stickers with the name still hyphenated.

Bush Stumps For Sekula-Gibbs In Sugar Land (HC)

By Kristen Mack And Eric Hanson

Houston Chronicle, October 31, 2006

President Bush, his collar open and his sleeves rolled up, told 2,000 cheering Republicans in Sugar Land today that they should "bring your pencil" to the polls and write-in the name of Shelley Sekula-Gibbs to succeed Tom DeLay in the U.S. House.

"I always feel better when I'm in Texas," Bush said to the crowd packed into a hangar at the Sugar Land airport, before urging them to take the extra steps necessary to vote for Sekula-Gibbs.

Most voters won't really need a pencil to cast write-in votes because they'll use electronic voting machines. If they write in the councilwoman's name, they'll turn a dial selecting the 18-letter name a character at a time.

"I know I could have given you an easier name and next time I'll think about that," Sekula-Gibbs told the crowd as they waited for the president. Bush was expected to deliver a 45-minute speech before heading by helicopter back to Ellington Field and departing on Air Force One.

Sekula-Gibbs is the party-backed write-in candidate to succeed DeLay, R-Sugar Land, who resigned from Congress after winning the Republican nomination for a 12th term.

A new Chronicle-11 News poll indicates that the race is close, even though Democratic nominee Nick Lampson and Libertarian Bob Smither are on the ballot for the term that begins in January and Sekula-Gibbs isn't.

"It's not every day the president of the United States comes to help a girl from Floresville campaign," Sekula-Gibbs said, referring to her south central Texas birthplace.

Also speaking at today's rally were U.S. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, U.S. Rep. Kevin Brady, R-The Woodlands, state Sen. Kyle Janek, R-Houston, and state Rep. Charlie Howard, R-Sugar Land.

A handful of protesters walked along Texas 6 near the airport carrying signs against the war in Iraq , but they never were close to the president or the rally.

Lampson kept a low profile as Republicans awaited the president today, meeting privately with donors. He planned to attend a small event tonight at a cousin's house in Pearland.

Lampson campaign manager Mike Malaise issued a statement saying Bush came to town "to try and stir up the base for one of our opponents because she is such a hard sell to that base."

White House Talk Heats Up As Polls Show Tight Races

SUGAR LAND, Tex., Oct. 30 -- President Bush said terrorists will win if Democrats win and impose their policies on Iraq, as he and Vice President Cheney escalated their rhetoric Monday in an effort to turn out Republican voters in next week's midterm elections.

Democratic operatives continued to broaden the field of races they believe are competitive enough to merit last-minute investments, as the party's House election committee launched ads in typically conservative districts of Kentucky, Nebraska and Nevada. In the Senate battle, new public and private polls yesterday indicated very tight races in Tennessee, Virginia and Missouri, the last of which is shaping up as possibly the country's tightest contest.

Faced with potential GOP defeat in both chambers, Bush and Cheney aimed to avert that by convincing voters that they cannot risk giving the opposition party any power in Washington.

"However they put it, the Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses," Bush told a raucous crowd of about 5,000 GOP partisans packed in an arena at Georgia Southern University in Statesboro, one of his stops Monday. "That's what's at stake in this election. The Democrat goal is to get out of Iraq. The Republican goal is to win in Iraq."

Democrats reacted sharply to the latest White House attacks. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) said Bush "resorted to the same tired old partisan attacks in a desperate attempt to hold on to power." House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) said Bush is looking to retain a "rubber-stamp Republican Congress that has done nothing to change our failed Iraq policy."

Cheney, meanwhile, said in an interview with Fox News that he thinks insurgents in Iraq are timing their attacks to influence the U.S. elections.

"It's my belief that they're very sensitive of the fact that we've got an election scheduled," he said. Cheney said the insurgents believe "they can break the will of the American people," and "that's what they're trying to do."

The increasingly combative tone from the White House signaled a coordinated GOP effort to use every channel to remind conservatives why they should turn out to vote, despite what many say is their disenchantment with the Mark Foley page scandal, anger over escalating federal spending and anxiety over the course of the Iraq war. Bush held a telephone conference call with about 3,000 Republican local officials on Saturday to fire them up for a final get-out-the-vote push. On Monday, Bush invited Fox News talk show host Sean Hannity for a ride on Air Force One and an interview later; the presence of the conservative celebrity stirred its own buzz among the standing-room-only crowd at Georgia Southern. Bush is barnstorming this week before friendly Republicans after months of just raising money for GOP candidates.

But the president's travel schedule in the final week of the campaign is also a stark reminder of his political weakness in many parts of the country -- and in many swing districts -- where it is too dangerous for GOP candidates to be seen with Bush. After his rally in Georgia on Monday, Bush flew here to stump for the GOP candidate trying to succeed former House majority leader Tom DeLay (Tex.), who won his seat by 14 points two years ago before resigning amid the Jack Abramoff scandal. There was no sign of the man who once relished his Capitol Hill reputation as "The Hammer" on Monday's visit, which drew several thousand to an aircraft hangar festooned with a giant Texas flag.

The White House has been leaving it to surrogates to appear in swing areas, with first lady Laura Bush campaigning Saturday for Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (R-Conn.) and press secretary Tony Snow appearing on behalf of Sen. James M. Talent (R-Mo.) among others on Monday.

"The fact that Republicans are working hard to hold on to one of the most Republican districts in the country -- that tells you the depth of the Republican struggles around the country," said Amy Walter, who tracks House races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

White House aides disputed this characterization, saying the Sugar Land race is a special case since DeLay resigned too late for the courts to allow the GOP to replace him on the ballot. Instead, Republicans are promoting Shelley Sekula Gibbs, a Houston City Council member and dermatologist, as a write-in candidate.

Sekula Gibbs is badly trailing former Democratic Rep. Nick Lampson in fundraising, though Cheney recently came here to raise money, and the National Republican Congressional Committee is spending more than $1 million on her behalf. But a poll published Monday by the Houston Chronicle showed the race statistically tied, even though Republicans acknowledge the difficulty of getting voters to write Sekula Gibbs's name on their ballots.

Sara Taylor, the White House political director, said the purpose of Bush's trip Monday was "to shine a spotlight" on the steps Republicans must take to give their candidate a chance to win. "We're going to focus the president's time on places where he can maximize Republican turnout," she added.

Democrats, meanwhile, believe they have the luxury of competing outside their usual strongholds. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is now funding ads in Kentucky's 3rd District, where challenger John Yarmuth is running against Rep. Anne M. Northup (R); in Nevada's 3rd District, where Tessa Hafen is running against Rep. Jon Porter (R); and in Nebraska's 3rd District, featuring rancher Scott Kleeb (D) against state legislator Adrian Smith (R) for an open seat.

In Georgia, Bush is trying to play a little bit of offense this week, appearing on behalf of GOP candidates in two of the few Democratic districts where Republicans have an opportunity to pick up a seat. The vast majority of competitive races around the country are in districts now held by Republicans, which is one reason Democrats are optimistic they can win the 15 seats necessary to gain a majority in the House.

Bush's rally Monday was on behalf of former Republican congressman Max Burns, who is in a close race to regain his seat from freshman Rep. John Barrow (D). On Tuesday, the president is slated to come back to the state for former representative Mac Collins, who is trying to unseat Democratic Rep. Jim Marshall. Both districts were redrawn by the Georgia legislature in 2005 and are now seen as more favorable to Republicans.

Unlike other Democrats, Barrow and Marshall have not sought to distance themselves far from the president. "I agree with George Bush on this one," Barrow said in a recent ad about tax reform.

Ferrel Guillory, who directs the program on southern politics at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, said Bush's popularity has not "tanked" as badly in the South as in the rest of the country. "Having the president in your district in the South is still probably a risk worth taking," he said.

The crowd at Georgia Southern seemed to respond most enthusiastically to Bush's most conservative lines, roaring for about 10 seconds after he criticized last week's ruling from the New Jersey Supreme Court that gay couples are entitled to the same rights as heterosexual couples. Bush said the ruling "raises doubt about the institution of marriage."

"We believe that marriage is a union between a man and a woman and should be defended," Bush shouted.

Bush also drew a good response from an applause line he used in both Georgia and Texas: "We will not run from thugs and assassins."

In the interview with Hannity on the Fox News Channel's "Hannity & Colmes," Bush said he believes the United States will one day be hit by another terrorist attack. Asked whether the country would be attacked again, Bush said, "I think so, and we've got to do everything we can to stop them."

Write-in Tightens Race In District 22 (HC)

By Kristen Mack

Houston Chronicle, October 31, 2006

The Republican write-in effort to hold former Rep. Tom DeLay's congressional seat, once viewed as a long shot, has created a tight race, according to a Houston Chronicle-11 News poll.

Thirty-five percent of respondents said they would vote for a write-in candidate, a statistical tie with the 36 percent support for Democrat Nick Lampson, according to the poll of more than 500 likely voters in the 22nd Congressional District.

Most who say they will write in a candidate plan on naming Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, the Houston city councilwoman backed by the Republican Party. Two lesser-known candidates also are running as write-ins.

One voter in four is still undecided.

Libertarian Bob Smither, the only person besides Lampson on the general election ballot, drew 4 percent support.

The third option on that ballot is "write-in." Voters who make that selection on the electronic voting machines that most will use are directed to an alphabet screen, where they use a wheel to spell out their choice's name a letter at a time.

Well-publicized raceAbout two-thirds of voters in the suburban Houston district know how to do that and are aware of a write-in candidacy, the poll shows.

"This is why we have elections and we don't have talking heads decide in May who the winners are going to be," said pollster John Zogby, president of Zogby International, which conducted the poll last week.

"Punditry was coloring the district blue. It's still a Republican district. Even harder than selling a write-in, is selling a Democrat in this district."

Fifty-two percent of poll respondents identified themselves as Republicans, 32 percent as Democrats and 16 percent as independent.

DOJ_NMG_0089196

That GOP strength also was evident when poll respondents were asked specifically about Sekula-Gibbs, Lampson and Smither. Sekula-Gibbs drew 52 percent support in that situation, with Lampson holding at 35 percent.

"There reasonably enough would be a substantial number of Republicans looking for a Republican or at least not willing to vote for a Democrat," Zogby said.

But if Lampson were still facing DeLay — as he expected when he entered the race — he would fare much better, walking away with 48 percent of the vote to DeLay's 40 percent, the poll shows.

In the 2004 election, DeLay garnered 55 percent of the vote in a district that went 64 percent for Republican President Bush. DeLay — under fire for close ties to an indicted federal lobbyist and facing his own state indictment on charges relating to campaign finance — resigned from Congress after winning the GOP nomination for a 12th term.

Courts said his resignation came too late for Republicans to replace him on the regular ballot. Sekula-Gibbs is on the ballot in a separate special election to fill the last two months of DeLay's unexpired term. Lampson did not file in that race.

Although her name won't appear on the general election ballot, Sekula-Gibbs won the support of the state GOP as its write-in candidate.

Once an uphill battleRepublicans widely acknowledged then that her candidacy was an uphill battle. A write-in candidate has never won a U.S. House race in Texas. And only six write-in candidates nationwide have been elected to Congress — five in the House and one in the Senate.

Yet a week before Election Day, Sekula-Gibbs appears to be within striking distance.

"I think we are at the top of the hill. We are ready to plant the flag," Sekula-Gibbs said.

She has made the race close with saturation television advertising, much of it funded by the national party, that illustrates how to cast write-in votes. "This underscores what a weak candidate Lampson is," Sekula-Gibbs said of the Chronicle-Channel 11 poll. "He's spent millions and can't get more than 35 percent of people to support him."

Lampson said he remains encouraged, because it's hard to tell how many people will actually vote for a write-in.

"I felt this was doable from the beginning and I still feel that way now," Lampson said. "I knew I had to reach out to a community used to voting one way politically. And I've had to ask those people to have confidence in me."

Bush coming to townSekula-Gibbs may get a boost today, when President Bush visits Sugar Land for a get-out-the-vote rally. It is one of several free events the president is headlining in the waning days of the midterm campaign, hoping to energize the base and woo disenchanted Republicans.

Most of the tickets required to attend the event already have been distributed by Republican Party officials in the four counties that make up the 22nd District — Harris, Fort Bend, Brazoria and Galveston.

Both Lampson and Sekula-Gibbs remain unfamiliar to one in four likely voters, though neither is new to the district.

Sekula-Gibbs has served on Houston City Council for five years and lives in the Clear Lake part of the district.

Lampson served in the U.S. House from 1997 to 2004, representing about 20 percent of what is now the 22nd District. He lost the seat in 2004 in congressional redistricting engineered by DeLay. He moved last year from Beaumont to Stafford, which is in the district.

"Both candidates seem to be swimming upstream here," Zogby said. "What's clear on one hand, is Nick Lampson seems to have had the opportunity and has not closed the deal just yet. On the same token, Shelley Sekula-Gibbs has a great opportunity in a Republican district."

Fifty-three percent of respondents have favorable opinions of Sekula-Gibbs, while 23 percent report unfavorable impressions. Lampson's favorables and unfavorables are about even — 38 percent favorable to 32 percent unfavorable.

Forty percent of poll respondents say they usually vote straight-party. Thirty-two percent plan on doing so this year.

Republican straight-ticket ballots will not register votes for Sekula-Gibbs, since the special election is nonpartisan and the general election does not have a Republican candidate in the district.

What Would Democrats Do About Iraq? (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON

So if voters tip one or both Houses of Congress out of Republican control, what impact would that have on the US war effort in Iraq and, more generally, on American foreign policy?

Democrats could conceivably view such an election outcome as a mandate for asserting a markedly different course in Iraq than the one President Bush has set.

But don't expect too much, most experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0089197

For one thing, Democrats are not of one mind on what to do about Iraq. And while committees chaired by Democrats might hold more meetings and call more testifiers critical of some White House policies, Mr. Bush would still retain the power of the presidential bully pulpit.

In addition, Bush's foreign policy in the second term has already evolved in a direction - away from unilateralism and toward greater cooperation - that suits both Bush's political opponents and moderates in his own party, some analysts say.

For others, the differences between Bush and the Democrats on the big foreign-policy issues are really a matter of details and not starkly black and white.

"My hunch is that there wouldn't be a large change in American foreign policy with a divided government because there really hasn't been a deep division over the overall direction of that policy," says Julian Zelizer, a specialist in foreign policy and contemporary American politics at Boston University.

"It's ironic because the rhetoric has been so fierce," Mr. Zelizer adds. "But there is general consensus on the war on terror, and even on Iraq it's principally a matter of specifics - for example, the exit strategy and how to handle the Iraqi government. It's not, 'the president says stay' versus 'the Democrats say get out now.' "

Indeed, while some Democratic members of Congress have fielded ideas that have pushed the Iraq debate forward - Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania calling for a withdrawal from Iraq, or Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware proposing a confederation of sectarian-based provinces to stem the violence - the Democrats are not united behind one Iraq policy. That can be seen in the disparate campaigning by Democrats on Iraq, with the one common thread a stiff criticism of Bush's "stick with it until victory" policy.

Despite some niche attention to Darfur or Iran or China trade policy, foreign policy in the midterm elections largely boils down to Iraq. Recognizing that, the White House is signaling to voters that it hears and shares their anxiety, some analysts say, while suggesting that adjustments in policy are coming no matter the outcome of the elections.

"It's what I call the law of anticipated reaction," says Lawrence Korb, a former Pentagon official in the Reagan administration, now at the Center for American Progress in Washington. "The White House can read the writing on the wall and is already adjusting: They've given up 'stay the course' and are now talking about tactical adjustments," he says. "That way they get ahead of looking like they are being pushed by the Democrats."

That said, a House or Senate controlled by Democrats would not be welcomed by the White House. After all, relatively recent history shows that a hostile Congress can at least slow a president's preferred foreign-policy course.

As a new president in 1974, Gerald Ford received briefings from Pentagon officials saying the United States could stave off a full victory by North Vietnam in the south with a bombing campaign. But the Republican president decided against it. Faced with stiff opposition to more war from a Congress that had increased its Democratic majority in midterm elections, Mr. Ford would later conclude in his memoirs that approving the airstrikes would have gotten him impeached.

Congressional opposition to Bush's Iraq war policy may not have reached that level. But that and other differences over foreign policy could raise the speed bumps for the White House.

For example, Democrats who were earlier forced to hold a kind of rump committee meeting for retired military officers disgruntled over Iraq could now make such hearings official.

"It will cause problems for Bush, that we know," says Thomas Henriksen, a foreign-policy expert at the Hoover Institution in Stanford, Calif. "We could anticipate new troubles for [Defense Secretary Donald] Rumsfeld, more debate over what we do with radical Islam."

In terms of foreign policy, perhaps even more important than who controls Congress is the fact that Bush will be entering his last two years in the White House. Mr. Henriksen says Bush faces a "double whammy" of receding power and the unpopularity of his defining foreign-policy action.

"It makes him the ultimate lame duck," says Henriksen, who expects Republicans with presidential aspirations to begin distancing themselves from Bush policies that the public has turned against.

But not even this means that major shifts in US foreign policy are likely anytime soon. Some experts point out that Bush, hardly known as a leader who changes his mind easily, has paid little heed to respected foreign-policy thinkers in his own party with differing views: for example, Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, or Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a longtime critic of Bush Iraq policy.

Some observers believe that kind of brushoff will end when the congressionally mandated Iraq Study Group, cochaired by former Secretary of State James Baker III, offers its recommendations sometime after the elections.

But there are even doubts in some quarters over how much stock the White House will put in those recommendations. This suggests to some analysts that the Democrats won't expect to make dramatic changes in foreign policy, even if they manage to win both houses of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0089198

"A lot of Democrats will remember the aftermath of 1994 [midterm elections that delivered a huge Republican tide], when one of the biggest mistakes of the Republicans was to overplay their hand the first year out," says Zelizer of Boston University. "The focus then was the domestic agenda, but it will still serve as a cautionary tale to the Democrats about being too bold."

Bush Family Members Hit The Campaign Trail (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — As President Bush scrambles to fend off a Democratic takeover of Congress, he's getting reinforcements from those closest to him - his family.

His wife, father, mother, at least two of his siblings and a nephew have all become surrogate campaigners in the runup to the Nov. 7 midterm elections to help preserve a Republican congressional majority for the remaining two years of Bush's term.

"They're getting to seem more like the Kennedys," said Stephen Hess, a professor of media and public affairs at The George Washington University, recalling the election-time activism of another famous political clan. "There is no question that, on any particular day, they're all out campaigning for somebody."

Leading the family's charge, of course, is the president, who was in Georgia and Texas on Monday, including a stop in the Houston suburban district of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay.

With a week before voters go to the polls, the election looms as a referendum on Bush's presidency, the war in Iraq and the GOP-led Congress. Growing disenchantment over the war and other policies could cost Republicans their majority in the House of Representatives and possibly the Senate.

Preventing that outcome has become a family affair for the Bush clan. Other than the president, the most visible family member on the campaign trail is first lady Laura Bush, who's shed any remaining vestiges of her reluctance about campaigning to plunge headlong into the 2006 political season.

As of late last week, the first lady had appeared at 51 political events and helped raised $16 million.

The president's wife of 28 years offers an asset that her husband no longer has - a reservoir of good will with the public. According to a Newsweek poll late last week, the president had a 37 percent approval rating. Voters gave Laura Bush a favorable rating of 68 percent in a CNN poll in late September.

Republican political operatives have directed the first lady, as well other family members, to strategic battlegrounds to help struggling GOP incumbents. In a typical foray, the first lady appeared on behalf of Republican Sen. Jim Talent in Missouri and was described in a press account as "the chief attraction" at a fundraiser that collected $300,000 for Talent's campaign.

"There is certainly more demand than there is supply," said Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee. "There are far more requests for Mrs. Bush to travel around the country than she can possibly fill."

Similarly, Bush's parents, former President George H.W. Bush and former first lady Barbara Bush, have repeatedly ventured out of their hometown of Houston to help their party's cause. The president's brother, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, is also working on behalf on GOP candidates.

Others have offered more limited assistance. George P. Bush, the son of Jeb Bush and the president's nephew, has appeared on behalf of several Hispanic Republicans, including Rep. Henry Bonilla of Texas. For the younger Bush, whose mother is Mexican, the appearances extend a high-profile effort to strengthen the Republican Party's ties to Hispanics.

Bush's sister, Doro Bush Koch, who lives in Bethesda, Md., says she has done "a little bit" of work for Maryland Republican Michael Steele in his race for the U.S. Senate. But she's spent most of her time recently promoting her new book on the first Bush to serve in the White House, "My Father, My President, a Personal Account of the Life of George H.W. Bush."

At times, members of the Bush clan cross paths as they swoop into races designated as must-win for Republicans.

The president was in Indiana over the weekend, appearing before more than 4,000 energetic supporters for Rep. Mike Sodrel, who won his seat by only 1,200 votes two years ago. Laura Bush hit Sodrel's district a few days earlier, several weeks after her mother-in-law came to the state.

Florida is another popular Bush destination, giving the former president and former first lady a chance to reunite with their governor-son while helping out the party. Laura Bush has also campaigned in the state.

Bush's parents - he's 82, she's 81 - have been indefatigable. The former president has made stops in at least six states, and his wife has hit at least five.

Although the elder Bush was defeated for re-election, he remains a "venerated figure" among a substantial segment of the electorate, said Norman Ornstein, a resident scholar at the conservative American Enterprise Institute. Barbara Bush, he said, is "still a superstar."

DOJ_NMG_0089199

The white-haired former first lady frequently displays her trademark flair for straight talk or self-deprecating humor. At a Dallas appearance for Texas Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, who's being challenged by Democrat Barbara Ann Radnofsky, Bush said she was surprised to find that Radnofsky's "most stinging criticism was that she called Kay an aging prom queen."

"That sounds pretty good to me," said the former first lady. "I'd love to be a prom queen, aging or fat or whatever."

Controversy Gives Hastert Time At Home (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

BATAVIA, Ill., Oct. 28 — Speaker J. Dennis Hastert is spending a lot of time in his district these days.

He spent part of a cold, blustery Friday in Geneseo at an outdoor ceremony with local business leaders. Nose dripping as he endured 20 minutes of speeches, he spoke only briefly, paying homage to the high school football team. He spent Saturday morning thanking volunteers in his campaign headquarters in Batavia and Sunday afternoon riding his antique fire engine in the Pumpkin Day Parade in Sycamore.

Mr. Hastert, 64, had planned to be on the road in October, campaigning for Republican House members. But most of those events were canceled after Representative Mark Foley's sexually explicit e-mail messages to House pages became public and Mr. Hastert was criticized as not doing more to stop them.

"Sure, it bothers you," Mr. Hastert said in an interview in his headquarters. "But I understand, if I've got 15 television trucks sitting outside my house, and I've got a helicopter looking in the window, you probably don't want to bring that into somebody else's district."

So he has stayed here, in his district west of Chicago, where he used to teach high school and coach wrestling. Mr. Hastert has been elected here 10 times; his opponent, John Laesch, is a carpenter and political newcomer. People call Mr. Hastert Denny and Coach and talk about the bum rap he is getting.

"The way the media's talking, you'd think he was the one that sent the e-mails," says Dennis Wiggins, a friend visiting Mr. Hastert's campaign offices.

Friends say Mr. Hastert is in decent spirits, if going slightly stir crazy at times. "He absolutely misses the campaigning," said Tom Cross, the Republican leader in the Illinois House of Representatives and a former student of Mr. Hastert.

The speaker takes pride in his efforts on behalf of his Republican members. "I've been out in 50 or so districts since the first of August," he said Saturday. But few of the trips have been recent and most took place in August.

He still makes a few carefully selected visits. He traveled Thursday to northeastern Tennessee, where he campaigned for the Republican candidate in a district no Democrat has carried in more than a century.

On Monday, he was in Texas and Oklahoma City, where he attended a fund-raiser for a Congressional candidate whose Democratic opponent promptly accused her of aligning "herself with the disgraced leadership of the Republican Party."

Mr. Hastert is unaccustomed to the role of incendiary figure. He has operated largely out of camera range, leaving much of the focus on deputies. He has always fashioned himself a slightly beleaguered leader, someone who does not need the job and never wanted it.

His unlikely rise came after the would-be successor to Speaker Newt Gingrich, Representative Bob Livingston of Louisiana, bowed out because of marital infidelity. Mr. Hastert was called "the accidental speaker" but has since become the longest-serving Republican in that role.

"The speaker has always brought a real balanced and grounded approach to an otherwise surreal process," says Representative Adam H. Putnam, Republican of Florida and a protégé of Mr. Hastert. "Now he's in the middle of all the surrealness."

Last Tuesday, when Mr. Hastert returned to Washington to testify about the Foley affair before the House ethics committee, reporters and photographers staked out his office. At one point, Mr. Hastert left to use the bathroom down the hall. He greeted reporter Mike Viqueira of NBC, with whom he shares an interest in Japanese culture.

On the way out, Mr. Viqueira asked the speaker in Japanese if he would be "going downstairs" that afternoon, to which Mr. Hastert replied, "Hai" ("Yes").

After lunch, Mr. Hastert rushed downstairs, trailed by members of the news media and an entourage of staff and security. He entered the ethics committee room, in the basement of the Capitol and right next to a House page locker room.

Mr. Hastert stayed for almost three hours, came out, made a quick statement, ignored shouted questions ("Mr. Speaker, will you resign?") and headed out of town.

"When you take a job like this, you basically offer yourself up," Mr. Hastert said Saturday back in Illinois. "You know, you're going to take some criticism. You're going to take some spears."

DOJ_NMG_0089200

The question that lingers is how long Mr. Hastert wants to keep taking spears and offering himself up. Even before he became speaker in 1998, he had spoken to headhunters about jobs in the private sector. He thought seriously about leaving after the 2004 election, but President Bush asked him to stay.

Mr. Hastert says he will run again for speaker if Republicans stay in the majority. Asked whether he will serve out his full term, Mr. Hastert says, “That is my intent,” but shrugs while he says it.

Friends and associates of Mr. Hastert say he seems driven less by any great ambition to remain as speaker and more by a desire to let his reputation recover.

“He needs to win the re-election, keep the majority and continue as speaker because this would be a terrible way for his career to end,” said John Feehery, a former Hastert aide.

Mr. Hastert is also fueled by what appears to be a genuine dislike of Representative Nancy Pelosi, the House minority leader, who would be speaker if Democrats gained 15 seats next week. To invoke Ms. Pelosi as speaker is a Republican talking point, but when Mr. Hastert does it, it smacks of disdain.

Asked if he has spoken to her recently, Mr. Hastert grimaces and says Ms. Pelosi called him last week “to read me the riot act about something.” He adds: “She’s scripted, and you don’t really get a word in edgewise. You don’t get a lot of dialogue.”

Two weeks after the Congressional page scandal erupted, Mr. Hastert bought some farmland along Wisconsin’s western edge. The parcel is the second he had bought there in less than a year. Mr. Hastert and his wife, Jean, have told friends they intend to spend part of their retirement on the property, which sits on a bluff overlooking the Mississippi River.

Republicans See Edge From Early Voting (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And Erika Lovley

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Down in the polls and with their majorities in Congress at risk, Republicans say they have some good news in early-voting statistics that suggest their voter-turnout machine is providing an edge in some tight races.

If the trend holds, it could mean that early voting is growing -- and continuing to benefit Republicans, who exploited the practice in the 1990s. Experts say early voters could be a bigger factor this year when overall voter turnout could be lower than in 2004, a presidential-election year.

This year, though, Democrats contend that Republicans are exaggerating their successes so far, by highlighting a few races, while ignoring problems they are having in motivating their troops around the country. Democrats also questioned several specific Republican claims, while noting their own early-voting numbers show they are starting to catch up with their rivals in early get-out-the-vote efforts in battleground states such as Iowa.

Several of the examples Republicans cite are coming from states and congressional districts where they have some of their strongest local organizations. And despite the strength of the Republican turnout machine in the past few election cycles, it's yet to be seen whether Republicans can replicate isolated success stories across the electoral map in a tight election year.

Early voting has grown in the past 15 years, from around 2% of the national electorate participating to about 20% in 2004, said R. Doug Lewis, executive director of the Election Center in Houston, a nonprofit group. Experts predict this year that 19% to 25% of the electorate will vote early at the polls or by mail-in absentee ballots. That compares with about 14% in 2002, the most recent midterm election.

Republicans have had an advantage with early-voter turnout over Democrats because of better party funding and organization, according to Paul Gronke, director of the Early Voting Information Center at Reed College in Oregon, a state where traditional Election Day polling has been eliminated altogether in favor of voting by mail. "I suspect it will still be their advantage," he said.

In congressional districts from Ohio and Florida to New Mexico and Arizona, Republicans report that their get-out-the-vote organization is gaining traction a week ahead of Election Day. The aim of the effort generally is to maximize turnout among their most loyal and reliable voters. If successful, it could help them to hold down their losses in this election cycle and perhaps even retain their majorities in the House and Senate.

In the fiercely contested New Mexico district held by Republican Heather Wilson, the party says that the number of absentee ballots already requested by Republicans has almost reached the number requested in 2004 -- nearly 22,000 so far this year, compared with almost 24,000 in 2004. The party says it is on a pace to exceed 2004.

Meanwhile, in the bellwether Ohio district held by Republican Steve Chabot, about 60% of all early votes are coming from the roughly 40% of the electorate that the party has targeted for early voting. That's the highest rate in the country, according to an internal party memo, and good news -- "provided they vote the way we predict," the memo adds.

In two Florida districts that are in doubt -- the 13th and 16th, previously held by Reps. Katherine Harris and Mark Foley, respectively -- Republicans are ahead in both absentee balloting and early voting. In previous election cycles, Democrats have enjoyed an advantage in early voting, party operatives say.

And in the Georgia congressional district now held by Democrat Jim Marshall, "nearly twice as many of our supporters are voting as they should be, based on population," according to the internal memo. President Bush will visit the district today to stump for the Republican challenger, former congressman Mac Collins. Republicans hope to unseat Democrats in two districts in Georgia as a way of offsetting losses expected in districts across the Midwest and in the Northeast.

Democrats questioned the Republicans' claims, particularly regarding New Mexico's 1st District. They said Democrats are almost even with Republicans in the number of absentee ballots cast so far in the area, suggesting that the incumbent party is struggling even in a district where its volunteer organization is regarded as one of the best in the country. They also pointed out that Ms. Wilson's real worries lie not with Republicans but with Democrats and independents, who appear to be backing her opponent more strongly than in the past.

"It's a bunch of spin," said Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Stacie Paxton. "I don't think their numbers add up." She said in the battleground state of Iowa, for example, Democrats have returned more absentee ballots than Republicans, and their rate of return is higher too.

To encourage early voting, the parties typically mail out applications for absentee ballots to their targeted voters. Fueling the trend toward early voting, 30 states now allow unrestricted absentee voting, with 15 allowing early voting in person at county-clerk offices and polling areas.

The process isn't free of glitches, though. Some elections experts criticize the widespread use of absentee ballots because of the potential for fraud. And early voting has had at least a few glitches because of mechanical problems.

In Maryland, where voting-machine glitches were reported during primary balloting earlier this year, requests for absentee ballots for Nov. 7 have more than doubled from the number during the state's most recent gubernatorial election in 2002. As of yesterday, 161,094 Maryland voters had requested absentee ballots, according to Donna Duncan, director of election management for the Maryland Board of Elections. Roughly 78,000 were from Democrats and 68,000 from Republicans.

Some analysts have predicted that the growth of early voting -- much of it encouraged by Republicans -- would backfire on the party this year. Analysts figured that many of those early voters would be affected by the run of bad news the party suffered in September and early October, including violence in Iraq and the congressional-page scandal involving Rep. Foley.

But Republican National Committee political director Mike DuHaime said that concern is likely exaggerated, because the party is focused on turning out a relatively reliable core of supporters. "We try to drive people who we feel with a high degree of confidence are going to vote Republican, and leave it to the candidates" to persuade independents and swing voters, he said.

Democrats, Playing Catch-Up, Tap Database To Woo Potential Voters (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In the final week before the election, Democrats pushing to convert their lead in the polls into control of Congress are pinning their hopes of success on an increasingly common tactic for pumping up voter turnout: microtargeting.

The technique aims to identify potential supporters by collecting and analyzing the unprecedented amount of information now readily available -- from census data to credit-card bills -- to profile individual voters. Political strategists then tailor messages to entice those prospects to the polls, using the same methods marketers use to sell autos or aspirin to consumers.

In this tight election year, microtargeting could make the difference in important House and Senate races in states such as Minnesota, Ohio and Pennsylvania. Alexander Gage, president and founder of TargetPoint Consulting, an Alexandria, Va., microtargeting firm that works for the Republican Party, estimates that successful microtargeting can bring congressional campaigns an additional 5,000 to 10,000 votes, a number that could be decisive in a House race. "Politics is always won and lost at the margins," he says.

Democrats are playing catch-up to Republicans, whose use of microtargeting in 2004 energized millions of new voters who backed President Bush. Republicans have since expanded their database in size and sophistication, even as formerly skeptical Democrats have spent millions of dollars building microtargeting systems of their own.

A key player for Democrats is Copernicus Analytics, a small and little-known firm based here that made its name last year by helping to propel Democrat Timothy Kaine to victory in the Virginia governor's race. Big-money, Democratic-leaning clients from the AFL-CIO to Emily's List, a group that backs pro-choice female candidates, have enlisted Copernicus this election year.

Focusing on 29 races, Copernicus says it already has helped campaigns identify more than a million potential new supporters, a significant number given that many races in the closely divided nation are likely to be decided by thin margins.

Copernicus's chief scientist, Ben Yuhas, likens microtargeting to searching for a needle in a haystack -- over and over again. The spreadsheet on a single voter from one of the states where Copernicus is operating contains more than 500 rows of information, ranging from whether a prospect lives in an apartment or house to commercially purchased data on the type of car the voter drives. Mr. Yuhas has developed mathematic formulas based on such factors as length of residence, amount of money spent on golf, voting patterns in recent elections and a handful of other variables to calculate the likelihood that a particular American will vote Democratic.

Last week, a Democratic congressional campaign locked in a tightening race in a battleground Midwestern state asked Copernicus to identify Republicans who could potentially be swayed into voting Democratic, and the issues likeliest to win them over. Copernicus crunched the numbers and came back with its answer: Tens of thousands of Republicans who the company predicted to be abortion-rights supporters didn't have strong partisan affiliation with the Republican Party. Now the campaign, which Copernicus declined to identify, is making a play for those voters.

Microtargeting entered the political mainstream in the 2004 election, when White House adviser Karl Rove, who long ran a direct-mail marketing business, deployed it to reach voters whom Mr. Bush's re-election campaign had failed to reach by other means. The Bush campaign gave TargetPoint $3 million to microtarget voters in 18 states. In Florida, the campaign used microtargeting to make contact with 84% of eventual Bush voters, up from 33% in 2000. In Iowa, the campaign reached 92% of his eventual voters, up from 50% in 2000.

"It gave us a way of finding people we couldn't find before," says Bush strategist Matthew Dowd. "We could get at Bush voters in Democratic precincts, swing precincts and other places we'd never been able to look before."

Republicans have long outstripped Democrats in their support for, and use of, the technique -- an edge the Republicans hope to maintain this election. Today, Republicans use a centralized computer system called Voter Vault that is available to Republican candidates across the country. TargetPoint executives hold monthly conference calls with top Republican operatives such as White House political director Sara Taylor. The Republican National Committee now has data covering tens of millions of voters from across the country, to which TargetPoint has access. In 2004, the firm had such a comprehensive database only for Ohio.

Until recently, Democrats, who had long relied on the old get-out-the-vote muscle of organized labor, were skeptical of building voter databases, says Copernicus founder Mark Steitz, who spent several years as a senior official at the Democratic National Committee in the early 1990s.

In April, frustrated by the lack of a party-driven effort, former Clinton aide Harold Ickes launched a $9 million initiative now known as Catalist to build a massive new voter file that campaigns and interest groups will be able to access directly. Catalist provides Copernicus with data on individual voters, which Copernicus then uses to predict how people with similar profiles will vote.

Though it is working for some individual Democratic campaigns, Copernicus doesn't work for the DNC. Most of the firm's work is for pro-Democratic interest groups. America Votes, a new umbrella group of 32 major liberal organizations including the Sierra Club, is pooling its members' microtargeting efforts in the hopes of boosting Democratic turnout in battleground states. Emily's List is spending $250,000 in Michigan and Minnesota, while the AFL-CIO is spending nearly $2 million more to run microtargeting efforts in more than 24 other states. Both organizations, which are part of the America Votes alliance, mostly use Copernicus, though Emily's List also uses rival company Garin-Hart-Yang, better known for polling work.

Naming his firm Copernicus was Mr. Steitz's nod to the famous 16th-century astronomer, whose work he had studied at St. John's College in Annapolis, Md. The astronomer tried to change how his contemporaries saw the world around them. "Copernicus took individuals out of the center of the physical universe; we are trying to put them back at the center of the political world," Mr. Steitz says.

The firm's number-crunching is done by Mr. Yuhas, who did his doctoral dissertation on lip reading and later spent years in the credit-card industry. He joined Copernicus in early 2005 because of anger at the Bush administration's opposition to stem-cell research. His brother was diagnosed in 1999 with amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or "Lou Gehrig's disease," and Mr. Yuhas saw the administration's stem-cell decision as profoundly misguided.

Messrs. Steitz and Yuhas, whose offices are above a yoga studio here, won their first big victory last year in Mr. Kaine's gubernatorial race. Recently, to illustrate the firm's work, Mr. Steitz called up a color-coded map of Virginia on a large flat-screen computer monitor, noting that none of the state had the bluish tint of a Democratic district. He punched a series of keys and the map zoomed in on a neighborhood, and then a street, until blue dots began appearing. Each dot represented an individual Kaine supporter in Loudon County. The Copernicus system allowed the campaign to find potential supporters regardless of where they lived, based on factors such as whether they lived in private houses (more likely Republican) or apartment buildings (more likely Democratic).

Last year, Copernicus was unable to divide people into segments of like-minded voters, something Mr. Gage at TargetPoint has done for years. That left the Democrats at a disadvantage to Republicans, who have used Mr. Gage's models to decide what themes to emphasize with voter segments such as "Religious Conservative Republicans" or "Tax and Terrorism Moderates."

Copernicus says it has honed its techniques in recent months, enabling it to focus on voters in the same ways Republicans did in 2004. In Minnesota, Copernicus's work has led Democrats to focus on what the firm calls "Rural Religious Moralists," predominantly married women who might be swayed into voting Democratic over health care, education and gasoline prices. In Michigan, the company's work identified "Downscale Union Independents," who are socially conservative but deeply concerned about the economy.

For their part, TargetPoint and Republicans haven't been standing still. After profiling voters in many key states in 2004, the company can generate more detailed predictions of how voters will behave this time around. In Michigan, for example, TargetPoint's Mr. Gage says he will be able to give Republican officials a list of 800,000 voters with a strong likelihood of voting Republican, up from 500,000 in 2004.

Copernicus's Messrs. Steitz and Yuhas, meanwhile, are spending the last days before the election helping a liberal advocacy group compile lists of Christian voters who the company believes can be persuaded to vote Democratic. "We're not saying that all Christian voters can be moved a little on this," Mr. Steitz says. "We're saying that some Christians can be moved significantly, and that we can tell you who they are."

By Liz Sidoti

AP, October 30, 2006

Judging by history — and the latest math — Republicans are likely to lose House seats on Nov. 7.

Democrats now hold a double-digit lead over Republicans on the polling question intended to forecast which party will win control of the House, a gap unseen for at least a decade. Just how many seats — and whether the GOP sustains enough losses for Democrats to rise to power — is less clear.

Admittedly, the question is imperfect. It doesn't mention candidate names and congressional districts, simply asking voters whether they want Democrats or Republicans in charge.

The main problem with the measure: "We have 435 separate elections. This is national polling," says Charles Franklin, a University of Wisconsin-Madison political science professor. "We don't know what's going to happen."

Still, historical trends show that the so-called generic ballot question has proven to accurately predict whether a party will gain seats when other variables are taken into account as well. However, on its own, the question can't say with certainty which side will win the 218 districts needed for a majority.

Little more than a week before the elections, the Democratic advantage in national polls is much wider that in previous midterm elections when Democrats captured a few Republican-held districts. That has led analysts to conclude that Democrats inevitably will gain seats this fall.

For months, Democrats have been widely favored over Republicans on the question most every pollster asks to measure where the campaign for control of the House stands. It's some version of what the Associated Press and Ipsos asks — "If the election for U.S. House of Representatives were held today, would you vote for the Democratic or Republican candidate in your congressional district?"

The latest AP-AOL News poll showed 56 percent of likely voters said Democrats, while 37 percent said Republicans, a 19 percentage-point advantage less than two weeks before voters choose a new House. The gap was 10 percentage points in early October.

Because of the way House districts are drawn, a narrow Democratic advantage in the question doesn't necessarily portend that the party will gain seats. However, the wide gap of late indicates Democrats likely will knock off GOP incumbents because it reflects the mood of the country against the status quo — even though it doesn't directly translate into how many seats Democrats will gain.

"The question traditionally has done a good job of measuring the popular vote, and the popular vote is a good predictor of the number of seats each party will win," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center, an independent public opinion organization.

However, he and other analysts say, because congressional seats have been redistricted through the years to make Republican districts more GOP and Democratic districts more Democratic, there's less of a relationship between the popular vote and the exact number of seats won, which makes for somewhat unreliable forecasts.

Despite such uncertainty, each time a poll comes out, Democrats seize on the results to bolster their argument that the public wants a change in the status quo. Republicans, meanwhile, dismiss the results as not reflective of the race for House control.

To a degree, both are correct.

On one hand, the question can be used as a barometer to measure the political mood of the nation. And, right now, polls show that voters are very disgruntled with the GOP-controlled Congress and more apt to put Democrats in charge of the House.

"What it tells you more than anything else is who's running into the wind and who's got the wind at their backs," said Geoff Garin, a Democratic pollster. So far, he said: "This tells a horrible story for Republicans."

On the other hand, the question is broad and riddled with problems. Chief among them is the question's lack of specificity, which analysts say undermines its validity.

The question doesn't mention names, districts, challengers or incumbents. It doesn't take into account other factors specific to the race, such as the personal attributes of the candidates or the local issues and where candidates stand on them.

That explains why voters say they favor Democrats to run the House, but also say — when asked a more specific question — that they overwhelmingly support their own congressman.

"What you're ultimately trying to do is figure out what's the greatest predictor of whether the party of the president is going to win or lose seats," said Steven Lombardo, a Republican pollster, who suggested that better measures would be the president's approval rating. "Ultimately, there's no one single data point or place you can go to tell you what's going to happen."

The best measure — analysts agree — is individual polls in each competitive House district, a costly and cumbersome task.

The Six-Year Itch By MICHAEL BARONE (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

As Democrats begin, in George W. Bush's words, "measuring the drapes" in the offices of the House speaker and Senate majority leader, it's worth looking back on the history of sixth-year-of-the-presidency off-year elections. Have big gains for the out party been a harbinger of future voting patterns? And have opposition victories in those elections resulted in significant public policy changes? History gives us clear answers to those questions. They are: sometimes yes and sometimes no.

Sometimes yes: In the post-Civil War years, there were two big sixth-year victories for the out party. The first was in 1874, during the presidency of Ulysses S. Grant, when the opposition Democrats converted a 194-92 deficit in the House to a 169-109 majority. Historians writing in the backwash of the New Deal tended to ascribe this reverse to the Panic of 1873. But my reading of history tells me that this was a revolt against Grant's policy of stationing troops in the South to enforce civil rights for blacks. Americans had been growing weary of this strife (as they may be growing weary of the strife today in Iraq) and wanted the troops sent home. They were, and Democrats held the House for 16 of the next 20 years -- and Southern blacks were left to the mercies of segregation laws and lynch mobs.

There was another great reversal 20 years later -- the greatest in American electoral history. Amid a depression deeper than any except that of the 1930s, with violent labor strikes and low farm prices, the House flipped to 244-105 Republican from 218-127 Democratic. This was the beginning of the McKinley Republican majority (said to be the model of Karl Rove) which prevailed for most of the time till the '30s. The laissez-faire policies of Democratic President Grover Cleveland were rejected, even by his own party, and the era of Progressive government interventionism -- and Republican majorities -- followed. This sixth-term off-year election was consequential indeed.

The 20th century presents more of a mixed bag. In 1938 FDR's Democrats had been flying high for six years. In 1936 they won the popular vote for the House by 56%-40%. But in 1938 the popular vote was only 49%-47% Democratic and Republicans gained 75 seats. For most of the next 20 years Congress was dominated by an anti-New Deal coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats, much to the fury of liberal political scientists who argued that every Democrat should somehow be compelled to vote for Roosevelt-type programs. FDR's Third New Deal, as Alan Brinkley chronicled, was stopped in its tracks. The field was set for talented maneuverers like the (in 1938) freshman Congressman Lyndon Johnson to manipulate the system for his conservative and Democratic confreres.

The 1946 elections looked like another landscape-altering reversal. Republicans won the House races by a 53%-44% popular vote majority and got a 245-188 majority. "Had enough?" was their slogan, and they promptly set about repealing wartime wage and price controls, reducing wartime tax rates and passing the Taft-Hartley Act, which reduced the power of labor unions (1946 saw the largest number of strikes in American history). They also supported Harry Truman's Cold War aid to Turkey and Greece and the Marshall Plan. This 80th Congress, which Harry Truman labeled "do nothing," and in which Richard Nixon and John Kennedy served as freshmen, made major changes in public policy. But the Republicans' work having been done, the voters pitched them out in 1948. Republicans never again had such a large House majority.

The next big change came in President Eisenhower's sixth year, 1958. It was a recession year, at a time when most voters still feared that the Depression of the 1930s might be returning. Democrats gained 15 seats in the Senate and 50 in the House. This was the first Congress in which a majority believed in FDR's New Deal, 13 years after his death. Their numbers were winnowed a bit in 1960 and 1962 but were augmented in 1964, enough to produce the votes for LBJ's Great Society measures and, with support from most Republicans, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Less consequential for changes in public policy were the Republican gains in the Kennedy-Johnson sixth year, 1966, when Republicans won more House votes than Democrats outside the South; the feat was accomplished again in 1968, when Nixon was elected president. This was a reaction against the Great Society, against riots in the streets of the big cities and uprisings on campuses. But under Nixon, Congress ratified the expansion of government -- through wage and price controls, the creation of OSHA and EPA, racial quotas and preferences. Thwarted in his drive for Republican majorities in 1970, he campaigned in 1972 in tandem with conservative Democrats like John Connally. He evidently supposed that Southern Democrats would stick with him on big issues. But when Watergate became an issue, Sam Ervin and other longtime opponents of civil rights let him down. The War Powers and Budget Acts were passed despite Nixon's opposition. The sixth-year election produced neither a Republican majority nor conservative public policies.

Similarly, the big Democratic gains in the Nixon-Ford year of 1974 did not produce policy gains or lasting partisan gains for the out party. The new 2-1 Democratic majority in the House did stifle attempts to come to the relief of Saigon. But under Gerald Ford and his successor Jimmy Carter domestic policy did not move far left. Deregulation of transportation and communications proceeded, and a 2-1 Democratic House passed a tax bill that cut the capital gains tax and included the great generator of individual investment accounts, Section 401(k).

Under Ronald Reagan, the House, with reduced Democratic majorities, and the Senate, with a Republican majority produced by narrow victories in 1980, cut tax rates and refused to cripple the policies by which Reagan defeated communism and won the Cold War. More consequential were the Republicans' big gains in 1994, in Bill Clinton's second (not his sixth) year. These gains resulted in welfare reform, a balanced budget and the Bush tax cuts, and a Republican trend that has lasted 12 years. But a lot of conservatives now are asking the old political question, what have you done for me lately?

All of which leaves me with the conclusion that ideas are more important than partisan vote counts. Democrats could not go beyond the New Deal from 1938 to 1958, because they had not persuaded most Americans to go Roosevelt's way until 13 years after his death. Similarly, Republicans never had reliable majorities for Reagan's polices until 1994, six years after he left office. Democratic gains in 1974 made the House the most left-leaning branch of government for 20 years -- in vivid contrast to the prognostication of '60s liberals, who said it would always be the most conservative -- and Republican gains in 1994 made it the most conservative-leaning. Those majorities affected public policy, but not always in ways their partisans liked.

If the Democrats are justified in preparing to change the drapes today, the questions to ask are: How enduring will be such a partisan switch? How much change in public policy will it accomplish? To the first question, the likelihood of an enduring partisan switch is not high -- if you believe the polls showing the leading Republicans, Rudy Giuliani and John McCain, walloping the best-known Democrats, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Al Gore, in 2008. Changes in public policy? Well, the lead item on the Democrats' wish list is to raise the minimum wage, a law first passed in 1938. Not exactly a new idea.

I don't know what the results of the midterm elections of 2006 will be. But I doubt that they will have the sweeping partisan or policy consequences of the midterm elections of 1874 and 1894, or 1938 and 1994.

Heavy Coverage At Midterm Favors Democrats, Study Says (USAT)

USA Today, October 31, 2006

Network news coverage has favored Democratic candidates in the midterm election, and the page scandal involving former congressman Mark Foley has been the main story line, drawing almost as much coverage as Iraq and terrorism combined, a new study finds.

An analysis by the Center for Media and Public Affairs of midterm election stories aired on the ABC, CBS and NBC evening newscasts Sept. 5-Oct. 22 found that 2006's coverage has been almost five times as heavy as in the 2002 midterm elections: 167 stories, compared with 35 four years ago.

The study found that three out of four evaluations of Democratic candidates' chances of winning — such as sound bites — were positive, compared with one out of eight for Republicans. Coverage has been dominated by two major themes: the effects of the Foley scandal, and the impact the Bush presidency is having on the party's congressional candidates.

The Foley scandal produced 59 stories alone, compared with 33 on Iraq and 31 on terrorism/national security issues. “What's hurting Republican candidates is the media's focus on two non-candidates: Mark Foley and George W. Bush,” says center director Robert Lichter.

Because of the focus on Foley, the re-election race of House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., was featured in 42 stories. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., was featured in 10 stories, even though he's not up for re-election this year. Sen. Hillary Clinton's possible 2008 presidential run was grist for nine stories.

MSNBC gets into Hotsoup

MSNBC and a new grass-roots community political website, Hotsoup.com, have a long-term deal to share content that the cable channel hopes will initially help round out coverage of the midterm elections and that Hotsoup hopes will put it on the map.

MSNBC.com's politics section, with content from NBC News and The National Journal, will be further bolstered by daily and weekly commentary and analysis from Ron Fournier, a Hotsoup co-founder and former AP political reporter.

The pact is the latest example of mainstream outlets entering into strategic partnerships with online sites and younger-skewing media to stay relevant and take the pulse of the nation, especially Web-savvy viewers and readers. On election night, CNN and Fox News will team with bloggers for coverage.

“This is the Internet version of ‘man on the street' or taking calls on Larry King Live,” says MSNBC vice president Tammy Haddad, who once produced King for CNN. “We're saying, ‘We want to know what you think.' We're involving the community.”

Along from comments from ordinary people, political strategists from both parties who contribute to Hotsoup will now be featured on MSNBC. “We're going to hear their strategy, what they're thinking about,” Haddad says.

“Our audience is deeply news attentive, very interested in the current conversation, so being able to expand the voice of what's going on in our site to a larger audience is very important,” says Hotsoup co-founder Chip Smith.

Since no money is changing hands, the deal is also attractive to NBC at a time when the network is cutting costs.

As Election Nears, A Flood Of Nastiness (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON

A taxpayer-funded call to a fantasy sex hot line. Support for using Taser weapons on 7-year-olds. Votes in Congress to deny modern body armor to US troops in Iraq.

These are but a few of the charges leveled in campaign ads against candidates for office this fall, in what some experts say is probably the most negative US election campaign in modern times.

Nasty, misleading ads have been around for decades, and it's impossible to prove empirically that the 2006 campaign tops them all, but the wave of over-the-top claims has caught the attention of both casual observers and professionals.

"Politics has always been a contact sport, but it really does feel like the rhetoric has crossed a line," says Evan Tracey, a campaign ad analyst at TNS Media Intelligence in Arlington, Va. "We've had ads with baby-crying noises from dumpsters, Playboy mansions, criminals coming over the border creating crime and mayhem. And that's the tame stuff."

Control of Congress hangs in the balance, and in many cases, the highly negative ads are coming out of close races where strategists - either for the campaigns or from the parties and independent groups that are trying to help - believe they will make a difference. They can also be seen as a sign of desperation. In some cases the ads appear to work and in others they backfire (see story below), but when a candidate is trailing badly, strategists often feel there's nothing to lose.

Perhaps the most talked-about ad of this cycle took shots at Rep. Harold Ford (D) of Tennessee, who is running for the Senate. The ad - which ended with a blond, scantily clad woman saying, "Call me" - was perceived by some viewers as racially motivated, since Mr. Ford is black and the woman in the ad is white. If nothing else, the uproar over the ad demonstrated that sensitivities about possible racial innuendo are alive and well in American politics. Ads as sources of information

As distasteful as negative ads can be to the viewing public, many campaign experts defend them for their ability to provide useful information to voters.

"There's nothing inherently wrong with negative advertising, if it's accurate," says Brooks Jackson, a former journalist and director of the Annenberg Political Fact Check project. "A positive ad can also be inaccurate and misleading. That's political disinformation that's also a bad thing."

Often, though, negative ads contain a kernel of truth that is distorted beyond the point of fairness. Take the "fantasy hot line" ad unleashed against Michael Arcuri (D), district attorney in New York's Oneida County, who hopes to fill the seat of retiring Rep. Sherwood Boehlert (R). The National Republican Campaign Committee (NRCC) created a spot accusing Mr. Arcuri of billing taxpayers for a phone call to a sex hot line, and depicting Arcuri with the silhouette of a dancing girl. According to records released by Arcuri's campaign, the truth is that someone misdialed the hot line in a call from Arcuri's hotel room, hung up in seconds, and dialed the intended number - the state Department of Criminal Justice Services in Albany.

Arcuri's Republican opponent, state Sen. Ray Meier, also denounced the ad and called on the NRCC to pull it, but by law, political campaigns are barred from conferring with groups that make independent expenditures on candidates' behalf. Ultimately, the ad did not air on most stations in that part of New York, according to the local press.

Democrats are also producing their share of negative ads deemed unfair by watchdog groups. Mr. Jackson's group, which posts its findings at www.factcheck.org, found 11 ads by Democrats that accused Republican incumbents of voting against a $1,500 bonus for US troops.

One such ad, produced by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) and aired in New Mexico to support House challenger Patricia Madrid, accused her opponent of voting against the bonus (and for a congressional pay raise) - but failed to note that the bonus would have come at the expense of reconstruction funds for Iraq. Rep. Heather Wilson (R), the incumbent, is locked in a tight race with Ms. Madrid, state attorney general. Negative-ad advantage: Republicans

Between the two House campaign committees, the Republicans are beating the Democrats in the race to the bottom. According to a report released last week on Factcheck.org, the NRCC so far this cycle has spent $41.9 million attacking Democrats and $5 million supporting Republicans - about 8 to 1 negative versus positive advertising. The DCCC has spent $18 million on attacks and $3.1 million on positive ads - a 5 to 1 ratio.

Looking at all campaign spending for all races - projected to come in at $2.6 billion, a record for a midterm election - ad-watchers cannot say for certain which party is more guilty of attacks. "I would guarantee you it's equal opportunity," says Mr. Tracey. "The Republican Party is not Darth Vader and the Democrats are not Luke Skywalker. It's basically, once one goes negative, everybody goes negative."

Whether negative ads drive down turnout is open to debate. But if it does, says Tracey, that's not the ads' fault. "This is America, where you've got this great right people die and bleed for. If you're going to let a bunch of silly commercials stop you from voting, it's your fault."

Still, any political candidate knows that blaming voters for their decisions - including whether or not to vote - is a losing proposition. And so, aware of the public's distaste for negativity, many see the good-cop bad-cop routine at work in Missouri. There, Senate candidate Claire McCaskill (D), locked in a close race to unseat Sen. James Talent (R), says she will not air negative ads, knowing well that the party and surrogates will do the dirty work.

But Ms. McCaskill has herself attacked Senator Talent's positions, his loyalty to President Bush, and his campaign donations, notes David Robertson, a political scientist at the University of Missouri in St. Louis. She also approved ads featuring actor Michael J. Fox, who is diagnosed with Parkinson's disease and who favors embryonic stem-cell research, in which Mr. Fox asserts that Talent wants to "criminalize the science that gives us a chance for hope."

But, Mr. Robertson adds, Talent's ads have been perceived to be more personal and mean-spirited than McCaskill's. "These ads have hurt his image as a nice-guy, conservative, policy wonk," he says.

On The Fence On Election Day; Naming 'Worst' Immigration Ads (WSJ)

By Aaron Rutkoff And Jennifer Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

AD WATCH: The national debate on immigration policy, which came to a head in a midterm election year, has been a bountiful source of negative advertising. At the New Republic Online, the center-left magazine's editors provide a handy list1 ranking "the seven worst immigration campaign ads," which coincides with an editorial2 excoriating the party behind each and every one.

All seven ads flagged by the New Republic -- and mostly pulled from YouTube, which features dozens of other examples -- have been made by or for Republican candidates. Democrats, as a group, surely succumb to their own issue-exploitation instincts, but by and large immigration is not that issue. "The genre has several hallmarks," TNR's editorial explains. "It evokes a fear of lawlessness and a sense of growing social decay; it impugns opponents with a lack of patriotism (MITCHELL AGAINST ENGLISH LANGUAGE, reads the bottom of the screen in one of Representative J.D. Hayworth's ads3)."

Vernon Robinson, a long shot ultra-conservative congressional candidate from North Carolina, earns the distinction of having two of his campaign's ads on the TNR list. One, a radio spot4, is sung to the tune of the "Beverly Hillbillies" theme song. Rep. Brad Miller, the incumbent, has "all the sneaky aliens eating from his hand," according to the lyrics. A Vernon Robinson TV ad5, which took first place in the rankings, features an image of a Latino man grabbing his crotch and the disturbing suggestion that illegal immigrants "take our jobs and our government handouts, then spit in our face and burn our flag."

Peter Roskam, a Republican vying for an open House seat in Illinois, also has two ads on the list (one paid for by the NRCC6) accusing his Democratic rival of supporting tax hikes to pay for "handouts for illegal aliens7." A hardnosed immigration-themed ad from the gubernatorial race in Colorado is also included.

Beyond Republican sponsorship, these ads demonstrate an interesting trend: All but the Hayworth ad, from Arizona, originate from states that are located far from the Mexican border. * * *

DESERT DECISIONS: In Arizona, the fault lines on the immigration issue are impossibly tangled. In one congressional district on the border, Republican hardliner Randy Graf has called for the expulsion of undocumented immigrants, staking out a position far from much more moderate views of Democrat Gabrielle Giffords. The irony, as the Christian Science Monitor points out8, is that the district's retiring Republican congressman, Jim Kolbe, has publicly sided with Ms. Giffords on the issue.

And even Mr. Graf can find himself shocked by immigration foes in his district. At a rally, the CSM article notes, someone handed him a denim vest that allegedly belonged to an illegal alien. "When Mr. Graf put it on, the crowd cheered. But the theatrics went too far, and his face blanked when the giver joked: 'It has a bullet hole in the back.'"

Meanwhile, Republican Rep. J.D. Heyworth, an incumbent with an anti-immigration platform, has found himself under attack from his Democratic challenger for not doing enough to fix the problem. "The number of illegal immigrants in our state has increased 400% during his tenure in Congress," declares an ad for challenger Harry Mitchell, according to a Cox News Service report9.

And then there is Arizona's Democratic governor, Janet Napolitano. As the Cox story indicates, she's "expected to win re-election handily despite her support of a guest-worker program that would allow illegal immigrants to get temporary visas" – an outcome that may show limits of the immigration issue's power over statewide voters.

In final twist, Arizona also features four immigration-tinged ballot issues10. Proposition 103 would make English the state's official language, although as an Arizona Republic article11 indicates, even if passed little would change. "Ballots would still be printed in Spanish because federal law requires it. Conversations at government offices, from the Motor Vehicle Division to the agency that issues birth certificates, could continue in languages other than English."

The remaining ballot initiatives would deny certain benefits, such as in-state college tuition and subsidized childcare, to illegal immigrants; amend the state constitution to prevent illegal immigrants from winning punitive damages in court; and eliminate bail for illegal immigrants arrested on felony charges. * * *

SUBURBAN BATTLE: Border security and illegal immigration have emerged as defining issues in two bitterly contested congressional races12 in the Chicago suburbs. It's part of the new "suburban political landscape," according to Oscar Avila and John Blemer in the Chicago Tribune. In this world, immigrants play a central role in the economy, but residents see their presence as a drain on resources.

Republicans have rolled out immigration ads in many of these suburban areas, and polls shows that the issue has energized the Republican base. In Illinois's 6th District, an ad for Peter Roskam criticizes his Democratic opponent, Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth, for her support of an immigration reform bill.

Still, a study found that these Chicago districts have added 45,000 naturalized citizens since 2000, and that means 45,000 potential new voters. * * *

TEXAS: Republican Cynthia Calhoun is using her maiden name of Figueroa when she runs for Dallas County clerk this time around. And Rose Renfroe went to court to be able to use her nickname, "Rosita," on the ballot for District 4 Commissioners Court. Dallas Morning News columnist Mercedes Oliveras asks: Is being a Latino finally an advantage at the ballot box13?

"I am encouraged ... that there are more Hispanics on the ballot. It's more reflective of the community, and the more Hispanics you have running, the more it encourages other Hispanics to go out and vote," says Juan Jasso, a Dallas County justice of the peace.

These local Texas races could signal a shift that some say "will propel [Dallas County] and Texas into the blue column sometime within the next six to eight years," she writes. Political consultant Dan Weiser says Dallas will be the first major urban county in Texas to swing back to Democrats. He says other cities will follow as the state's Hispanic population grows and Latinos become familiar with the voting process. * * *

AND THE WINNER IS …: As we near the midterm milestone, two conservative analysts present retrospectives on the immigration issue. Oddly, however, the authors reach opposite conclusions about who emerged victorious from the immigration policy trenches.

John Fonte, a Hudson Institute fellow writing in the National Review this week14, looks back at the now-signed fence legislation passed without even the suggestion of a guest-worker program – and declares it a victory for ordinary citizens over institutional elites. "How did this happen?" he asks. "The answer is that it happened because the House Republican leadership (with help from Senate conservatives) made immigration enforcement a priority, fought for it, and won in the face of vehement elite opposition."

Given this assessment, Mr. Fonte darkly notes that the anti-amnesty bulwark formed by the Republican-controlled House seems most vulnerable now in the midterm elections. "A change in House leadership from Republican to Democrat will mean a major change in immigration policy," he writes. "It will mean amnesty, a massive increase in legal, low-skilled immigration, and the gutting of serious border and interior enforcement."

Manhattan Institute scholar Tamar Jacoby, writing in this month's Foreign Affairs magazine15, foresees that same outcome. But, on her analysis, the hallmarks of the "comprehensive reform" agenda on immigration will win the day because of an emergent national consensus on the issue. "In fact, the nation is far less divided on immigration, legal or illegal, than the current debate suggests," she writes. "[A]n overwhelming majority -- between two-thirds and three-quarters in every major poll -- would like to see Congress address the problem with a combination of tougher enforcement and earned citizenship for the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already living and working here." In her full essay, Ms. Jacoby maps out the immigration realignment to come. * * *

DETERMINING FACTOR? Immigration has never been such a hot-button political issue, says Brian Mitchell of Investor's Business Daily, but it still isn't likely to be a determining factor in most midterm elections16. Recent Republican scandals have pushed immigration into the background. Plus, Republicans "torn between pro-immigration donors and anti-immigration voters" have shied away from the issue, he writes.

In races where candidates differ on immigration reform, Mr. Mitchell says the issue hasn't paid off as much as hoped. Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum has attacked Democratic challenger Bob Casey Jr. on the issue for months in various political ads. Still, polls show Mr. Casey with a slight lead.

"Republicans are more anti-immigration than Democrats," he writes, "but the GOP's split between its leadership and grass-roots has kept the party from taking advantage."

Republicans' Double Negatives (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Ronald Reagan's brilliant achievement on behalf of American conservatism was to capture hope and optimism from a liberal movement that enjoyed a near monopoly on those virtues from the day Franklin Roosevelt told us we had nothing to fear but fear itself.

Whatever else it will be remembered for, this year's campaign will mark the moment when Republican leaders who govern in the name of conservatism turned definitively away from hope and waged one of the most trivial and ugly campaigns in our country's history.

It's common to gather all political attacks under one large rubric called "negative campaigning" and to condemn the lot. But this is misleading.

A conservative who attacks his opponent for wanting to raise taxes and a liberal who accuses an adversary of favoring cuts in Medicare or environmental programs are both being "negative," but legitimately so, presuming that the criticisms are rooted in fact. If candidates can't air their disagreements, what's the point of free elections?

But this year Republican campaigners and their advocates in the conservative media have crossed line after line in sheer meanness, triviality and tastelessness. Conservative optimism and its promise of morning in America have curdled into the gloom of a Halloween midnight horror show.

The reason is obvious: With the public turning against President Bush's policies in Iraq, most Republicans would prefer not to defend the war. Because most voters do not see the battle in Iraq as making us more secure, fear of terrorism has not worked as effectively for the GOP as it has in the past two elections. And the current majority can't exactly brag about, say, balanced budgets or its achievements in this Congress.

And so in Virginia we have Sen. George Allen, a Republican, assailing the widely admired novels written by his opponent, Democrat Jim Webb, for what an Allen adviser called "chauvinistic attitudes and sexually exploitative references." Lost here is that Webb's fiction has drawn praise for the moving and realistic way he has depicted war and those who fight for their country.

Conservatives should be embarrassed by Allen's last-minute sliming of Webb's books, since conservative critics have been among their biggest fans. In 2002 a writer for National Review, one of the nation's leading conservative publications, said Webb's "Fields of Fire" was "still the finest novel yet written about Vietnam." Reviewing Webb's novel "Lost Soldiers," a writer for the conservative Weekly Standard warmly praised the book's moral message and called it "an affecting and taut tale."

Are such views now inoperative because Republicans desperately need to hold on to Allen's Senate seat?

And how many compassionate conservatives will come forward to condemn Rush Limbaugh's cruelty in mocking Michael J. Fox's painful body movements induced by Parkinson's disease? Limbaugh felt free to parody Fox's agony because the actor had the nerve to make advertisements for Democratic candidates who support embryonic stem cell research. If you help

DOJ_NMG_0089210

Democrats, anything goes. Limbaugh claimed that Fox either "didn't take his medication or he's acting." Limbaugh ultimately apologized but called Fox "really shameless" in seeking sympathy. Really shameless? From Limbaugh?

Perhaps Republicans will be less skittish about criticizing Limbaugh after he has used his broadcast to turn out the party faithful on Nov. 7.

Space does not permit a full listing of other trivial and seamy ads being run by the GOP. They were well described last week by Post reporter Michael Grunwald, and many of them falsely accuse various Democrats of one bad thing or another related to sex.

And there is what will, sadly, become the most famous advertisement of this election cycle, the "Harold, call me" ad run by the Republican National Committee against Rep. Harold Ford Jr., the Democratic candidate for the Senate from Tennessee. To claim that an ad depicting a pretty blond woman coming on to an African American politician does not play on the fears of miscegenation on the part of some whites is to ignore history.

My hunch is that the sliminess won't work this year. A Newsweek poll published over the weekend found that only 9 percent of voters who have seen Republican ads say they made them more likely to vote for GOP candidates; 24 percent said the ads made them less likely to vote for Republicans. By contrast, Newsweek reported, "The Democrats seem to turn off fewer voters with their commercials and win more over, but it's still a wash," meaning that Democratic ads attracted and pushed away roughly equal shares of the electorate.

My hope is that principled conservatives will rebel against those who are dragging their once forward-looking movement through the mud. In their hearts, they have to be asking: Would Ronald Reagan campaign this way?

Ad Echoes GOP's 'Southern Strategy' (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, October 31, 2006

Last year, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman apologized for the race-baiting tactics that members of his party used for decades to court white voters in Southern states.

Last week, he started backsliding.

"I just think those criticisms of it are wrong," Mehlman said of a television ad that was produced with money from his treasury and aired in Tennessee. In the 30-second spot, a scantily clad white woman appears to suggest that she and Harold Ford Jr., a black Democrat, have had an intimate relationship.

"I met Harold at the Playboy party," the woman coos into the camera. That's a reference to Ford's admission that he attended a party that Playboy hosted during the 2005 Super Bowl. As the commercial closes, the woman says with a salacious wink, "Harold, call me."

The commercial plays to the fears of whites who think interracial relationships are taboo. It also conjures up memories of the awful fate that befell the Scottsboro Boys, Matt Ingram and Emmett Till — blacks who were victimized for simply being accused of getting too close to white women.

Mehlman wants us to think that's not his intention. He wants us to believe that although he funded the ad, he had absolutely no knowledge of its content.

William Cohen, a former Republican senator from Maine and a former Defense secretary whose wife is African-American, said the commercial was "an appeal to racist sentiment." Even Corker called the ad "over the top." While that was a fairly tame criticism, it at least put a little distance between Corker and the racist attack that was made on his behalf.

"The way that process works under the campaign reform laws is I write a check to an independent individual and that person's responsible for spending money in certain states," Mehlman said lamely during an appearance on MSNBC.

The problem with this dodge is that a voice in the commercial, which was pulled off the air late last week, loudly proclaims: "The Republican National Committee is responsible for the content of this advertising."

"Some Republicans gave up on winning the African-American vote, looking the other way or trying to benefit politically from racial polarization," Mehlman said of the GOP's "Southern strategy," during his 2005 speech at the NAACP convention. "I am here today as the Republican chairman to tell you we were wrong."

DOJ_NMG_0089211

That mea culpa came at a time when Republicans had a firm grip on Congress, and it was touted by some as proof of the sincerity of Mehlman's outreach to black voters. But now — plagued by scandal and President Bush's war policies — the GOP could be on the verge of losing control of both houses of Congress.

And so Republicans have dusted off their Southern strategy playbook. Mehlman won't admit as much. But the subtle racism of the ad is just a new twist on the more blatant appeals the GOP used to make to whites who were angered by the Democratic Party's embrace of the civil rights movement.

I don't know how voters in Tennessee will react to the GOP's bigoted ad. It's hard to tell in a contest as close as this one what might influence the outcome. But I'm certain of this much: The Republican Party is not done with its Southern strategy. It hasn't given up on appealing to people's fears. It hasn't tired of stoking the still-smoldering embers of white racism.

And if Mehlman's refusal to condemn this ad is any indication, Republicans will continue to use their Southern strategy — at whatever cost — for as long as it gets them the results they seek.

Former Republicans Campaign As Democrats (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

Call it the year of the former Republican.

At a time of widely expected Republican losses in both chambers of Congress, a new breed of politician has emerged: former Republicans challenging Republican incumbents.

Most famous is James H. Webb Jr., who served as Navy secretary under President Reagan and is challenging Sen. George Allen in Virginia. Mr. Webb wears combat boots on the campaign trail, loves his guns and chews tobacco.

Then there's Tim Mahoney, a Florida Republican-turned-Democrat running for the seat of disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley. Mr. Mahoney lists Ronald Reagan as a political hero, opposes the "death tax" and calls himself a "conservative Christian."

In New York, former Republican Jack Davis is giving Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds one of the biggest challenges of his career. Mr. Davis, a multimillionaire businessman, says he wants to end illegal entry without granting amnesty, opposes higher taxes and wants to kill the death tax.

In Florida's 13th Congressional District, former banker and former Republican Christine Jennings is running as a Democrat for the seat being vacated by Rep. Katherine Harris. She, too, is running on tax cuts and greater fiscal responsibility in Washington.

All are the kind of Democrats that Republicans have a difficult time hating. Hearing them explain why they left the Republican Party is like listening to voters today talk about why a growing number of them are tired of Republicans in Washington.

"Congress has run up the national debt to an astounding $8.4 trillion, mortgaging our future and saddling our children and grandchildren for endless years," said Mrs. Jennings, who promises to balance the nation's checkbook.

Mr. Mahoney, an investment banker and cattle rancher, said he got fed up with the Republicans' out-of-control spending, scandals and poor handling of the war in Iraq. He calls himself a "common-sense businessman who reflects the values and morals of Florida's families."

Mr. Webb left the party in large part out of disgust over the Republican response to the September 11 terrorist attacks and over the war in Iraq.

"He's a Vietnam veteran, and these guys were politicizing the war," said campaign adviser Steve Jarding, who has long argued that Democrats must appeal to a broader audience to survive as a political force.

Just a few years ago, Mr. Jarding said, a conservative candidate such as Mr. Webb would not have been welcomed by party leaders unless he or she submitted to the party's entire platform. This year, winning trumped ideology.

"They're more accepting of people with different ideas, and that's a difference," Mr. Jarding said. "We're not going to be having all these litmus tests because they were killing us."

Mr. Jarding said that had Democratic primary voters sided in the primary with Harris Miller -- a longtime politician who is ideologically more in tune with national Democrats -- "we would be 40 points behind George Allen right now."

"Democrats are finally wising up," he said.

As a result, Senate Democrats will move rightward if candidates such as Mr. Webb, Bob Casey Jr. in Pennsylvania, Jon Tester in Montana and Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. in Tennessee win their general elections.

Republicans in the chamber, meanwhile, stand to lose some of their most conservative voices. Among the incumbents in the tightest races are Sens. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Conrad Burns of Montana and Jim Talent of Missouri.

DOJ_NMG_0089212

Strategists from both parties expect Democrats to gain 10 seats or more in the House. But the strategists note that since pickup seats by definition come from districts held by the other party, the new Democratic lawmakers likely will be more conservative than the current Democrat caucus.

GOP Seeks To Benefit From Gay Marriage Ruling (TSSC)

By Steven Thomma

The State (SC), October 30, 2006

NORFOLK, Va. - In the final stretch before Election Day, embattled Republicans feel as if they've received a gift from an unlikely donor: advocates of gay marriage.

They think that last week's ruling by New Jersey's Supreme Court ordering equal rights for gay couples - seven of whom had sued for the right to marry - is re-energizing Christian conservatives, who had been losing interest in and passion for politics. Republicans predict that could draw more conservatives to the polls next week, especially in the eight states that will vote on proposed amendments to their state constitutions to ban gay marriage.

The eight states comprise Virginia, Tennessee - coincidentally two states with razor-close Senate races that could decide which party controls the Senate next year - Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Getting conservative Christians to the polls also could help Republicans in some close races for the House of Representatives, such as the one in Virginia's 2nd Congressional District. It's home to Pat Robertson's Christian Broadcasting Network and Regent University and includes a large number of Christian conservatives.

"It will improve turnout on our side," said Rep. Thelma Drake, R-Va., who's in a close re-election battle with Democratic challenger Phil Kellam. "We all work very hard for turnout. This is a plus for us."

Nearby, Sen. George Allen, R-Va., visited two largely black churches Sunday, where he invoked the New Jersey ruling as a potent reminder of the need to pass the proposed amendment to the Virginia state constitution banning gay marriage.

"The Supreme Court decision in New Jersey this week showed even more importantly to the people of Virginia why the Virginia marriage-protection amendment is so important," he said afterward.

Asked if the issue would help him appeal to African-Americans, who might have grown skeptical about his candidacy after news reports that he used racial epithets while in college, Allen noted that several people at one service stood up in support of his remarks about marriage.

"There will be some who say, and they will be wrong, that this is a divisive issue," he said during a later campaign event with two former pro football players, both African-American. "I look at it as a bridging issue. This is one that brings many people of different backgrounds together. Bringing the issue up as a salient issue, regardless of race or ethnicity or religious denomination, unites many people."

After years of growing political participation and helping Republicans win, Christian conservatives have been pulling back this year, frustrated by their inability to win significant victories in public policy such as a ban on abortion, and perhaps disillusioned by the page sex scandal in the House.

One sign: The ranks of Christian conservatives with favorable views of the party dropped from 74 percent two years ago to 54 percent this year, according to the Pew Research Center.

"Evangelicals remain the party's most supportive group, but at levels significantly diminished from where they were in the 2002 and 2004 elections," a recent Pew analysis said.

If a rally Sunday in Norfolk is a guide, however, the threat of the New Jersey ruling could bring some of them back into politics.

"I'm a born-again Christian," said Vernon Mills, a retired Navy veteran from Norfolk, standing amid a sea of yellow lawn signs urging support for the anti-gay marriage amendment that outnumbered candidates' signs.

"The Bible tells us God created Adam and Eve. One man and one woman. That's the way it's supposed to be. ... I hope it passes by a landslide."

"Prior to the New Jersey decision, I may have questioned whether the commonwealth of Virginia needed this amendment," added Leo Wardup, a Republican state legislator from Virginia Beach.

"The New Jersey decision made a lot of people say, `Wait a minute.' The New Jersey decision is a catalyst showing people that this is necessary. And it's going to get more people to turn out on Election Day."

In Ohio, Democrats Show A Religious Side To Voters (NYT)

By David Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089213

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Oct. 30 — Representative Ted Strickland, an Ohio Democrat and former Methodist minister, opened his campaign for governor with a commercial on Christian radio vowing that "biblical principles" would guide him in office.

In his first major campaign speech, Mr. Strickland said "the example of Jesus" had led him into public service. He has made words from the prophet Micah a touchstone of his campaign.

Ohio, where a groundswell of conservative Christian support helped push President Bush to re-election two years ago, has become the leading edge of national Democratic efforts to win over religious voters, including evangelicals.

Explaining his hope to win conservative Christian votes, Mr. Strickland said, "I try to make a distinction between the religious right — people who have a conservative theological perspective — and the political religious right, who seem to have as their primary motivation political influence."

Polls show a notable decline since 2004 in support for Republicans among white evangelical Christians, who make up about a quarter of the electorate. The slip in Ohio has been especially steep. In 2004, 76 percent of white evangelical Christians in Ohio voted for Mr. Bush over the Democratic candidate, Senator John Kerry. But in a recent New York Times/CBS News poll, 53 percent of the same voters approved of the president's performance, and 42 percent disapproved.

Democrats, meanwhile, have stepped up efforts to lure religious voters in states including Michigan, Pennsylvania and Tennessee. But Mr. Strickland has capitalized more than anyone else on evangelical disaffection from the Republicans, helping to give him a lead of more than 20 percentage points in the race.

Mr. Strickland faces a Republican opponent, J. Kenneth Blackwell, who speaks just as openly about his evangelical faith, staunchly opposes abortion rights and same-sex unions and carries the endorsement of several nationally known Christian conservatives. But in a recent Quinnipiac University poll, Mr. Blackwell led Mr. Strickland among white evangelical voters by only three percentage points, which is within the margin of error.

"I have talked to lots of folks who say this is the first time they are not voting Republican," Rich Nathan, pastor of the Vineyard Columbus Church, one of the largest in the state, said in an interview Sunday after a service. Mr. Strickland, he said, was "making headway."

Still, dozens of evangelicals interviewed at Vineyard Columbus and another megachurch, Grace Brethren, said they remained wary of overtures from Democrats, even Mr. Strickland. Many said they felt more repelled by the Republicans than attracted to the Democrats.

"The Republican is lying, and the Democrats are secular," said Joshua Porter, a video producer attending Vineyard Columbus. "Who do we vote for?"

Robert Oser, an usher at Grace Brethren, said Mr. Strickland's liberal positions undercut him. "The Democrats are trying to change their spots," Mr. Oser said, "but their spots are still there."

No one brought up the New Jersey Supreme Court decision to recognize some form of same-sex unions as a factor on Election Day.

Only Mr. Oser offered the explanation for grass-roots malaise that Christian conservative groups in Washington usually suggest: that the Republicans had not done enough about abortion or other social issues.

Instead, some said they were disturbed by corruption in the Republican-controlled Statehouse here and in the Republican-controlled Congress. And many pointed to the Ohio economy, budget cuts for schools and social services and the war in Iraq.

Lawrence Porath, a parishioner at Grace Brethren, said he called himself a staunch Republican two years ago and helped turn out voters as a county leader of the Christian Coalition. But a week before this year's midterm elections, he said he was not sure whom to vote for.

"I feel like our president has really not given us the complete truth from the beginning, on the war, or on anything," Mr. Porath, a commercial real estate investor, said in an interview after services on Sunday.

Mr. Nathan of Vineyard Columbus said such disillusionment was common. "How is it that we evangelicals have become the strongest constituency for war of any group in America?" he asked.

When he asked that question from the pulpit, Mr. Nathan said, people stand up and cheer.

Other Democratic candidates here are also reaching out to evangelicals and other Christians. Until recently, Representative Sherrod Brown, a Lutheran who is running for Senate here, seldom spoke publicly about his religious views.

This year, however, Mr. Brown's advisers discovered that after visiting Israel a decade ago he had written to his daughters and a Jewish friend about the emotions he felt reading aloud from the Sermon on the Mount at the site where Jesus is believed to have delivered it. Mr. Brown's campaign quickly incorporated his private words into messages sent to Christian voters.

In an interview, Mr. Brown said he now talked about his faith "a bit, not a lot." A campaign aide then arranged a second interview with Mr. Brown's wife, Connie Schultz, who said her husband tithed, listened to Lutheran hymns to relax and prayed before each campaign debate.

DOJ_NMG_0089214

Mara Vanderslice, an evangelical Protestant who worked on Senator Kerry's presidential campaign, has opened a consulting firm, Common Good Strategies, based here, to help Democrats across the country reach religious voters and, she said, to help make the party more welcoming to them.

In addition to working with Mr. Strickland and Mr. Brown, Ms. Vanderslice is consulting with Democrats in Alabama, Michigan, Pennsylvania and elsewhere.

The Michigan Democratic Party consulted with 500 members of the clergy, including many evangelical Christians, and revised its platform. The revision included a dedication: "The Common Good. The best for each person in the state. The orphan. The family. The sick. The healthy. The wealthy. The poor. The citizen. The stranger. The First. The Last."

At a speech this month at a Lutheran college here, Mr. Strickland put a liberal twist on the common conservative Christian theme about secular forces trying to squeeze religion from the public square.

"There are those in Columbus and elsewhere who argue that the biblical mandates to love your neighbor and to work for justice are meant only for individuals and have no application to the political sphere," Mr. Strickland said. "They dismiss the Democrats and those religious leaders who claim that our faith requires us to insist that governments and government leaders — not just private citizens — seek justice, love, mercy, and humbly work to help the least, the last and the lost in our society."

In an interview, Mr. Strickland said that Christian conservatives had a right to their interpretation of the Bible, but that "it is an anemic interpretation, at best."

Phil Burress, president of Citizens for Community Values and a prominent Christian conservative organizer here, accused Mr. Strickland of using his faith. "He abandoned his theology degree," Mr. Burress said, "and all of a sudden he has found that it is a good political toy."

Still, Mr. Burress commended the Democrats for at least competing for conservative Christian voters. And, he added, "if he is successful in breaking into that bloc of voters, it is going to be a very interesting 2008."

Union Heads South To Recapture U.S. Political Clout (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Kim Chipman

Bloomberg, October 30, 2006

Oct. 30 (Bloomberg) -- The AFL-CIO, the biggest U.S. labor federation, is pushing into unfriendly territory -- the South -- in an effort to gain new political friends and help its Democratic allies win control of Congress.

The AFL-CIO has included contests in at least five states in the largely non-union South on its list of targeted races in the Nov. 7 midterm election, one that it says is vital to the future of organized labor.

``Our existence is at stake," said Jerry Lee, head of the AFL-CIO Labor Council in Tennessee. ``If we don't take control of at least one of the houses in Congress, Republicans will have free rein to do all the devastating things they can do to labor over the next two years."

The AFL-CIO says it's spending a record $40 million this year to defeat Republicans nationwide. The money is being used to mobilize some 13.5 million union members, affiliated workers and their families through door-to-door visits, phone calls, direct mailings and leafleting.

The federation is broadening its political effort this year after concentrating much of its energies in 2004 on pivotal states such as Ohio -- and still failing to stop President George W. Bush from winning there and clinching re-election.

Some political experts as well as Republican critics, eying organized labor's shrinking membership and declining clout, question whether the AFL-CIO can deliver enough votes to make a difference.

``Union leadership is so oftentimes out of touch with its members that it's actually immaterial what union leaders do," said Dick Wadhams, campaign manager for Senator George Allen, a Virginia Republican who is one of the AFL-CIO's targets.

Declining Membership

The percentage of U.S. workers in labor unions was 12.5 percent last year, down from 35 percent in 1955, according to government data. The rate among private sector employees was 7.8 percent, the lowest in more than seven decades.

Virginia and Tennessee, two of the southern states the federation is targeting this year, have about 200,000 union members each, including retirees. Active union members account for about 5 percent of total workers in each state, according to government data.

That's a decline in Tennessee from 8.9 percent in 2000 --the year that Democratic presidential nominee Al Gore lost his home state even with strong union support.

North Carolina, where the AFL-CIO is supporting Democratic challenger Heath Shuler over Republican incumbent Charles Taylor in a House race, has the second-lowest percentage of union members in the country at 3 percent, ahead only of South Carolina.

Southern Battlegrounds

DOJ_NMG_0089215

``The problem is that the areas where Democrats need to pick up votes aren't necessarily places where labor has a stronghold,'' said Jennifer Duffy of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report in Washington.

Still, some of the southern states being targeted by the federation -- Tennessee, Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky and Texas -- are the sites of a cluster of Senate and House races that will help determine control of the next Congress.

The AFL-CIO targeted these states after it became clear that the contests there were up for grabs, said Karen Ackerman, the AFL-CIO's national political director. ``These were reliably Red states, and the fact they are now toss-ups speaks to how fertile the moment is for more progressive candidates,'' Ackerman said.

Virginia AFL-CIO Treasurer Doris Crouse-Mays said the union vote can make a difference in her state's Senate race, which pits Allen against Democratic challenger Jim Webb in a contest polls show is very close.

Virginia Turnout

In last year's Virginia governor's race, which Democrat Tim Kaine won, a union analysis of state voting data found that almost 60 percent of active AFL-CIO members and 70 percent of retirees voted, exceeding the general turnout of about 45 percent, Mays said.

Republicans say they aren't worried. Doug Grindstaff, the party's chairman in Tennessee's Williamson County, which includes the Nashville suburbs, said he welcomes union efforts on behalf of Democratic Senate candidate Harold Ford Jr. because they reveal him as a liberal.

``I'd say 70 to 80 percent of voters in my county oppose organized labor issues, so it helps us,'' Grindstaff said.

The Ford campaign seems to recognize that union support in the South can cut two ways. While Ford appeared at a rally with union officials in Nashville on Oct. 13, he didn't publicize the event, according to John Geer, a political scientist at Vanderbilt University in Nashville.

Split Movement

``I didn't see anything about it from the Ford campaign, and I get all their stuff,'' Geer said. ``It would hurt Ford if he embraced labor in very strong terms.''

Unions are counting on a Democratic-controlled Congress to pass legislation making it easier for workers to organize and push back against what labor sees as anti-union measures, such as a recent National Labor Relations Board ruling giving management wider scope to exempt certain employees from union membership.

``People understand what the present administration in Washington is doing,'' AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, 72, said in an Oct. 13 interview at a labor rally in Nashville for Ford. ``It's not difficult when you see a government trying to privatize Social Security or avoid increasing the minimum wage.''

A debate among unions last year about the best way to revive the movement led to the biggest split in 70 years and threatened to weaken labor's already dwindling political power. Several unions broke away from the AFL-CIO to form a new federation called Change to Win.

Rift's Consequences

Leaders in both federations say predictions that the rift would hurt labor's political efforts proved to be overblown. Coordination has been ``relatively seamless,'' said Greg Tarpinian, executive director of Change to Win, which represents seven unions and about 6 million workers.

Union supporters in some southern states said voters' attention is shifting from issues such as gay marriage to economic ones, like lost manufacturing jobs and a federal minimum wage that hasn't been raised since 1997.

``I can't feed my family on gay marriage,'' said Robert Lewis, a machinist and a coordinator for the Tennessee AFL-CIO. ``I can't put a roof over my family on gay marriage.''

Talent Tells GOP Faithful To `get Busy' Getting Out The Vote (BVND)

By Marcus Kabel

The Belleville News Democrat, October 31, 2006

POPLAR BLUFF, Mo. - Sen. Jim Talent was crossing southern Missouri a week before elections, encouraging local Republican organizers and volunteers to get out the vote in a close race against Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill.

After campaigning in southeast Missouri and St. Louis Monday, Talent was scheduled to hold campaign events in Joplin, Springfield, Bolivar, Lebanon and Rolla on Tuesday. He plans to keep up a similar pace for the next week, a Talent spokesman said.

Talent will be joined Tuesday by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. Missouri's senior senator, Kit Bond, campaigned for Talent at Monday's stops and will take part for a second day.

McCaskill had no public campaign events scheduled Monday, but had evening fundraisers in St. Louis, where she planned to begin a statewide RV tour Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0089216

Talent told supporters Monday that Democrats such as McCaskill would roll back tax cuts if they win control of Congress.

Talent told crowds of GOP workers and backers, ranging from around 40 people to more than 100, that they need to work phone lines, knock on doors and talk to friends and co-workers about voting next week.

"If you haven't been busy doing that, I want you to get busy," he said at a farm equipment dealership in Poplar Bluff, the last of five stops on a roughly 200-mile swing through southeast Missouri, before heading to an evening appearance in St. Louis.

"I think that all that can possibly stop us is if we and the people who believe as we do just don't go to the polls next Tuesday. But that isn't going to happen," he said.

Talent wound up activities in the St. Louis area Monday night for a fundraising event that featured White House spokesman Tony Snow. The stop at the St. Louis Hilton Frontenac was one of more than a dozen Snow is making for Republican candidates around the country ahead of the Nov. 7 elections.

"There's no reason to do politics unless it's to make a difference," Snow told the crowd. "If you've got the right attitude, you can get a lot of stuff done. Jim's done that."

He spoke on topics ranging from energy policy to the war in Iraq and how the nation has changed since Sept. 11, 2001. He said the U.S. operation in Iraq is a chance to spread democracy.

"This is a country that really does spread dreams," Snow said. "This is a chance to expand that dream."

In his appearances earlier in the day, Talent touted a legislative record of working on what he called national issues that had extra benefits for Missouri. He said those included legislation to combat methamphetamine by restricting the amount of cold medicines - which contain ingredients used in making meth - that people can buy in one stop. It also included legislation requiring oil companies to mix ethanol in gasoline, which he said could revive rural economies such as Missouri's.

"This will be for Missouri what oil was for Texas," Talent said.

Talent mentioned the war in Iraq only once in a brief line accusing McCaskill of supporting a U.S. troop withdrawal "before our mission is done."

McCaskill has called for a redeployment of U.S. troops from Iraq in about two years. She also has criticized President Bush's policies in Iraq, suggested Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld should be fired and claimed Talent has not asked enough questions of Rumsfeld as a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Talent said he supported the Bush administration's intelligence efforts against terrorists and opposed leaks to the news media of programs such as warrantless wiretapping of phone conversations between possible overseas terrorists and people in the United States.

"I'm going to stand up for your security and your freedom and your civil liberties, and I'm not going to worry too much about the captured terrorists," he said.

Bond campaigned for Talent as a representative of "commonsense conservative Missouri values" - a slogan Talent has used frequently at campaign events.

Talent said those values included opposing gay marriage and supporting border security, including a border fence bill recently signed by President Bush, while opposing amnesty for illegal immigrants.

Supporter Darrell Myers welcomed the push Monday. Myers, 78, a retired Poplar Bluff accountant, described himself as a conservative Christian and said he has spoken with many people with similar views who are reluctant to vote next week.

"It's not any one thing. It's the state of society as a whole. Our politicians need to do more to push moral values," Myers said, adding he was volunteering to make calls to voters.

But Tom Burchan, a volunteer GOP organizer in Farmington, said he had more volunteers for phone calls and house visits than at the same point in the 2002 and 2004 campaigns.

"The enthusiasm is enormous," Burchan said.

New CNN poll shows Webb with slight edge on Allen (AP)

New CNN poll shows Webb with slight edge on Allen

Among likely voters, the former Republican was the choice of 50 percent of those surveyed while 46 percent favored Allen and 4 percent were undecided.

Because Webb's edge is equal to the margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points, it means Webb is slightly ahead.

DOJ_NMG_0089217

The result is based on telephone interviews Opinion Research Corp. conducted for CNN from Oct. 26-29 among 597 registered Virginia voters who identified themselves as likely to vote on Nov. 7.

Among the larger sample of 904 registered voters, the results were about even, with 48 percent of the respondents backing Webb, 46 percent for Allen and 5 percent undecided. One percent voiced support for an "other" candidate not identified in the survey.

Independent Gail Parker also is on the ballot.

The poll is the first to show Webb with an advantage in a mean and expensive campaign in once reliably Republican Virginia whose outcome could be pivotal in determining whether an embattled GOP can retain control of the Senate.

Webb, along with help from a national Democratic organization, is airing about $3 million a week in television ads to more than $2 million a week for Allen and his national GOP allies in the campaign's frantic final week.

While Webb supporters crowed over the results, longtime Allen adviser Christopher J. LaCivita said the poll was skewed because half of it was conducted over the weekend.

"It sure doesn't reflect anything we're seeing," said LaCivita, a national GOP consultant who lives near Richmond.

"Any survey conducted Fridays and Saturdays, everybody knows they're skewed toward Democrats," he said.

The latter two days of the survey, however, reflect two intensive days of news coverage of Allen's claim that selected sexually explicit passages in some of Webb's six gritty novels about war are demeaning to women.

"Virginians are a lot smarter than that, and he insulted their intelligence," said Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd. "It was a baseless attack on Jim that didn't make sense. He (Allen) was trying to attack Jim on works of fiction."

The fictional books reflect the bloodshed and dehumanizing conditions Webb saw and experienced as a Marine in some of the deadliest combat of the Vietnam War in 1969.

He has written one nonfiction book, "Born Fighting," that traces the heritage of Scots-Irish families in America, including his own, to their ethnic origins in Europe.

Allen campaigned with veterans groups with Virginia's senior senator and Armed Services Committee chairman, John W. Warner, in Hampton Roads, an area that's home to the world's largest U.S. Navy base as well as active duty and retired military households.

Poll Shows Webb Leading Allen For First Time (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

Democrat James H. Webb Jr. leads Republican Sen. George Allen for the first time in a statewide poll for Virginia's U.S. Senate race.

If the Nov. 7 election were held today, Mr. Webb would receive 48 percent of the vote to Mr. Allen's 46 percent, the poll conducted by Rasmussen Reports shows.

Of the 500 likely voters questioned in Sunday's telephone survey, 2 percent favored another candidate and 5 percent were undecided.

The margin of error is 4.5 percentage points, which means the two men still are statistically tied.

Over the course of the campaign, Mr. Allen's lead has eroded steadily. Last fall, before any Democrat had declared a candidacy for Senate, Mr. Allen, a former governor, held a lead of more than 30 points. In the summer, he led Mr. Webb by 16 points.

In the latest Rasmussen poll, Mr. Webb leads with 51 percent to 46 percent for Mr. Allen when the results include "leaners," or undecided voters who are leaning toward one candidate. When leaners are included, 3 percent remained undecided.

Of the Webb voters in the poll, 43 percent said they would choose the Democrat as a way to vote "against Allen."

Issues were more important to 82 percent of those surveyed, while 14 percent said questions of character are more important.

Mr. Allen's recent criticism of salacious passages in Mr. Webb's novels did not seem to sway voters in the senator's direction.

Though many Allen supporters have said the depictions of incest and an acrobatic stripper raise questions about Mr. Webb's character, many of those surveyed disagreed.

In the poll, 59 percent said the passages caused them no concern about Mr. Webb, and 39 percent said they were of concern.

Black Democrats Cross Party Lines To Back Steele For U.S. Senate (WP)

By Ovetta Wiggins

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

A coalition of black Democratic political leaders from Prince George's County led by former county executive Wayne K. Curry endorsed Republican Michael S. Steele's bid for the U.S. Senate yesterday.

The support from Curry, five County Council members and others barely a week before Election Day reflects their continued disappointment that the Democratic Party has no African American candidates at the top of the ticket and a sense that the county is being ignored, officials said.

"They show us a pie, but we never get a slice," said Major F. Riddick Jr., a former aide to then-Gov. Parris N. Glendening and a former county executive candidate. "We are here today to say we've waited and we've waited and we're waiting no longer."

Steele, who as lieutenant governor is the first African American elected statewide in Maryland, said he was humbled by the support. "I said I did not want this [campaign] to be so much about party but about the people," he said. "And these people understand that."

Ron Walters, a political science professor at the University of Maryland, said the endorsements could be significant. "This is going to go through the black community like a rocket," he said. "It's going to be the talk of the county, the state, maybe even the nation."

Oren Shur, a spokesman for the Democratic Senate candidate, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, was more skeptical. "The endorsements will not make Prince George's County residents forget that Michael Steele is George W. Bush's handpicked candidate," he said.

The politicians were joined at a news conference in Largo by about a half-dozen business leaders, including Ron Lipscomb, a trustee of the state Democratic Party.

All said they are lifelong Democrats who do not agree with some of Steele's stances but are not in lock step with the Democratic Party, either.

"The party acts as though when they want our opinion they'll give it to us," said Curry, Prince George's first black county executive. "It will not be like that anymore."

He noted that support for a Republican is not unprecedented: In 2002, Democrat Kathleen Kennedy Townsend picked a GOP running mate in her gubernatorial bid, passing over a black candidate.

This year, Democratic contender Martin O'Malley is running with an African American from Prince George's County, Del. Anthony Brown. But black Democrats who ran for the U.S. Senate and state attorney general lost in the primary.

Curry would not answer questions about Brown, but he said the state Democratic Party had "trivialized" Prince George's, though it provides the "mother lode of votes in the state of Maryland."

Terry Lierman, state Democratic chairman, said there is plenty of diversity in the party. "They are trying to make an issue out of something that doesn't exist," he said.

According to a recent Washington Post poll, Steele trailed Cardin by 11 percentage points. The lieutenant governor has support from only 14 percent of black voters, despite an aggressive bid for their support, the poll shows.

During the primary, Curry's endorsement gave Rushern L. Baker III a boost in his unsuccessful bid for county executive. Steele is hoping Curry will do the same for him among black Democrats.

Walters said the Prince George's politicians made an "audacious" move by putting local interests above national ones since a Steele victory could keep the Senate in Republican hands.

Curry said the decision to endorse the lieutenant governor was about dignity and respect and an opportunity to back a "good man with a good plan."

Curry said he disagrees with Steele on several issues but supports his plans for equity in business opportunities, economic development and improved schools.

Prince George's council member David Harrington (D-Cheverly) said he was comfortable supporting Steele. "It's a way to say, 'Don't leave Prince George's out, and don't leave African Americans out,' " he said.

Harrington said race is a factor for him. "It's not the factor," he said, "but it is a factor. There needs to be a diversity of voices in the room."

In addition to Harrington, the council members backing Steele are Samuel H. Dean (D-Mitchellville), Camille Exum (D-Seat Pleasant), Tony Knotts (D-Temple Hills) and Marilynn Bland (D-Clinton).

Black Democrats Support Steele (WT)

By S.a. Miller And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

Former Prince George's County Executive Wayne K. Curry and five fellow black Democrats on the county council excoriated their party yesterday and endorsed Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a Republican, for U.S. Senate.

"The [Democratic] Party acts as though when they want our opinion, they'll give it to us. It's not going to be like that anymore," said Mr. Curry, who in 1994 became the county's first black executive and remains influential in the mostly black and heavily Democratic county.

Mr. Curry and the lawmakers said Democratic leaders repeatedly have snubbed the black community and their county, noting the lack of party support for the Senate campaign of former National Association for the Advancement of Colored People chief Kweisi Mfume, who lost the Democratic primary to Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin.

The Democratic ticket lacks black candidates, they said, and candidates from Prince George's County, which is home to more than 320,000 registered Democrats -- the most of any jurisdiction in Maryland.

"We're not puppets. We're not gullible," Mr. Curry said during a press conference at the Infusion Tea Cafe in Largo. "This ain't the first time we've charged up a hill."

He was joined by fellow black Democrats David Harrington of Bladensburg, Samuel H. Dean of Bowie, Camille A. Exum of Capitol Heights, Tony Knotts of Temple Hills and Marilyn Bland of Clinton -- all officials on the nine-member county council.

Other black Democratic leaders endorsing Mr. Steele yesterday included Major Riddick, former chief of staff for former Gov. Parris N. Glendening; Ron Lipscomb, a major fundraiser and trustee of the state party; and businessmen Clayton Duhaney and M.A. "Mike" Little.

"There's a revolution going on here," said Jerry McLaurin, a county developer and Steele supporter who attended the announcement. "This is going to radiate throughout the county like an explosion."

Mr. Steele, who lives in the county and is the first black to be elected to statewide office in Maryland, said he was "humbled."

"As I started this campaign, I said to myself I didn't want this to be so much about party as about people, and these individuals seem to understand and appreciate that as well," he said.

The endorsements were issued as Democratic officials are scrambling to secure their most loyal bloc -- black voters.

Mr. Curry said the Steele endorsements are "the continuation of a long civil rights struggle."

Mr. Dean, a former council chairman who was elected in 2002 with 93 percent of the vote, said blacks have had a one-sided relationship with the Democratic Party since they shifted allegiance from the Republican Party in 1932.

"We were in the Democratic Party while they were lynching black folks. We were in the Democratic Party while they were segregating folks," Mr. Dean said. "We have been loyal Democrats, [but] when the party has an opportunity to do something to show that their base is recognized, appreciated and acknowledged, they don't."

"The issue is what we want not only from the state party but from the national party," he said. "Give us respect. We cannot continue to be in the room but not allowed to come to the table. What we are doing now is saying, 'Forget it. We are not going to wait for you to bring us to the table. We are going to not only get to the table, we are going to take it.' "

Other Maryland Democratic leaders -- such as U.S. House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson and Delegate Anthony G. Brown of Prince George's County, who is running for lieutenant governor -- declined to comment.

A Cardin campaign spokesman did not return calls.

Mr. Cardin, a white 10-term congressman from Baltimore, said this weekend that his "message to the African-American community and to all communities is that we've got to change the priorities in Washington."

"You're twice as likely to be without health insurance if you're African-American. So, yes, [black voters are] concerned about a senator who's going to stand up for universal health coverage. I will. Michael Steele won't. He supports George Bush's policies," Mr. Cardin said.

Mr. Curry said that Mr. Steele is a "good man with a good plan," and although he differs with some of Mr. Steele's views, he also differs with some of the Democratic Party's platform.

He said the lieutenant governor is "most responsive to the things that will make our futures brighter."

A G.O.P. Leader And Star Struggles For Traction (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089220

PITTSBURGH, Oct. 27 — There is no better snapshot of the brutal political climate facing many Republicans in these final days than this: Senator Rick Santorum, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate, stubbornly behind in the polls, warning with anger and growing frustration that voters should not — must not, for their own good — reject him for his Democratic opponent, Bob Casey, the state treasurer.

Assailing Mr. Casey's national security credentials, the Santorum campaign has run a television commercial that shows a mushroom cloud, missiles streaking through the air and the faces of North Korean, Iranian and terrorist leaders. It concludes, "We just can't take a chance on Bob Casey."

Mr. Santorum began the final stretch of his campaign with a series of speeches on "The Gathering Storm," offering a dark, Churchillian vision of the threats facing the United States — like the threats, he said, that faced England in the years leading up to World War II.

But Mr. Santorum all but acknowledges that the national security issues that proved such a fundamental strength for the Republicans in 2002 and 2004 are far riskier for his party this year.

"People ask me, 'Why are you giving a major foreign-policy address two weeks before your election? Don't you realize this war is not popular?' " he said Friday. But he plowed forward, to an audience of about 75 in a Holiday Inn in the western Pennsylvania city of Johnstown, one of several stops on his tour.

The political world has changed fundamentally for Mr. Santorum, who rode an anti-establishment wave into the Senate in 1994 but is now at risk of being swept out of office by a very different wave. He has spent millions, campaigned hard, attacked his Democratic opponent on every imaginable front, closing with what Democrats assert is "a campaign of fear and smear." But Mr. Santorum has remained consistently behind in the public polls.

He speaks of Mr. Casey with barely disguised disdain, as if he cannot imagine the possibility of losing to the Democrat who, he asserts, "is simply reading from the bullet points of Howard Dean."

[The latest Philadelphia Inquirer/Temple University poll, published Sunday, showed Mr. Santorum at 38 percent, 16 points behind Mr. Casey. Other polls have shown smaller leads for the Democrat, but G. Terry Madonna, who runs the Keystone Poll at Franklin & Marshall College in Lancaster, said, "The stability in this race is truly remarkable" in one respect: Mr. Santorum generally comes in at about 40 percent.]

Mr. Santorum's advisers blame the national climate for his difficulties; in a state like Pennsylvania, which often leans Democratic, the plummeting popularity of President Bush and the Republican-led Congress was bound to hit hard. In fact, several Republican House incumbents are also fighting for their political lives in Pennsylvania this year.

But Mr. Santorum's own personality and political style have also played a role, political strategists and analysts say. Over the past two years, he aggressively intervened in the right-to-die case of Terri Schiavo and jumped into debates on flashpoint issues like the Roman Catholic Church's sex abuse scandal and same-sex marriage. Along with his staunchly conservative voting record, that took a toll, reflected in what polls show as his continued difficulty among moderate suburbanites outside Philadelphia.

At the same time, a controversy over his residency — his family lives much of the year in Virginia — is widely blamed for his sagging support in the polls in western Pennsylvania, where he began his political career. He won a House seat in 1990 with a campaign that lambasted the Democratic incumbent for living in Virginia.

As he campaigned across western Pennsylvania, Mr. Santorum said he "absolutely" felt he had time to turn the race around, that voters would, in the end, recognize what he asserted was a clear gap in competence between him and Mr. Casey. Mr. Brabender, who dismissed the public polls, said he believed that the Santorum campaign could be five or six points behind on Election Day and still win through their superior turnout operation.

Mr. Santorum opened new lines of attack in recent days, including one over Mr. Casey's management of state pension fund investments.

But Democrats can taste victory. At a Casey rally at the University of Pittsburgh Friday afternoon, college Democrats roared as Representative Mike Doyle, Democrat of Pennsylvania, declared, "In 11 days, we're going to change America!"

Mr. Casey proceeded to give a stump speech aimed squarely at the bread-and-butter issues of the middle class, like affordable health insurance, universal pre-school access, assistance for college tuition, and the general promise of "a new direction." He mocked Mr. Santorum as a rubber stamp for the Bush administration who had defended Mr. Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld instead of asking hard questions about the war in Iraq.

It was not a dazzling performance, but it was disciplined and firmly on message, and that is another explanation for Mr. Santorum's difficulties. From the beginning of this race, 20 months ago, the Democrats have run a careful, pragmatic campaign.

Democratic leaders like Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, the chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, recruited Mr. Casey to run on the grounds that as an experienced statewide candidate, the son of a popular former governor, he was the strongest candidate the party could field.

From a strategic standpoint, Mr. Casey's conservatism on social issues — he opposes abortion rights — was expected to help the party with more traditional voters. In an interview, Mr. Casey, a Roman Catholic like Mr. Santorum, said he worked hard to signal that he wanted a conversation with "people of faith."

He spoke at Catholic University this fall over the objection of conservatives who did not want him invited there, met with evangelical Christians on global warming and closes his stump speech these days with a reflection that "your burdens can become your blessings."

"Too often Democrats have avoided talking about faith — the national party has had the perception, and sometimes it's a perception we've fostered or amplified — that people of faith are not part of a coalition we want to build," said Mr. Casey, a soft-spoken man, who often talks about the importance of his service as a Jesuit volunteer in an urban school. "But you can build bridges."

At the same time, the polls and the Democratic primary showed that Mr. Casey was holding his party's liberal base, even among those who disagree with him on abortion; opposition to Mr. Santorum proved a powerful unifying force among Democrats. And while the Santorum campaign raised more funds than the Casey campaign, the last fund-raising report showed Mr. Casey held a slim advantage in cash-on-hand for the final stretch.

Throughout the year, the Santorum campaign accused Mr. Casey of lacking ideas, ducking debates and failing to understand the nuances of foreign policy.

By the end of the campaign, an extraordinarily long campaign, by Senate standards, the personal animus between the two men was striking.

In a recent debate in Philadelphia, Mr. Santorum told voters: "I had to earn this job. It's not a job I inherited because of my last name."

Moments later, when reporters pressed Mr. Casey about the possibility of more debates, he shot back: "We've spent enough time together, the two of us. Let's go meet the voters. I'll see him at the finish line."

Hopscotch In New Jersey Senate Race (NYT)

By David W. Chen And Richard G. Jones

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

LODI, N.J., Oct. 30 — Thomas H. Kean Jr. began the last full week of his campaign for the United States Senate by getting on his knees to be blessed by Korean-American pastors in Cliffside Park on Monday. Hours later and just eight miles away in another Bergen County town, he mingled with Italian-American firefighters and community leaders at Lodi Hose Company 2.

A hundred miles south, Senator Robert Menendez attended two events in the Democratic stronghold of Camden County. On Tuesday morning, he planned to be back in the same area for a breakfast with veterans accompanied by former Senator Max Cleland of Georgia, a Vietnam veteran who lost his legs in the war.

With just eight days until the election, this is the time when candidates in New Jersey pack their schedules with appearances all over the state, often from dawn until the dinner hour. And with most polls showing Mr. Menendez, the Democratic incumbent, holding a slight lead over his Republican opponent, both he and Mr. Kean are frequently hurrying through their lengthening schedules by sticking to the same issues and repeating accusations.

But there is a purpose in the seemingly frantic game of hopscotch from Camden to Lodi or Somerset to Asbury Park hinting at the strategy shaping the final days of the campaign. And geography, not surprisingly, is a major factor.

"You need to focus on people who you are pretty sure are in your camp, but need a little push to make sure they go out and do it," said Peter J. Woolley, a political scientist at Fairleigh Dickinson University and the executive director of its Public Mind poll.

For Mr. Kean, that means a lot of time in such Republican strongholds as Morris County and some communities along the Jersey Shore as well as repeated forays to Bergen County, the state's wealthiest and most populous region, which is viewed as a battleground area.

Indeed, political consultants often say that no Republican can win without doing well in Bergen County. Last year, Gov. Jon S. Corzine, a Democrat, trounced his Republican opponent, Douglas R. Forrester, in the race for governor by a margin of 34,000 votes there and went on to win by a comfortable 9 percentage points.

For now, Mr. Kean is scheduled to campaign in Bergen County another half dozen times before Election Day next Tuesday, including several early morning appearances at train stations to greet commuters heading into New York.

DOJ_NMG_0089222

In fact, Mr. Kean has been spending so much time in Bergen County that former Assemblyman Paul DiGaetano, who introduced Mr. Kean at the event here Monday afternoon, said jokingly, "I can't count the number of times he's been here."

For his part, Mr. Menendez plans to adhere to classic Democratic strategy by zeroing in on such urban areas as Camden, Essex and Hudson Counties, and appealing to ethnic minorities and organized labor, core party constituencies.

He also plans to rely heavily on out-of-state luminaries, with repeat appearances expected from Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and former President Bill Clinton, and a third appearance since June by the party's newest star, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois.

"My guess is that the campaigns are not looking at the undecideds at this point, because it's too risky and it takes up too much time," Mr. Woolley said.

A poll conducted last week by The New York Times and CBS News bears out the geographic differences. While the race over all shows Mr. Menendez ahead by 38 to 36 percentage points among registered voters, Mr. Menendez is doing better in the northeastern urban areas and Bergen and Passaic Counties, while Mr. Kean is leading in the northwestern part of the state, a region that historically votes Republican. In central and southern New Jersey — where the two northern New Jerseyans are not as well known — the candidates are running just about even.

This late in the campaign, a strategy of playing to one's strengths is not surprising. For instance, the Friday before the election last year, six of Mr. Corzine's eight public appearances were in Essex County. By contrast, Mr. Forrester's schedule one day in that final full week of stumping featured four appearances in Monmouth County, another in Morris County and two in Bergen County.

But there are also factors that make this year's race a bit different.

It is the first time since 2001 that a statewide race has not included at least one candidate named Corzine or Forrester who is largely paying for his own campaign. And because the race this year is so competitive and control of the Senate could be at stake, the national political parties are investing a great deal of money, with pledges of $7.5 million so far.

Buoyed by the prospect of sending someone to the Senate for the first time since 1972, New Jersey Republicans are working hard at employing the national party's "microtargeting" strategy: combing through voting and consumer database records to identify potential voters.

"From the cars we drive to the magazines we subscribe to, to whenever we enter a contest to win something — all of that is used to glean out particularly independent voters who might support our candidates," said Tom Wilson, the chairman of the state party. "This allows us not to allow stones unturned."

Still, Democrats have a strong advantage in the state. Of 4.86 million registered voters, according to figures released on Monday by Attorney General Stuart Rabner, 1.15 million are Democrats, 890,000 are Republicans, and the rest are unaffiliated.

As a result, Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who is chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said on Sunday that he was confident about Mr. Menendez's chances, and cited a recent Democratic poll reporting that his party's candidate held a 9 percentage point lead.

"We believe we're ahead in New Jersey by a significant amount," Mr. Schumer said. "Our goal is not to lose a blue state, and we believe we're on the road to achieving it."

Correction (NYT)

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

An editorial yesterday about the New Jersey Senate race incorrectly described the timing of donations to the campaign of Thomas Kean Jr. by executives of Horizon Blue Cross and Blue Shield of New Jersey. The checks were written for a fund-raiser for Mr. Kean that took place before the submission of legislation that maintained a tax exemption for the companies. Mr. Kean did not receive the money on the same day that he voted for that legislation. The reference was based on an article in The Star-Ledger of Newark that the newspaper subsequently corrected.

Hutchison Works To Keep GOP In Power (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, October 31, 2006

AMARILLO – For Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas is a line in the sand. The nightmare isn't so much that she'll lose her own re-election bid, it's that the ill national mood will flip control of Congress.

"It is a tough year. It is a tough year because times are tough. Because you've got boots on the ground," she says. "As Margaret Thatcher once said to George Bush 41, now is not the time to go wobbly."

DOJ_NMG_0089223

No statewide candidate has ever collected as many votes as she did six years ago. Her bank account is 150 times bigger than her Democratic opponent's, and most analysts expect her to cruise to a third term.

Yet she is running hard, dashing across West Texas one day last week, exhorting Republicans in one city after another to get out and vote.

"This is a crucial election," she tells a rally that drew a few dozen supporters to a tractor dealership in Amarillo. Iraq is the key, she acknowledged through the day, saying it's dragging down the party and making the stakes that much higher on Nov. 7. "All of us want to leave, but the difference is whether we leave with our credibility intact and Iraq stable or just leave and hope the terrorists won't attack again."

It's a message meant to fire up Republican loyalists, though it also seemed to validate their anxieties. Sure, they'll keep the Texas seat, but what about the House and Senate?

'Worried'

"Well, I'm worried," says retired oil woman Betty Moore, 72, after the Amarillo speech. "I hope all Republicans get out and vote. That's all we can do is hope."

Four friendly venues are on the itinerary in Amarillo, Midland, San Angelo and Abilene.

"We are not getting credit for the strength of this economy and that didn't happen by accident," Ms. Hutchison says in one way or another at each stop to crowds ranging from 40 to 100. "It is important to win decisively. That makes a difference. It makes a difference in Texas generally and your ability to speak with authority."

"She wants to cut and run from Iraq. I want to do the right thing and make sure we stabilize Iraq so it doesn't become a haven for terrorists," the senator says.

For months she kept mum as the Democrat taunted her, calling Ms. Hutchison an "aging prom queen" and a Bush "puppet."

"She's been poking a stick at me," the senator says. "I have not responded to her during the year because that's what she wanted."

But now, with voters paying attention, the senator is striking back. She calls her opponent desperate and ill-tempered and the name-calling "cheap shots."

On the way to Midland, an aide hands her a faxed copy of a Kerrville Daily Times story. Kinky Friedman voted for her. "She is not without charms," the independent candidate for governor told the paper.

She laughs: "He's so open, that he said that."

They had met last Sunday at Love Field, the crossroads of all statewide campaigns. She'll write a thank-you, but her ballot will go to Gov. Rick Perry, her fellow Republican, whom she had thought about challenging instead of running for re-election.

As it happens, the senator will be in Kerrville herself on Friday, during a two-day bus tour from Seguin to Weatherford.

"I love campaigning," she says. "If I were not doing this then I don't think that I would have the great grass-roots support that I do."

Next stop Midland. A few score people are gathered at the Commemorative Air Force Museum.

"This is a tough year," she tells them. "It really is crucial that our vote turns out. ... If the Democrats take control, you'll see a lot of gridlock. You'll see a lot of efforts to appease the terrorists."

Billie Ross has run Hutchison campaigns around here for years and would happily have helped her run for governor.

"I know she wants to," Ms. Ross says.

U.S. Rep. Mike Conaway, R-Midland, is on hand, too. Last month, he called the senator "stronger than a jalapeno." Today she's the "most beloved statesman" Texas has produced in a generation.

"I'm hoping to ride her coattails on Election Day," he says – a joke, given that he's running unopposed.

Midland Mayor Michael Canon says he won't be surprised if she pulls 85 or 90 percent of the vote. "She produces results for us. And I don't think she singles out West Texas as somebody she's particularly inclined toward helping," he says.

Could she continue to do so even if the Republican grip on Congress loosens? "One way or the other I think she'll still be extremely effective. ... She can cross the aisle and do so with grace and eloquence and effectiveness that only she can do," he says.

Wrong number

DOJ_NMG_0089224

Wheels down in San Angelo after a short but bumpy flight. One of the senator's two BlackBerries starts ringing. She leans into the window for better reception as the plane taxis.

"Hello? I think you have the wrong number." She laughs. She never gives out this number.

What she does give out whenever possible are federal dollars. She paints herself as a senator who takes care of Texas, though her opponent says she doesn't secure nearly enough to justify the claim.

In Amarillo, she talks up farm policy. In Midland, it is support for a local nuclear project and a highway to link Mexico with the Midwest. In San Angelo, she touts her support for Goodfellow Air Force Base and its new foreign language training center, plus the time she escorted the librarian of Congress to town and announced a $200,000 grant for the Tom Green County library.

Incumbency has its advantages.

"This is as important an election as we have faced in our lifetime," she tells the 40 or so people gathered for her speech at headquarters of Town & Country convenience stores, in a lunchroom with a free soda fountain.

The choice, she says, is between lower taxes and a resolute approach to Iraq, or higher taxes and appeasement of terrorists.

At the final stop in Abilene, a hundred or so folks are gathered on the courthouse lawn, with country music and free hotdogs. Even Rick Perry's parents are on hand, and the senator chats amiably with them on her way out.

"This is a crucial election," she tells the crowd. "It's an election that's going to decide a lot about what we do in Texas, what we do in the United States. ... People have said that conservatives are going to stay home. We cannot let that happen. We need to make sure that we keep control of Congress."

If West Texans had their way, that wouldn't be a problem. But there are forces beyond their control.

"I'm concerned," says Curtis Tomme, the Taylor County GOP chairman and an assistant district attorney in Abilene. "The polls are all over the place. It's going to be close."

Back on the plane, Ms. Hutchison ticks off the dire consequences of a Democratic takeover. The Bush tax cuts are at risk. The nation's credibility would be shredded by a premature withdrawal from Iraq. There'd be little hope of rescuing Social Security or reforming immigration laws.

"We would be on defense," she says. "You saw gridlock the last year. I think that's what you'll see for the next two years."

CLINTON: 12 MORE YEARS (NYPOST)

The New York Post, October 30, 2006

October 30, 2006 -- The Post today also endorses Hillary Rodham Clinton for re-election to the United States Senate.

Surprised?

Well, so are we - a little.

Clinton has an insurmountable lead in the polls. She's worked hard the last six years, and it shows.

He's a down-to-earth, if not earthy, fellow who once served Yonkers well as mayor and who now appears to be running for another term in that office.

If so, we endorse him - for mayor.

As for Mrs. Clinton, well, she's been a pretty good senator - popular with her colleagues and as productive as a first-term legislator from the minority party probably can be.

Think of her as Sen. Pothole Redux (apologies to Alfonse D'Amato).

Meanwhile, her positions on numerous issues - particularly involving national security - have been much closer to the political center than we would have expected.

That's not to say that some of her positions haven't already begun "evolving" toward the Democrats' party line - especially on Iraq, where she has slowly, but surely, begun inching her way over to the "Bush lied" crowd.

For now, however, the fact remains that she has been, to repeat, a pretty good senator.

But what about the question of the hour?

What about the White House?

Well, New Yorkers simply expect their major officeholders to be presidential aspirants - and the pols always rise to the bait (occasionally delivering ludicrous results; has anyone seen George Pataki in New York lately?).

So Hillary's caught the bug.

So what?

But we think she's done such a good job these last six years that she'd do well to serve six more. If not 12.

Re-elect Hillary.

Campaign Gone South (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

BARTOW, Fla.

Katherine Harris, who is trying to become a U.S. senator, says she is writing a tell-all about the many people who have wronged her. This includes, but is not necessarily limited to: the Republican leaders who didn't want her to run, the press that has covered her troubled campaign, and the many staffers who have quit her employ, whom she accuses of colluding with her opponent.

She is vague about what, precisely, makes her a victim, but she says she has it all documented.

"I've been writing it all year," she says in that kittenish voice. She often smiles and cocks her head as if she's letting you in on a secret. "It's going to be a great book."

If it is, it may be one of very few things that go well for the two-term Republican congresswoman. Once beloved by the Republican leadership for her role in overseeing the 2000 recount that delivered the presidency to George Bush, Harris was snubbed by those old friends before the primary. Republican chieftains, considering her too polarizing to win a statewide race, tried to recruit others, and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) said publicly that she could not win. Fundraising has been poor. She has come under scrutiny for her role in a bribery scandal. She has caught flak for a series of bizarre statements, including a comment in August: "If you're not electing Christians, then in essence you are going to legislate sin."

The Democrat she is challenging, Sen. Bill Nelson, was once considered highly vulnerable. Nowadays, according to recent polls, Harris is down by 26 or 35 points, approaching political rigor mortis.

"The only way Bill Nelson could lose this," says Darryl Paulson, a political scientist (and Republican) at the University of South Florida, "is if he got himself in a drug-induced stupor and ran naked down the main street of his home town."

"They can make the polls say whatever they want," Harris says. She says pollsters sometimes call her house and then hang up " 'cause we're not answering them the way they like."

The way Harris sees it, a vast left- and right-wing conspiracy, encompassing both the "liberal media" and the Republican "elite," is attempting to keep her out of the Senate. She says anyone could see the way the panel of questioners coddled Nelson at their debate last week. Her voice gets all high and mocking as she imitates them.

" Ooooh, Senator Nelson," she says. "I mean, come on."

Perhaps the worst blow to Harris's campaign has been the stories that have emerged from former staffers. They describe a Jekyll-and-Hyde candidate who can be seductively charming at one moment and pitch a temper tantrum the next, throwing a cellphone at a wall or a sheaf of papers at a campaign manager. Former chief adviser Ed Rollins, who managed Ronald Reagan's reelection to the White House in 1984, said working for Harris was like "being in insanity camp." He likened her staff to dogs that have been kicked.

Before he became the first of three campaign managers to quit, Jim Dornan programmed his cellphone to play the theme song from "The Exorcist" when Harris called.

In a recent campaign visit to Bartow, her home town in central Florida, there is little hint of the Hyde side. The 49-year-old Harris beams, dispensing hugs and telling stories about her late "daddy," the wealthy owner of a local bank chain. She is tiny and wears a fitted suit jacket the color of key lime pie. For old times' sake, she visits a livestock arena where her cousins used to show their cows. She shrieks with joy upon seeing an old friend, Bill Braswell.

"Billy and I grew up together," she says. They reminisce about an old haunt and an old boyfriend of hers. "That was, like, the first place Gary and I ever kissed," she tells him.

Here in Bartow, Harris appears to be adored. She is remembered for her days in 4-H, for her stint as Miss Polk Agriculture at age 16, and for her competitive tennis game.

"Daddy used to say not to come home if I didn't win my tennis matches [against] boys," she tells Braswell.

Nelson may have endorsements from 22 papers, including all the major dailies in the state, but Harris has an endorsement from a small collection of community newspapers (total circulation: 8,307) here in Polk, her home county. The endorsement was written by the papers' publisher, S.L. Frisbie IV, who has known Harris since she was a Girl Scout.

"Clearly she has difficulty maintaining a staff," Frisbie says. "I haven't the slightest idea why. . . . She is a charming person."

During an interview in the livestock arena, amid the ghosts of her cousins' cows, Harris talks about two of her greatest passions: art and Israel. She has made several trips to Israel, and it was on the first, in 1992, that her camera broke and she was forced to sketch her way across the country. These days, during meetings on Capitol Hill, she sometimes sketches when she's taking notes. She says she has drawn Alan Greenspan and Donald Rumsfeld.

DOJ_NMG_0089226

After Harris's quote about the importance of electing Christians was published in a Baptist publication, her campaign went into damage control, issuing a press release discussing Harris's love for Israel and explaining that while she was speaking to a Christian audience, she really meant that "people of faith" should be involved in government.

Harris does love talking about Israel. She's proud that Israelis sometimes assume she's one of them and talk to her in Hebrew. She is a Christian but has called herself a "wannabe" Jew. During the bitterly contested recount in 2000, which she oversaw as Florida's secretary of state, she compared herself to the Biblical character Queen Esther, who risked her life to save the Jews.

She says that when her husband of 10 years, wealthy Swedish businessman Anders Ebbeson, asked her to marry him, she first extracted a promise that they could live in the Holy Land one day. She doesn't know why she's always been so fascinated by the country.

"I can remember riding my bike to piano lessons and thinking about Israel," she says. "I thought I was adopted for a while."

Harris's public spats with Republican leaders and her own former staffers -- shorn of the niceties of political etiquette that typically surround such things -- have played out in the Florida newspapers like the autopsy of a political campaign. The skin is peeled back and everyone can see inside.

Several of her former staffers say they would have kept silent about goings-on in the Harris campaign if Harris herself had not publicly criticized them after they left, accusing them of being bad at their jobs, of putting "knives in my back" and of working with the Nelson campaign. They describe her as a micromanager, unable to trust her staff, prone to tears and rages over tiny things. They say she would rewrite speeches and press releases over and over. She would get upset if an aide hadn't brought her the correct coffee order from Starbucks. Dornan, the former campaign manager, says Harris was so concerned that only the best photographs of her went up on the campaign Web site that she insisted on going through every picture.

"It would be weeks and weeks and weeks before we could put anything up on the Web site," he says.

Dornan says he once infuriated Harris right before an event by setting it up so she could make a grand entrance. Instead, she wanted to greet supporters at the door as they arrived.

"She just goes completely ballistic," Dornan recalls. He says she yelled at him for 10 minutes and accused him of ruining her life. "I literally held the phone away from my ear, and everybody within a six-foot circle of me could hear her screaming."

Harris's former staffers say they worried about her health, especially after the death of her father earlier this year and the news that she was implicated in a bribery scandal with a federal contractor named Mitchell Wade, who had pleaded guilty to bribing former congressman Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.). (Wade admitted funneling $32,000 in illegal donations to Harris, but Harris has said she didn't realize the contributions were illegal and ultimately gave the money to charity.)

They worried about her clothes -- suit jackets and sweaters that were too tight, skirts that were too short. Rollins says an aide was dispatched to take her shopping for more senatorial apparel.

They worried about what one former field coordinator called her sense of "religious mission." Two former staffers -- Rollins and another onetime campaign manager, Jamie Miller -- have said Harris told them that God wanted her to be a senator. Rollins adds, "She told me that she thought she could be the first woman president."

Sitting in the livestock arena, Harris laughs at the notion she'd ever want to be president. In the past she told the Palm Beach Post that she was complimentary of those staffers who performed well, but had problems with those who would "try to undermine" her. Now, she sidesteps the question of why she had problems with staff.

"It's going to be easily explained in my book," she says. "We have a great staff now."

The Harris campaign has suffered a series of embarrassing gaffes. According to one Florida paper, her Web site listed endorsements from people who hadn't endorsed her. According to another paper, her campaign organized a rally in an airport hangar, but none of the nine officials named on her flier showed up.

In the spring, Harris announced on television she was putting $10 million of her inheritance from her father into the race. Later, she said it turned out the inheritance would not be available, so she'd put in her own money. Thus far, she has put in approximately $3.2 million, which is, she says, "everything that I have liquid."

Meanwhile, according to a financial disclosure report, her campaign has less than $1 million left. Nelson's campaign has nearly $7 million. Nelson has run seven ads since the primaries in September. Harris has aired only one and it started yesterday, according to campaign spokeswoman Jennifer Marks.

Harris turns stony when she's asked what will happen if she doesn't win.

"Haven't even considered it," she says in a tone that suggests a follow-up question would be foolhardy.

Later in the evening, while talking about her love for Queen Esther, she runs to the passenger seat of her SUV and seizes a Bible.

DOJ_NMG_0089227

"I'll give you one verse," she says. "On the day that the enemies of the Jews had hoped to overpower them, the opposite occurred, in that the Jews themselves overpowered those who hated them."

What does that have to do with this race?

"November 7th," she replies.

Democrats Are Seen To Gain In Statehouse Races (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

DES MOINES, Oct. 27 — More than 6,000 state legislative seats in 46 states are on the Nov. 7 ballot, and like the seismic state elections in 1994 and 1974 the cumulative impact of the outcomes could be immense, with Democrats possibly gaining control of a majority of state capitols for the first time in a decade.

While the nation's attention has been fixed on the question of which party will control Congress, another campaign season has been unfolding in the shadows — upstaged and overlooked but more likely to affect the day-to-day life of voters than the big-money Congressional races.

Most significantly, the groundwork for redrawing Congressional districts after the 2010 census will be done under the 50 capitol domes, and the party in power will set the table for those discussions in ways favorable to its interests. Gains made this year, analysts say, will help give incumbents a leg up in the final elections leading up to the redistricting.

If the Democrats take control of a majority of the legislatures, which polls indicate could happen, women could also attain leadership positions in greater numbers, since Democratic women in state capitals outnumber Republican women by nearly two to one. The next generation of national political leaders, by tradition, is nurtured in the state legislatures.

"This is a national election with big issues," said Alan Rosenthal, a professor of political science at Rutgers University who tracks state election issues, "and that will filter down to the people who nobody knows about."

One indication of both parties' interest in the local races is the money that has been flowing into them.

The Democratic Legislative Campaign Committee plans to spend $9 million to $10 million on legislative races, up from $6 million to $7 million in 2004. Its counterpart, the Republican State Leadership Committee, has nearly doubled spending on state races, including for legislators, to $20 million.

Republicans control both chambers in 20 states, Democrats in 19. One state, Nebraska, has a nonpartisan legislature, while the parties split control in the remaining 10 states. States to watch on Election Day include Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee and Wisconsin, where Republicans have narrow majorities in the lower house or senate. Democrats have narrow majorities in Colorado, Maine and Montana.

What makes the races even more suspenseful is that the parties have not been so even in decades, if ever. Of the 7,382 statehouse legislative seats across the country, Democrats hold 21 more than the Republicans, a margin of less than half a percent.

In 17 of the 46 states that will elect some or all of their state senators, a shift of only three seats would alter party control in the senate, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. In 12 state houses, a shift of five or fewer seats would tip the balance.

Some states, like Montana and Colorado, where Democrats gained narrow legislative control for the first time in decades in 2004, are being watched by some political scientists and party leaders as barometers of the party's Western strategy. Other states with closely divided legislatures, including Michigan, Nevada and Tennessee, could be swung by fierce contests for governor or the United States Senate.

Connecticut and New Jersey, where Democrats control both chambers of the legislature, and New York, where the parties each control a chamber, are not widely expected to see shifts in power. "We seem to be in this era of hyper-evenness of the parties at the grass-roots legislative level," said Tim Storey, a senior fellow at the National Conference of State Legislatures.

Presidential hopefuls have also poured several hundred thousand dollars into legislative races in Nevada in anticipation of the early presidential caucus there in 2008. In Michigan, a new group sprang up this year, the Michigan Coalition for Progress, to help defeat Republicans in the legislature.

And then there is Iowa, where the hyper-evenness is most hyper of all. Republicans have a one-vote advantage in the Iowa House, 51 to 49, and the parties are tied at 25 in the Senate.

Noticing these whisker-width margins, prospective presidential candidates, including Gov. George E. Pataki of New York and Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, have donated money to local campaigns, hoping perhaps to make friends before the Iowa Caucuses in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0089228

Mr. Pataki's political action committee has donated $270,000 to Iowa Republicans, Mr. Romney's PAC almost $1.6 million, according to the Iowa Ethics and Campaign Disclosure Board. Independent political groups, called 527s, have waded in as well to influence or swing the vote.

But the money and the high stakes, many people here say, may be having another effect in Des Moines and many other state capitals. State legislative races, with their low-glamour blend of amateur politics and homespun local concerns, may be losing their traditions of civility.

"You have more money sloshing around," said Peverill Squire, a professor of political science at the University of Iowa who follows legislative races. More and more, Professor Squire said, control over local campaigns is slipping toward centralized parties or interest groups. "And it is certainly a much rougher campaign than we are used to seeing in Iowa," he said.

Just ask Kevin R. Wiskus.

Mr. Wiskus is a 42-year-old Iowa farmer and lifelong Republican from the town of Centerville, about 100 miles south of the capital, who is making his first run for public office for a House seat.

He became so outraged by his own party's efforts to elect him that he resigned last month in protest.

A mailing sent by the state committee told voters that Mr. Wiskus's Democratic opponent, a lawyer named Kurt Swaim, had defended a man charged with child molesting.

Mr. Wiskus knew that Mr. Swaim had been assigned the case by the court as a public defender, and decided the attack was unconscionable. He is now an independent, and said he would serve as an independent if elected.

"I was offended," Mr. Wiskus said in an interview. "I had promised and pledged to run a clean and ethical and honorable race, and I told the Republican party I did not want any attack ads."

The speaker of the Iowa House of Representatives, Christopher Rants, a Republican who has marshaled the party's efforts in the legislative races, said he thought the Democrats had done more than his party to coarsen the debate in Iowa with negative advertising.

One mailing about a Republican, Mr. Rants said, showed a cadaver under a sheet and suggested that the candidate's opposition to stem-cell research was responsible for the woman's death. Democrats and some independent scholars, including Professor Squire, say the Republicans have probably pushed the line harder and farther.

Whether the Republicans can hold onto the gains in state legislatures that they made beginning in the 1980s is probably the central question of the election.

The Democrats, for most of the 20th century, were statehouse titans all over the nation — with a peak in the mid-1970s when they controlled close to 70 percent of all legislative seats. In the post-Watergate election of November 1974, they added 628 legislature seats in just one night.

The Republicans began a surge in the 1980s, making major strides in 1994, when they gained 514 seats overnight. They finally gained dominance in 2002, picking up enough seats to surpass the Democrats for the first time in 50 years. There has been almost perfect parity since then.

Nev. Congressman Assault Probe Reopens (AP)

By Ryan Nakashima

AP, October 30, 2006

The district attorney said Monday that authorities have reopened their investigation into a cocktail waitress' claim that a Republican congressman running for governor assaulted her in a parking garage after a night of drinking.

District Attorney David Roger said the case involving Rep. Jim Gibbons — which had been closed after the woman, Chrissy Mazzeo, dropped her complaint — is under investigation again.

Mazzeo, a Las Vegas Strip casino waitress, accused Gibbons, 61, of pushing her up against a wall Oct. 13 and propositioning her. Mazzeo, 32, said she had been pressured and offered cash from people linked to the Gibbons campaign to drop the complaint.

The five-term congressman, who is in a close race with Democratic state Sen. Dina Titus for Nevada's open governor's seat, has denied wrongdoing and sued Monday to force police to release surveillance videos he said would disprove Mazzeo's claim.

A judge set an emergency hearing for Tuesday.

Mazzeo's lawyer, Richard Wright, did not immediately return phone calls seeking comment. He told the Las Vegas Review-Journal that his client will press charges after all.

Gibbons, in statements to police and at a news conference with his wife earlier this month, said he walked Mazzeo to the garage, caught her when she tripped and walked away.

DOJ_NMG_0089229

"A true record of the tape's recording will demonstrate that I was never in that parking garage on that evening," he said in the lawsuit.

Police previously said surveillance cameras in the garage weren't working. A property management company for the garage, however, said it turned hours of tapes over to authorities.

The police department said in a news release Monday that it would not comment until a judge ruled on the matter.

Gibbons led Titus 47 percent to 41 percent in a poll released Friday. Most of the polling took place after the allegations were reported but before Mazzeo held a news conference Oct. 25 to recount her version of the events. The poll conducted by Washington-based Research 2000 for the Reno Gazette-Journal and KRNV-TV had a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

A Politician Who Thinks Like A Linebacker (WP)

By Donna St. George

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

The governor had dropped by to teach a rhetoric class. It was mere weeks before Election Day, and Bob Ehrlich held forth in a small auditorium at Towson University, sleeves rolled up and a microphone in hand.

He asked the students to imagine themselves as political consultants. Their hypothetical candidate was a Republican governor. "Very handsome, by the way," he joked, flashing a smile. "Two beautiful children. Beautiful wife."

But there were problems, Ehrlich admitted: The state tilts heavily Democratic. The governor has been fighting with the legislature. Newspaper editors are not always in his corner. "When you are an incumbent," he added, "the election is generally about you ."

This much he knows as he faces the race of his political life.

After 20 years of pulling out victories at the ballot box -- young and on the rise in the state House and in Congress before his election as governor at age 44 -- Ehrlich is now trailing his opponent, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D), in an array of polls.

But Ehrlich has come from behind before. This is the 16th contest of his political career. He has never lost.

If he clinches it, his political profile will change markedly, said Matthew Crenson, a political science professor at Johns Hopkins University. As a two-time Republican victor in a predominantly Democratic state, "he will emerge as a figure in national Republican politics," Crenson said.

If Ehrlich loses, he will be thrust out of elective office for the first time since he was 28.

How it turns out will depend, in part, on how voters view Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. -- a college linebacker-turned-lawyer who rose from working-class roots to make history in 2002 as the first Republican governor in Maryland in more than a generation.

Even many of his critics say the 48-year-old governor is likable -- affable and unpretentious, the kind of guy who slaps backs, cracks jokes, talks sports. He has a strong streak of the Everyman.

But they also say the competitive edge that has helped him win football games and political campaigns has sometimes worked against him during his four years as governor.

"To understand Bob, you have to go back to his days of playing sandlot football," said D. Bruce Poole, a Democratic friend and former House majority leader who supports Ehrlich. "He is competitive. He's a linebacker in mentality. He has always been able to take a hit and return it with that much more."Emerging as the Republican Voice

It was another weekend on the campaign trail, and Bob Ehrlich was headed to a corn roast in Reisterstown. The rain had stopped, finally. He made his entrance behind a goat named Tootsie who was wearing an Ehrlich sticker on her hindquarters.

The crowd parted and cheered, opening the way for the telegenic governor, who pumped hands and patted backs all the way to a makeshift stage. There, inside a hay barn, one of the hosts introduced him as "the best governor Maryland has ever had."

Square-jawed and lean, in a red polo shirt, Ehrlich smiled broadly as he looked out on the crowd of 300. This was a fundraiser in the county where Ehrlich started his political life.

With both hands in the air -- his gestures large and emphatic, his wife beaming beside him -- he made a few jokes, then narrowed in: The Democrats are the problem, he said, especially House Speaker Michael E. Busch (Anne Arundel) and Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (Calvert).

"Raise your hand if you want Mike Miller and Mike Busch to run Maryland politics for the next four years," he boomed.

"Booooo!" the crowd shouted. "Boooo!"

Just five more Republicans in the state Senate, he said, could change the legislature. "I need five new senators to stop Mike Miller from running over you for four years," he thundered.

DOJ_NMG_0089230

The crowd roared.

The idea of greatly increasing the Republican presence in either body is a long shot, but Ehrlich has clearly emerged as the state party's voice. The governor has made other Republicans feel relevant politically, said Del. Anthony J. O'Donnell (R-Calvert). Before, he added, "we were reduced to rhetorical bomb-throwing. . . . We were ignored."

The corn roast went so well that Ehrlich skipped the next event -- his wife went in his place -- and posed for photographs, smile after smile after still-perfect smile, until it seemed that few people had been missed.

This was Bob Ehrlich in his home base in Baltimore County -- among political kin, a few of them from far enough back to remember how he started out.

The son of a car salesman, Ehrlich grew up as an only child in a rowhouse in Arbutus in Baltimore County. With a gift for athletics -- and the help of his father's boss -- he landed a scholarship to the exclusive Gilman prep school in Baltimore.

It was a world unlike his own, and Ehrlich remembers having "a chip on my shoulder" at first. But he became a standout athlete, playing three sports, and with the help of the headmaster went on to Princeton, where he was a linebacker and team co-captain.

Ehrlich turned to politics in 1986, after law school at Wake Forest University. He had practiced three years, in a silk-stocking law firm in Baltimore -- Ober, Kaler, Grimes & Shriver -- when he decided to make a run for the state House.

Few thought he could win. But he did. Twice.

Those years, he said recently, were "the happiest of my life."

Several senior Democrats brought him along. "They taught me how to be a legislator," he recalled. "They made me part of the group. They let me in the backroom. They had me handle bills on the floor, which was very rare for Republicans."

The political mood had shifted when Ehrlich was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives. He won in 1994, during the heady days of Newt Gingrich's Republican revolution. For the first time, he was part of the majority.

But when he returned to Annapolis as governor, he was a Republican in a Democratic state -- in a more partisan atmosphere. Although he tried to forge relationships with lawmakers over basketball games and evenings watching sports at the governor's mansion, he said, it did not work.

On issues such as slot machines and medical malpractice, he did not find enough allies.

"Coming back, I mistakenly thought I could go home again -- and you cannot," he reflected in an interview. "It was the biggest surprise of my four years, the biggest disappointment."A Candidate Who Hates to Lose

His morning coffee is iced. It is 9:30 on a rainy Friday, still early for Ehrlich, an admitted night owl who usually doesn't go to sleep until 2 to 3 a.m. Today he started earlier than usual, making football picks on "The Junkies," a popular morning radio show on WJFK (106.7 FM). He has two more losses than wins for the season, but he defends his record. "It's not just the winners; it's the point spreads," he says. "It's easy to pick winners. This is a science."

The athletics that so defined Ehrlich in his youth are still part of his adult life. He reaches for sports metaphors in his speech; he asks about game scores on the campaign trail. For much of his term, he has played golf frequently, even improving his handicap from 10.6 to 8.3. But his aides say he has been too busy to hit the links during the past year.

For nearly four years, Ehrlich has lived in the 54-room governor's mansion in Annapolis with his wife, Kendel, a lawyer and cable television host, and sons, Drew, 7, and Josh, 2. Toys are piled near a side door. Halloween decorations are everywhere, including a giant inflatable pumpkin in the landscaped yard.

Thinking over his public life, Ehrlich clearly tries to set himself apart from the tactical side of politics that many see as one of his defining characteristics.

"I really like the job," he said. "Politics? I think we're pretty good at it. But it's not my favorite part of this process. My favorite part is clearly getting in front of crowds and making my case."

He talks about how much he enjoyed his two televised debates against O'Malley. "I like to compete," he says. He came to the debate armed with numbers, which he ticked off methodically. He tried to strike a tone of candor, and at one point answered his opponent with: "I don't know what all of that means, I gotta tell you."

His hard-nosed determination shows up even in small ways, friends say. On Capitol Hill, one lawmaker recalls, congressmen sometimes played games of matching quarters -- heads or tails -- during idle time in the cloakroom. Ehrlich "hated to lose, even if it was 25 cents," chuckled Rep. Howard Coble (R-N.C.), a friend who recalls teasing him about it.

But Ehrlich's quest to win, his critics say, has hindered his ability to get programs passed. When he was elected, Ehrlich promised to work with lawmakers beyond party lines. He started by making bipartisan Cabinet appointments; about 40 percent of his Cabinet secretaries have been Democrats.

Still, the governor has often locked into battle with legislators.

Ehrlich had vowed to bring legalized slots to Maryland. After four efforts, there are still no slots. Twice, Ehrlich called special legislative sessions only to veto the bills they produced. On more than 20 issues -- including minimum wage, health benefits at Wal-Mart and election law changes -- the legislature overrode his vetoes.

House Speaker Busch, a close friend when they both served in the state House, has clashed with him often. Ehrlich "ran for office as a consensus builder and compromiser, but he did not govern that way," Busch argued. If he had, he said, "I think he would be a much more formidable candidate today."

John Kane, chairman of the state Republican Party, said that the real problem was the liberal wing of the Democratic Party, which often blocked Ehrlich's proposals. "They like monopoly," Kane said.

Senate President Miller said the governor should have worked harder at gaining the support of lawmakers and learning the details of policies and proposals. He called Ehrlich "a ribbon-cutter, a golfer, a show horse."

"I see an absence of work ethic on his part, and it's frustrating," he said.

Last year, one of Ehrlich's aides, Joseph Steffen, dubbed "the Prince of Darkness," was fired after boasting on the Internet that he had orchestrated a whisper campaign about O'Malley's private life. Ehrlich said he had nothing to do with the incident, which he now waves off as overblown.

Old foes are skeptical. In a 1996 campaign for U.S. Congress, a leaflet was circulated describing Ehrlich's opponent as a "homewrecker" while calling Ehrlich "a family man in the truest sense of the word." Ehrlich has denied any dirty campaigning. But Connie DeJuliis, the opponent, said he did not deny involvement when she confronted him at the time.

"You cross the line when you attack people personally, and that's what Bob Ehrlich does," DeJuliis said. "It's not supposed to be winning at all costs."'Never Answer a General Question'

At Towson University, Ehrlich shifted from talking political strategy and addressed the class directly.

"Raise your hand if you're pro-choice on abortion," he said.

Hands shot up.

"Raise your hand if you're pro-life," he went on.

More hands.

"Never answer that question!" he boomed. "You're all wrong."

"I didn't define any terms," he said. "I didn't ask how you felt about partial birth abortion or judicial bypass or parental consent or Medicaid funding or stem cell embryonic research."

The students listened closely.

He tried again. "Who's against capital punishment?"

Ehrlich surveyed the room: No hands.

The governor smiled.

A moderate Republican, Ehrlich carefully parses his positions on many issues. He supports abortion rights, for example, but with limits: no partial birth abortions, no federal funding. He runs conservative on fiscal issues but has supported new taxes or fees on vehicle registration, sewage and property. He favors the death penalty but has granted many pardons and commutations.

Ehrlich has learned to be wary of labels.

"Make your questioner define the terms," he told the Towson students. "And once you do, guess what? You can give opinions for the rest of the day, but you can give opinions as a result of what you actually believe and not the territory the questioner wanted to capture you in."

Precisely how all of this will play on Election Day is the great unknown. A poll published Sunday by The Washington Post showed a majority of likely voters in Maryland thought that Ehrlich had done a good job as governor. Even so, he lagged 10 percentage points behind O'Malley, which analysts say reflects a national climate that is tough on Republicans.

Ehrlich's aides say the poll is at odds with their results -- and, in an interview, the governor said he has seen many signs of Election-Day promise on the campaign trail.

"If you're not an optimist," he told the class in Towson, "this is probably not your profession."

GOVERNOR'S BAN ON STAFF PERKS ISN'T PERFECT (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

DOJ_NMG_0089232

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

Sacramento — After allowing his staff to accept tens of thousands of dollars' worth of gifts from business interests, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is now worried about the appearance of a conflict of interest and has barred them from taking even a free cup of coffee.

But the policy, stricter than state law, hasn't stopped the perks.

Schwarzenegger aides over the last year have been given free tickets to Disneyland and San Francisco Giants baseball games; to Rolling Stones concerts and Sacramento Kings basketball games.

Schwarzenegger's chief of staff, Susan Kennedy, sent a memo to the governor's aides in August explaining that by taking gifts, even if the law allows it, they could create a public perception that they have been compromised.

"When in doubt … pay for the item yourself," Kennedy wrote.

In a separate letter to Schwarzenegger's staff, his legal counsel, Andrea Hoch, said aides could not attend any of the governor's campaign fundraising events unless they paid for their food and drink.

But the Spartan ethic comes with loopholes. Kennedy is scheduled to join lawmakers and state officials on a 12-day trip to South America next month that is sponsored by a tax-exempt group financed partly by energy companies and other businesses that lobby in Sacramento.

The visitors plan to stay at a hotel in Buenos Aires that is rated by one travel guide as "the most exclusive" in the city. A spokesman for Schwarzenegger said the trip doesn't violate the gift policy because Kennedy will deliver a speech as the governor's representative.

"It is important that Susan, as chief of staff, work with members and important policy leaders to further the goals of the administration," said Adam Mendelsohn, Schwarzenegger's communications director.

The new rules are an about-face for the governor, who in past years has taken a permissive approach to freebies.

In 2004, after The Times reported that dozens of Schwarzenegger administration officials had accepted free meals and sports tickets, the governor said in an interview: "Those are things that I don't think anyone has to worry about. There's no one selling out in my administration."

· Ameriquest Capital Corp., parent of the mortgage-lending company, spent more than $5,600 on Rolling Stones concert tickets over the last year for nearly two dozen members of the governor's staff and their spouses.

Ameriquest reported having lobbied Schwarzenegger's office this year on lending issues and a legal settlement. In March, California officials reached a multimillion-dollar settlement with the company over allegations that it had misled borrowers, among other things.

· Walt Disney Co. has given Disneyland tickets, parking passes and other gifts valued at $1,189 to six Schwarzenegger aides since early last year. One recipient was Richard Costigan, a senior aide who pushes the governor's agenda through the Legislature and advises him on which bills to sign or veto.

· AT&T last year gave $1,264 worth of San Francisco Giants tickets to six Schwarzenegger aides who went to a game together. The telecommunications company also gave $385 worth of tickets and refreshments to two Schwarzenegger aides who attended an Eagles concert one year ago. One was Cynthia Bryant, who also works on the governor's legislative agenda.

· The California Chamber of Commerce, the state's most influential business lobbyist, spent more than $5,800 this year and last treating dozens of Schwarzenegger administration aides at receptions, lunches and dinners. A party for outgoing Chief of Staff Patricia Clarey was held at the chamber's headquarters in Sacramento in January and was attended by more than 45 of the governor's aides.

State law allows public officials to accept gifts worth up to $360 a year from any one source. Under Schwarzenegger's new policy, aides are forbidden to accept tickets, meals, entertainment or loans from anyone doing business with the state, or any group lobbying for passage or defeat of legislation.

Kennedy's memo on the matter said the public might "perceive acceptance of gifts as creating a conflict of interest."

Asked what prompted the change, Mendelsohn said: "The administration has had new staff members come on recently. And often with new staff members, and new leadership, you'll find changes and important additional steps taken that were not put in place originally."

Kennedy's trip is courtesy of a tax-exempt group in San Francisco called the California Foundation on the Environment and the Economy. Her domestic partner also will go, paying her own expenses.

The itinerary includes a stay at the Alvear Palace Hotel in Buenos Aires, where room prices range from $550 to $4,500 a night, according to a state official familiar with the trip.

A Frommer's travel guide describes the hotel as a "a gilded, classical confection full of marble and bronze" with a guest list that has included "names like Antonio Banderas, Donatella Versace, the emperor of Japan and Robert Duvall."

Other stops are to include Santiago, Chile; Rio de Janeiro; and Bariloche, a popular tourist spot in Argentina.

Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) and his wife are expected to go. So are state Sen. George Runner (R-Lancaster) and his wife, Republican Assemblywoman Sharon Runner; and Assemblyman John Laird (D-Santa Cruz) and his domestic partner.

The trip's purpose is to study technologies aimed at reducing global warming, said Patrick Mason, president of the foundation. He would not reveal who is going, citing security concerns.

He sent an e-mail to participants this week asking that they not speak to The Times about the trip. The e-mail, which was obtained by the newspaper, was sent to officials at Chevron, Southern California Edison, the environmental group the National Resources Defense Council, and to some Schwarzenegger administration officials, among others.

Two companies that said they were planning to attend maintain a lobbying presence in Sacramento: Sempra Energy and the cable giant Comcast. Sempra owns San Diego Gas & Electric Co. and Southern California Gas Co., both of which are regulated by the state Public Utilities Commission.

PUC Executive Director Steve Larson will be among the guests on the trip.

Sempra pays $30,000 a year in dues to the Foundation on the Environment and Economy. The firm is going because Sempra believes that it is important to "provide policymakers and elected officials some background that is helpful in making informed decisions," said company spokesman Art Larson (no relation to Steve).

Watchdog groups said the South America trip gives lobbyists extraordinary access to government officials — access that others don't get. They also said that if state officials think the trip is important and justified, taxpayers should pay for it.

"We want state delegations going on fact-finding trips if warranted," said Sheila Krumholz, acting executive director of the Center for Responsive Politics in Washington, D.C. "We just have to make sure they aren't being unduly influenced by such lavish trips, and that policy is not being skewed as a result."

The Schwarzenegger administration says that it also is revamping what have been loose practices when it comes to fundraising events. For much of the governor's term, policy aides invited to such events mingled freely with donors.

Even after the policy was unveiled, though, the practice continued.

Bonnie Reiss, a longtime friend of Schwarzenegger and one of his top aides, attended a campaign fundraiser for the governor last month at the home of media mogul Haim Saban. The new policy does not rule out attending, but those who go must foot the bill themselves.

After The Times asked about Reiss' attendance in light of the new rules, Mendelsohn said Reiss would reimburse the campaign for her meal.

There are no penalties for failing to comply with the new policies, he said.

"We will remain committed," he said, "to continuing to enforce this policy and correct any oversights."

The Holes In The Border Fence Plan (LAT)

By Phil Angelides

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

ON THURSDAY, President Bush put his signature on a measure authorizing a new fence along 700 miles of the 1,952-mile-long border between the United States and Mexico. Funds for the fence may never be provided, and the fence may never get built. Regardless of its future, the fence legislation alone is no substitute for the kind of comprehensive immigration reform that California and the nation need.

The United States has long been strengthened by policies that have brought immigrants here from every corner of the world. And yet every period of high immigration also has been shadowed with fear, ignorance, hatred and racism. As we move forward with immigration reform, we must adhere to what makes our country great — freedom, opportunity and equality — and resist pandering to the lowest common denominators of divisiveness, stereotypes and ignorance.

Comprehensive reform starts with full funding for the strong border security provisions originally provided in the 2004 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act in response to the recommendations of the 9/11 commission. The act calls for at least 2,000 new, permanent border agents a year and 8,000 new detention beds a year for five years. Investments in border personnel and surveillance technology are essential for protecting national security and regulating immigration, but the federal government has funded only a fraction of these requirements.

Border control, by itself, is not a solution. For one thing, no border in a country as large as the United States can be made perfectly secure. More important, an estimated 40% of the 12 million undocumented immigrants now here entered the country legally and then overstayed their visas. Border fences and other border control measures can't deal with that part of the problem — and will likely make it worse.

Immigration policy must deal realistically with the major engine of illegal immigration: the economy's demand for immigrant labor. The federal government must enact rational and reasonable guest-worker programs that match immigrant workers with the nation's workforce needs. We need to end the shadow economy in which undocumented workers toil without regulation and without the protection of law.

We also ought to offer undocumented immigrants who are working hard and supporting our economy a path toward citizenship, as long as they are willing to be accountable, submit to a background check, pay back taxes, learn English and study American civics. They then should be allowed to get in line behind the backlog of people attempting to gain citizenship.

Finally, immigration reform must enable states to hold the federal government accountable for managing our nation's immigration. When the failures of the federal government — be it securing the borders or failing to limit illegal employment — result in increased burdens on state and local governments, then the federal government must be required to compensate state and local governments for their increased costs.

I come from a family of immigrants. My mother, who is of Greek descent but immigrated from Egypt, became a U.S. citizen when I was 10. My grandparents on my father's side came to this country from Greece at the turn of the last century. They worked hard and sent my father to college, and both of their American-born sons fought in World War II.

My grandparents never spoke much English, and yet they were great Americans. They faced the same anti-immigrant sentiment that we see too much of today: hate, ignorance and racism. Yet my grandparents, and millions like them, persevered and became a source of national strength and vitality.

The immigrants in this country today also can be a source of strength, and, guided by comprehensive reforms and orderly policies, immigration will continue to renew the United States and California. But it will take a lot more than a half-promise for a partial fence.

Rep. Hunter Aims For White House (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Alpine), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, announced plans today to make a longshot bid for his party's 2008 nomination for president.

Hunter said his campaign will feature the two issues that are his trademarks: support for the U.S. military and opposition to illegal immigration.

While other Republicans may be edging away from President Bush over the war, Hunter praised the president for his guidance of the U.S. military missions in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"We are going to carry our message of a strong national defense and strong national borders" to voters, Hunter said at a news conference at the waterfront site where he announced his first bid for Congress in 1980.

In that race, Hunter upset a longtime Democratic incumbent, helped by the Ronald Reagan presidential landslide. Hunter has never faced a close race since.

"It's going to be a long road. There's lots of rough and tumble, but I think it's the right thing to do for our country," Hunter said of his presidential bid.

Hunter expressed confidence that he will be reelected next week to Congress from the 52nd District and remain as chairman of the powerful committee. Under congressional rules, he could only serve as chairman for two more years if the GOP controls the House.

Hunter, 58, served in the Army in Vietnam and later earned a law degree at Western State University College of Law in San Diego. He was a plaintiff's attorney before entering politics.

He is a hardliner on illegal immigration and sponsored a bill signed by Bush to build a 700-mile border fence.

Hunter's congressional opponent, Navy veteran John Rinaldi, was on the fringes of the news conference crowd. He called Hunter's announcement a stunt to draw attention away from serious issues.

"He has about as much chance of being president as I do of becoming Miss America," Rinaldi said.

Rep. Hunter Exploring Presidential Run (AP-Y)

By Elliot Spagat

AP, October 31, 2006

Republican Rep. Duncan Hunter, known in the military's echelon for his congressional role but hardly a national name, said Monday he was taking the initial step in a 2008 presidential bid.

DOJ_NMG_0089235

"This is going to be a long road, it's a challenging road, there's going to be some rough and tumble, but I think it's the right thing to do for our country," Hunter, the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said at a waterfront news conference.

The declaration to form an exploratory committee allows the 13-term California congressman to begin raising money and organize supporters in early Republican primary states such as Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

Hunter is a familiar face on Capitol Hill and at the Pentagon as chairman of the powerful panel that oversees military policy. Not so beyond Washington and San Diego, and his White House bid surprised many Republicans.

He had not been on any list of potential 2008 candidates that included more familiar names such as Sens. John McCain of Arizona, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

"In typical Duncan Hunter fashion, I didn't consult with any Republican leaders," he said to laughter and applause from an audience of about 100 people against a backdrop of military ships on San Diego Bay.

Analysts immediately characterized the quest as a long shot.

"You never say never, but Congressman Hunter faces extremely long odds given that practically no one apart from students of Congress knows who he is," said Jack Pitney, a government professor at Claremont McKenna College. "He's a good member of Congress, a very effective chairman of Armed Services. It's just that he has no following within the party."

Hunter, 58, became chairman of the House Armed Services Committee in 2003 — a position he would lose should Democrats take control of the House after the Nov. 7 midterm elections. By making an announcement now, he can begin raising money while still heading the committee.

The Vietnam War veteran, a recipient of a Bronze Star, has made his mark in Congress by advocating for a strong military and border security. He played a leading role in the construction of a 14-mile double fence on the U.S.-Mexico border that is nearing completion in San Diego. He co-authored legislation signed by President Bush last week that would extend the border fence to 700 miles.

Hunter voted against the North American Free Trade Agreement and the Central American Free Trade Agreement and opposed most-favored-nation status for China. This year, he was a vocal critic of a deal that gave a Dubai company control of some operations at six American ports.

Hunter has cruised to re-election since he, as a 32-year-old criminal defense attorney, rode Ronald Reagan's coattails to unseat a nine-term Democratic incumbent. The Riverside native faces token opposition next week in his bid for another term representing San Diego's eastern suburbs.

Hunter was a close ally of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican who was sentenced to more than eight years in prison this year for accepting $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors. Hunter has accepted $46,000 in campaign donations from the same contractors at the center of the Cunningham scandal, Brent Wilkes and Mitchell Wade, and their associates.

Carl Luna, a political science professor at San Diego's Mesa College, said Hunter may be preparing himself for losing the Armed Services Committee chairman slot.

"Duncan Hunter is looking for something to do if the Democrats take control of the Congress," Luna said. "He doesn't want to have to go from being chairman of a powerful committee to just another backbencher."

Things didn't end well for the last California House member to run for president — Republican Robert Dornan in 1996. Dornan, a vociferous conservative known by the nickname "B-1 Bob" for his support of military programs and bombastic style, spent his time and money on a fruitless White House bid and ended up losing his House seat to Democrat Loretta Sanchez.

Rep. Hunter To Explore White House Bid (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 30 -- Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and a vigorous opponent of illegal immigration, announced Monday that he is starting the process of seeking the presidency in 2008.

Hunter, 58, said he will form an exploratory committee for a presidential run, adding his name to a list of better-known GOP hopefuls such as Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

"I've always laid my cards on the table," Hunter said at a news conference in San Diego. "As I finish my final two years as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, I'm also going to be preparing to run for president of the United States in 2008."

The 13-term congressman is known in his suburban San Diego district for advocacy on immigration and military issues. He was a leader in the construction of a 14-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexico border south of San Diego, and he cosponsored legislation that President Bush signed last week to build 700 miles of additional fencing along the border. A Vietnam veteran, Hunter has advocated for a strong military, sometimes taking positions to the right of Republican leaders.

Hunter is expected to cruise to reelection next week, but if Democrats win a majority in the House he would lose his committee chairmanship.

That may be a factor in his unexpected announcement, said John J. Pitney Jr., a government professor at Claremont McKenna College.

"He has been in Congress long enough to remember what it was like in the minority," Pitney said. "The difference between being chair of a committee and being a minority member is like the difference between lightning and a lightning bug. . . . He may have decided a long-shot presidential campaign is more fun."

An Oval Office For Mayor Mike? (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

NEW YORK -- If you should happen to go to dinner here, the talk will inevitably turn to any one of the many presidential candidates the Empire State has to offer. Foremost among them, of course, is Hillary Clinton, but worthy of mention are Rudy Giuliani and George Pataki, Republicans both. Increasingly, though, the hum is also about the politically audacious Michael Rubens Bloomberg, 44th on Forbes magazine's list of the richest Americans and, as it happens, the mayor of this fair city. He might also be running.

I say "might" because Bloomberg has gone from the firm "no" he offered me some months ago to a more intriguing "I'm considering it" that he offered someone I talked with recently. Indeed, among this city's moneyed, journalistic (not, alas, the same thing), entertainment, financial and other sorts of elites, there are always one or two at the table who say, with great solemnity, that they happen to know Bloomberg will indeed run for president as an independent. Knowing my duty, I called the Bloomberg people and asked if that is the case. By press time, as they say in the movies, I had yet to hear back. I take that as a wobbly affirmation.

The prospect of a Bloomberg presidential candidacy delights me. I grant you that just last week I was excited about Barack Obama, but that is because I think the more the merrier -- especially if they are truly bright, unencumbered by a need to defend the Iraq war and willing to look at things afresh. This is particularly the case with Bloomberg, who has an unorthodox approach to politics. He says what he means and he means what he says and he tells it like it is. This string of cliches is, in fact, the truth.

Here is the quintessential Bloomberg story: In July, in the midst of a heat wave, the power failed in certain sections of Queens. For politicians, a power failure is such a no-brainer that even the alcoholically stupefied show up to denounce Con Ed, call for an investigation and demand that its chairman resign. Bloomberg, though, did no such thing. He supported the utility and its chief executive, noting that it was awfully hot as well for the Con Ed workers and that they were apparently doing the best they could. Jaws dropped all over the city.

Officially, Bloomberg is the Republican mayor of New York. But he's really the Democrat he used to be or, more to the point, the independent he would become if he chose to run for president. Running as neither a Republican nor a Democrat would be a nearly insurmountable hurdle, but Bloomberg is very, very rich and not at all afraid to use his money. He personally financed his two mayoral campaigns -- nearly $74 million in 2001, $84 million in 2005 -- and he has said that spending half a billion dollars on a presidential race is, if that's what it takes, easily doable. Ross Perot, not as rich as Bloomberg and clearly deranged, got 19 percent of the vote in 1992. Bloomberg, who's sane, could do better.

Is the country ready for a billionaire divorced Jew with a penchant for the blunt quote and a habit of getting his own way? Probably not. But there is no doubt that Bloomberg has done a terrific job managing New York, and there is no doubt that the federal government is a mismanaged mess -- so dysfunctional and weird that grown men will defend the appropriation of money for bridges that go virtually nowhere. Wasting money has become the functional equivalent of gutsy politics -- the willingness to defend the fiscally obscene. Bloomberg, maybe John McCain as well, would do something about that. One hopes.

A Bloomberg presidential candidacy would certainly complicate life for Hillary Clinton, not to mention Giuliani, and it's a long shot as an independent or third-party candidacy in any case. (Perot got nary an electoral college vote.) There are vast stretches of the country where you can't get a good pastrami sandwich, sarcasm is loathed, candor is confused with rudeness, advocacy of gun control is hardly appreciated and a crusade against trans fats might be confused with lunacy. For Bloomberg, a presidential campaign would be an enormously expensive tilting at a windmill, and no one should be surprised if, as he has said, he devotes his apres-mayoralty life to giving away his fortune.

But Bloomberg drops too many hints at dinner parties, says no with a total lack of conviction and has the gambler's yen to roll the dice for major stakes. Once before, he ignored sage advice, switched political parties and ran for mayor. Will he do something similar now? I don't know. Is he considering it? You bet.

Abstinence Message Goes Beyond Teens (USAT)

By Sharon Jayson

USA Today, October 30, 2006

The federal government's "no sex without marriage" message isn't just for kids anymore.

Now the government is targeting unmarried adults up to age 29 as part of its abstinence-only programs, which include millions of dollars in federal money that will be available to the states under revised federal grant guidelines for 2007.

The government says the change is a clarification. But critics say it's a clear signal of a more directed policy targeting the sexual behavior of adults.

"They've stepped over the line of common sense," said James Wagoner, president of Advocates for Youth, a Washington, D.C.-based non-profit that supports sex education. "To be preaching abstinence when 90% of people are having sex is in essence to lose touch with reality. It's an ideological campaign. It has nothing to do with public health."

Abstinence education programs, which have focused on preteens and teens, teach that abstaining from sex is the only effective or acceptable method to prevent pregnancy or disease. They give no instruction on birth control or safe sex.

The National Center for Health Statistics says well over 90% of adults ages 20-29 have had sexual intercourse.

But Wade Horn, assistant secretary for children and families at the Department of Health and Human Services, said the revision is aimed at 19- to 29-year-olds because more unmarried women in that age group are having children.

Government data released last month show that 998,262 births in 2004 were to unmarried women 19-29, the ages with the most births to unmarried women.

"The message is 'It's better to wait until you're married to bear or father children,' " Horn said. "The only 100% effective way of getting there is abstinence."

The revised guidelines specify that states seeking grants are "to identify groups ... most likely to bear children out-of-wedlock, targeting adolescents and/or adults within the 12- through 29-year-old age range." Previous guidelines didn't mention targeting of an age group.

"We wanted to remind states they could use these funds not only to target adolescents," Horn said. "It's a reminder."

Last year, 46 states applied for the federal abstinence-education money, to fund programs in schools, neighborhood clubs and faith-based organizations.

Sarah Brown, director of the National Campaign to Prevent Teen Pregnancy, says abstinence programs are among many messages that have helped reduce teen pregnancy rates. But "the notion that the federal government is supporting millions of dollars worth of messages to people who are grown adults about how to conduct their sex life is a very divisive policy," she says.

"We would oppose any program that stigmatizes unmarried people," adds Nicky Grist, executive director of the Alternatives to Marriage Project, a non-profit organization based in Brooklyn, N.Y., that advocates for the rights of unmarried people.

For last year's state grants, Congress appropriated $50 million. A similar amount is expected for 2007, but the money has not yet been allocated, according to the Administration for Children and Families.

"I think the program should talk about the problem with out-of- wedlock childbearing — not about your sex life," Brown says. "If you use contraception effectively and consistently, you will not be in the pool of out-of-wedlock births."

Blue America (WT)

By Fred Barne

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

If Tom Edsall isn't America's greatest political writer, he's close to it. He meets the two tests that matter the most. The first is whether one who analyzes politics is willing to write against preference. Mr. Edsall is, and "Building Red America" is a perfect example. He is a liberal, especially on social and cultural issues, who persuasively chronicles how Republicans have gained the upper hand in politics today and explains why Democrats, even if they defeat Republicans in the midterm elections on Nov. 7, are not poised to become the majority party again anytime soon.

The second test involves whether the political writer can command an audience. Mr. Edsall, who recently left The Washington Post to join the New Republic, can. In his case, anyone with a strong interest in politics is likely to read his pieces regardless of the specific subject matter. They'll do so simply on the basis of the Edsall byline, assuming (as I do) that anything he writes is worth reading.

Mr. Edsall doesn't buy the conventional wisdom of liberal political reporters and commentators, most notably their take on the effect of social issues. Their view is that Republicans do well despite their opposition to abortion, embryonic stem cell research, homosexual rights and racial preferences. His view, slightly oversimplified, is that Republicans win elections because of their social conservatism.

In both 2000 and 2004, President Bush was a beneficiary. He won, Mr. Edsall writes, at least partly as a result of the "the high-risk strategy by the conservative movement and the Republican party of forcing wedge issues, of leveraging every marginal advantage, and of bearing down hard on morality and sex." Emphasizing social issues in 2000, he says, "established a framework for the aggressive use of the issue of gay marriage in 2004."

I'd quibble with the idea that Republicans were "aggressive" in opposing same-sex marriage. True, Mr. Bush endorsed the protection amendment, but he hardly stressed it during the 2004 campaign. He didn't need to. Same-sex marriage was already a prominent enough issue to aid in producing what Mr. Edsall calls at one point "a thin but durable GOP advantage" and at another a Republican "juggernaut."

Mr. Edsall gently but firmly rebuts those who chiefly blame voters for Democratic defeats. Thomas Frank popularized this notion in his book "What's the Matter with Kansas?" Mr. Frank argued that lower-middle-class voters, a natural Democratic constituency, are ignoring their economic interests to vote on the basis of social issues. Mr. Frank recommended that Democrats emphasize economic populism to lure these voters.

But the evidence from recent elections, Mr. Edsall notes, is that populist appeals haven't worked. He cites the presidential campaigns of Al Gore, Howard Dean, John Edwards, Richard Gephardt, Tom Harkin and Jesse Jackson. The common thread: They all lost.

There's also plenty of evidence that Democrats remain oblivious to the harm done them by their failure "to cross a security threshold" and gain credibility on national security. Mr. Edsall knows better. "Because the Democratic party became the party of antiwar activists during the Vietnam war," he writes, "... and because the party became increasingly hostile to defense spending, the security threshold has been a major stumbling block for the party's candidates."

The Republican Party: An Incredible Knack For Winning (CSM)

By Ari Pinkus

The Christian Science Monitor, October 31, 2006

How the GOP turned the art of electioneering into a science.

You could hardly turn on the television or pick up a newspaper in recent weeks without learning about a Republican running for his or her life. Of course, no one knows yet what voters will really do in the privacy of the voting booth next week.

But whatever happens on Election Day, nothing changes the fact that the Republican Party has the upper hand over the Democrats in the mechanics of campaigning: money, message, and organization. Even should the GOP suffer a setback at the polls, these formidable advantages will not disappear anytime soon.

The new book One Party Country: Republican Dominance in the 21st Century examines the nuts-and-bolts of the way Republicans have been building this sturdy foundation aimed at achieving successive election victories.

At a time when Republicans have not articulated a clear strategy in the Iraq war and have bungled the aftermath of hurricane Katrina, "One Party Country" suggests that the immediate priority and long-range plan of the Republican Party is wrapped up in winning elections. With so much of the focus on electoral tactics, the offshoot is that governing the country takes a secondary role.

"One Party Country" does a good job of spelling out the GOP electoral strategy objectively and in detail, and without evidence of partisan leanings.

Written by two investigative reporters for the Los Angeles Times, Tom Hamburger and Peter Wallsten, this book shows the signs of incisive journalistic digging. Early on, a minihistory lesson shows how the Republicans seized the opportunities for electoral success afforded by redistricting, particularly in the South.

More recently, the Republican Party has shown that it is well on its way to flawlessly executing the technique of microtargeting - developing messages and reaching specific individuals who are most likely to vote for a candidate. A new approach to conducting campaigns, it puts the onus on campaign staffs to learn about voters, including those who have not turned out in the past.

The authors extensively discuss the Voter Vault, a database of names, voter registrations, positions on key issues, and marketing information that can help the GOP reach new voters.

With this under-the-radar model, the Republicans would take the Democrats by surprise, the authors say. "It was the political equivalent of stealth technology in air power: Democrats would feel the bombs explode, but they could not see the bombers."

In 2004, the Bush campaign, led by master strategists Karl Rove and Ken Mehlman, spent $120 million in grass-roots politicking.

DOJ_NMG_0089239

It's been successful so far, according to Hamburger and Wallsten. In numerous regions of the country, Republicans are siphoning off votes from several demographic groups that traditionally vote Democratic: Latinos, African-Americans, and Jews.

In the current environment, politics goes beyond targeting blocs of voters right before elections. Republicans frame all issues, including managing governmental regulations, in terms of gaining political advantage. Bush's faith-based initiatives were intended to cultivate support among African-American preachers, and educational reforms have helped him with minority voters.

They also explain the importance of the conservative network's weekly meetings led by Grover Norquist of the Americans for Tax Reform in keeping the two main groups (the fiscal and social conservatives) focused on their common GOP connection.

The reporters were able to get into a few of these private forums where conservatives can promote a message or share disagreements. Mr. Rove explained the Medicare prescription drug plan to this gathering and encouraged them to support it or keep mum if they did not, all for continued electoral success.

Particularly with midterm elections looming, "One Party Country" leaves the reader with fundamental questions: Are the Democrats about to put a halt to Republican dominance? If not, what might US society look like with a one-party system where campaigning is king, and governing an afterthought?

Newspaper Circulations Slide More (WSJ)

By Emily Steel

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

Broad Decline May Hasten Move to Hone Web Focus; New York Tabloids Log Gains

Nearly every major U.S. newspaper suffered circulation declines in the past six months, according to the newspaper industry's twice-yearly report from the Audit Bureau of Circulations, the latest confirmation of the difficulties facing the industry as readers flock to the Web and other outlets for news.

Average daily circulation of the 770 newspapers reporting results to the ABC dropped 2.8% on a year-to-year basis during the six months ended Sept. 30, according to an analysis from the Newspaper Association of America, an industry-trade group. The drop in circulation follows a decline of 2.5% during the reporting period ended March 31 of this year and a 2.6% decline in the year-earlier period. Average Sunday circulation at 619 of the country's newspapers fell 3.4% in the most recent six months, according to the NAA. The circulation figures are preliminary and subject to audit by the ABC.

The circulation report, which comes on the heels of several major publishers reporting weaker ad revenue for the third quarter, is likely to reinforce concerns among investors about the industry's prospects. Those concerns have prompted some investors to push companies such as Tribune Co. to restructure or put themselves on the market.

The weaker circulation numbers may fuel efforts by publishers to adjust their business model to put more emphasis on the Web. Newspaper Web sites increased total audience by an average of 8%, according to an NAA analysis of more than 100 newspapers in the nation's top markets.

Some of the biggest declines occurred among the nation's large metropolitan daily papers, including several that have either changed hands or whose future business model is in doubt.

Tribune's Los Angeles Times posted the biggest percentage decline among the nation's top 25 papers, reporting an 8% six-month drop in total paid circulation to 775,766 compared with a year ago. Tribune's board is exploring a sale of the company, under pressure from shareholders unhappy with the company's stock price. Tribune's other major papers reported slightly smaller six-month declines: Chicago Tribune's circulation fell 1.7% while Newsday was down 5%.

Total paid circulation at the Philadelphia Inquirer, a former McClatchy Co. paper purchased this year from Knight Ridder Inc. and then sold this summer to an investor group led by Brian Tierney, chief executive of Philadelphia Media Holdings LLC, dropped 7.6% to 330,622.

At New York Times Co.'s Boston Globe, circulation dropped 6.7% to 386,415. Speculation about the Globe's future intensified last week after it emerged that former General Electric Co. Chairman Jack Welch had discussed with a group of Bostonians the possibility of launching a bid for the paper. The Times hasn't given any indication of wanting to sell the Globe, saying yesterday it views the paper as an important asset.

National newspapers managed less significant circulation drops. Gannett Co.'s USA Today retained its status as the nation's largest-circulation newspaper with total paid circulation at 2,269,509, down 1.3%. The Wall Street Journal, the nation's second-largest paper, published by Dow Jones & Co., reported a 1.9% decrease in total paid circulation to 2,043,235. The New York Times, the country's third-largest paper, saw its circulation decrease 3.5% to 1,086,798.

Several papers, including the Journal and Los Angeles Times, said "individually paid circulation" -- excluding bulk sales to offices, hotels and other places -- reflects a more accurate picture of circulation for advertisers. Individually paid subscriptions increased 9.2% to 1.428 million at the Journal, compared with last year. Daily individually paid circulation at the Los Angeles Times increased 0.3% to 741,665.

Of the nation's top 10 newspapers, only New York's tabloid rivals -- New York Post and New York Daily News -- reported higher total paid weekday circulation. With a 5.1% increase to 704,011, News Corp.'s New York Post emerged ahead of its rival New York Daily News, which reported a 1% increase to 693,382 in total paid weekday circulation. The New York Post's increase in circulation pushed it ahead of the Washington Post as well and made it the country's fifth-largest daily. The Washington Post's circulation fell 3.3% to 656,297.

The Chicago Sun-Times and Dallas Morning News didn't file data, pending the completion of their next six-month audits.

Newspaper Circulation Falls Sharply (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

The circulation of the nation's daily newspapers plunged during the latest reporting period in one of the sharpest declines in recent history, according to data released yesterday. The slide continues a decades-long trend and adds to the woes of a mature industry already struggling with layoffs and facing the potential sale of some of its flagships.

Over all, average daily circulation dropped by 2.8 percent during the six-month period ended Sept. 30, compared with the period last year, according to an industry analysis of data released by the Audit Bureau of Circulations. Circulation for Sunday papers fell by 3.4 percent.

The figures appear to be the steepest in any comparable six-month period in at least 15 years. They come after the sale of the Knight Ridder newspapers this year and in the midst of a possible sale of the Tribune Company, whose assets include 11 newspapers. The circulation losses also follow recent sour earnings reports, raising questions about why anyone would want to buy a newspaper now.

The losses have accelerated as the industry tries to adjust to the steady migration of readers and advertisers to the Internet. Papers in major metropolitan areas, where more homes are wired for broadband, fared worse than those in smaller markets.

Newspaper executives also attribute some of the decline to deliberate strategies to eliminate so-called bulk sales to third-party sponsors that offer papers free in places like hotels. Advertisers view them as having little value because the readers getting them did not pay for them.

The Los Angeles Times lost 8 percent of its daily circulation and 6 percent on Sunday. The Boston Globe, owned by The New York Times Company, lost 6.7 percent of its daily circulation and almost 10 percent on Sunday.

The New York Times, one of the few big papers where circulation had held steady over the last few reporting periods, lost about 3.5 percent of its circulation both daily and Sunday. The Washington Post's declines were nearly the same. The Wall Street Journal's daily paper fell by less than 2 percent but its Weekend Edition, which comes out on Saturday, reported a 6.7 percent drop.

As of Sept. 30, total circulation for the nation's dailies had dropped to 43.7 million. Daily circulation peaked in 1984, at 63.3 million.

Nonetheless, three billionaires in Los Angeles have said they are interested in buying The Los Angeles Times, which is owned by Tribune. John F. Welch Jr., the former chief executive of General Electric, has mused about buying The Globe, although The New York Times Company has said it is not for sale. And others have expressed interest in papers elsewhere.

Prospective buyers are interested, in part, because despite their problems, newspapers generally still turn a profit and remain attractive to advertisers who want to reach a mass audience. Many papers have higher profit margins than the average Fortune 500 company.

Moreover, many companies see promise in their online publications, which are drawing an increasing number of readers each year. At The New York Times, for example, the number of people who read the paper online now surpasses the number who buy the print edition.

The newspaper association said that for the third quarter of this year, 57 million people visited a newspaper Web site, an increase of 24 percent over the period a year ago. And revenues from online advertisers are growing.

"The fundamentals say to me that there is a future for a well-run newspaper," said Conrad C. Fink, who teaches newspaper management at the University of Georgia. "But short range, it looks dismal and nobody knows exactly what to do about it."

One immediate problem is that although online revenues are growing, they still make up only a small portion of the overall newspaper revenues. And it could take at least two decades for online revenues to equal half of current revenues, Lauren Rich Fine, an analyst with Merrill Lynch, wrote last week.

DOJ_NMG_0089241

Still, there is the vanity aspect of owning a newspaper.

"If you're Jack Welch, you've already made a ton of dough," Mr. Fink said. "You want to buy The Boston Globe because you want a voice at the top."

He also said there was an "element of altruism" by some people, "who believe they can buy these papers and return them to their local roots." But he pointed to the recent acquisition of The Inquirer and The Daily News in Philadelphia by Brian P. Tierney, a local advertising executive, as an example that was "not all that impressive."

The Inquirer lost 7.6 percent of its daily circulation and 4.5 percent on Sunday, according to the new data. Some of the papers owned by McClatchy, which acquired Knight Ridder, also lost circulation in this period: The Star-Tribune in Minneapolis was down more than 4 percent daily and The Sacramento Bee was down more than 5 percent daily.

Nonetheless, Elaine Lintecum, treasurer of McClatchy, said the company was optimistic.

McClatchy's online sites now account for 8 percent of the company's revenue, Ms. Lintecum said. "It's a small portion, but it's growing more in importance each year," she said. "As that transition is taking place, we have to look at our total audience" online and in print.

She also said that like many other publishers, McClatchy was in the process of cutting back on third-party sales, "and until that's weaned out, the circulation numbers won't look so good."

One of the few increases in circulation was scored by The New York Post, which eked past its main rival, The Daily News, by about 10,000 copies and trumpeted the news on a giant billboard in Times Square.

With Tribune On Block, L.A. Times Circulation Down 8% (WP)

By Frank Ahrens

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Drop is Steepest Among Major U.S. Newspapers

The Los Angeles Times lost 8 percent of its daily circulation -- the most of any of the nation's largest newspapers -- over the past six months, potentially lowering its value even as suitors line up to bid on its parent company.

Nationally, newspaper circulation has been sliding since 1987 and the past six months were no exception. Overall circulation was down 2.8 percent from the comparable period last year. But the pain was felt worse in some cities than in others. The smaller-circulation Miami Herald, for example, was down 9 percent for daily and Sunday, while the New York tabloids -- the Post and Daily News -- gained.

The L.A. Times is owned by Chicago-based Tribune Co., which has put itself up for sale as the result of a boardroom war. A minority of board members are unhappy with the company's performance over the past year and think the company would be worth more split up or sold off.

On Friday, two private-equity groups -- Bain Capital of Boston and Thomas H. Lee Partners of Boston combined with Texas Pacific Group of Fort Worth -- met Tribune's deadline for expressing interest in buying the company, said sources with knowledge of the submissions who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the bidding is private. Tribune's market capitalization is $8 billion.

Tribune's sentimental flagship is the Chicago Tribune, but the L.A. Times is its largest newspaper and accounts for about one-quarter of Tribune revenue. The Times has been at the heart of Tribune's cost-cutting efforts in recent months; Chicago executives fired Times publisher Jeffrey M. Johnson this month for refusing to cut more jobs.

The 8 percent drop in circulation was recorded in April through September and left the Times with a daily circulation of 775,766, according to the Audit Bureau of Circulations, which monitors newspaper sales. The Times's Sunday circulation for the period was down 6 percent, to 1.2 million. The Times publisher said the big drop was attributable to low-value circulation -- such as giveaways -- that the paper cut to save money.

Other Tribune papers fared slightly better. Daily circulation at the Chicago Tribune was down 1.7 percent; the Hartford Courant was down 3.9 percent; the Baltimore Sun was down 4.4 percent; and Newsday was down 4.9 percent.

Tribune shares fell 50 cents in morning trading in reaction to the circulation news but mostly recovered during the day, closing down 2 cents at $33.45.

If the Times's circulation slide is the result of readers actively fleeing the paper, the company's value could be reduced as the sale process goes forward, said James C. Goss, an analyst with Barrington Research Associates Inc. of Chicago. That could lead bidders such as Bain and Lee to lowball Tribune, offering less per share to buy the company.

Analysts place Tribune's value at about $35 per share.

But if the 8 percent loss is the result of what Goss called "corporate choice" -- meaning that Tribune allowed low-value circulation to seep away -- that would be seen as smart corporate policy and could raise the value of the company.

However, allowing overall circulation to drop too far can result in lowered ad rates.

DOJ_NMG_0089242

In a written statement, Times publisher David D. Hiller said his paper was focusing on "individually paid circulation," or full-price circulation. In that respect, the Times's circulation was up one-third of 1 percent over the past six months, yesterday's data showed.

Newspapers receive credit for other forms of circulation, such as "third-party sales," when a retailer agrees to buy a large number of newspapers at a reduced rate then give them away as a promotional tool. That kind of Times circulation was down 67 percent, the paper said.

The Washington Post lost 3.3 percent of its daily and 2.6 percent of its Sunday circulation in the same period. The New York Times was down 3.5 percent daily and Sunday. USA Today, the nation's largest newspaper, lost 1.3 percent.

In New York, the tabloid wars have been good for the industry: The New York Post's circulation was up 5 percent, while the Daily News's rose 1 percent.

Cotton-picking Subsidies (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

A CENTURY AND a half ago, the U.S. cotton industry fueled a booming trade in African slaves and indirectly helped spark the Civil War. One big difference between then and now is that although American cotton is still afflicting Africa, now the Africans suffer at home rather than here.

Cotton is a staple crop for many West and Central African countries, where a difference of a few pennies in the price of a pound of fiber can mean the difference between deprivation and relative prosperity. And an explosion of U.S. cotton exports over the last decade, fueled by one of the most obscene corporate welfare programs this country has ever seen, has increasingly helped tip the scales toward deprivation over there.

On Wednesday, trade ministers from four African countries whose economies are being savaged by U.S. cotton subsidies came to Washington to discuss the issue with U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns. They left with little more than vague promises. President Bush, cowed by powerful congressional Republicans from farm states, has done nothing to stop a surge in agricultural subsidies during his administration.

Few U.S. growers would be in the cotton business if not for the roughly $3.5 billion the government shovels their way every year. Much of this money goes to large corporate operations or wealthy families that feel it is their birthright to unfairly rig the global trading game. The payments encourage overproduction and make it almost impossible for African farmers to compete with this nation's subsidized exports.

When other nations try subsidizing industrial exports that compete with our goods, we cry foul, and this incessant hypocrisy contributes to anti-American sentiment in much of the world. The message from Washington to the rest of the world seems to be: We love fair competition and open markets, just as long as we're talking about those products and services we are inherently good or efficient at producing. This doesn't just hurt people overseas. The U.S. government last year spent about $23 billion on farm subsidies. What did taxpayers get for their money? A fat agribusiness industry and inflated land values. The overall farm support program also means U.S. consumers lack access to some lower-priced imports.

Two years ago, the World Trade Organization ruled in favor of Brazil in a case challenging the legality of U.S. cotton subsidies, yet the U.S. continues to flout the ruling. A five-year WTO effort to lower farm supports around the world, in order to address one of globalization's most brazen north-south inequities, collapsed in July. Europe and Japan may be even more culpable on these issues than the United States, but the Bush administration's unwillingness to unilaterally dismantle the cotton program prevented the U.S. from claiming the moral high ground in negotiations — not to mention a much-needed dose of goodwill in the developing world.

The crowning irony is that while the United States spends billions of dollars a year on foreign aid programs for developing nations, it spends even more billions on agricultural subsidies that make it harder for these countries to wean themselves off outside support. Enough already. Key farm legislation, which contained a big increase in subsidies in 2002, expires next year. When it is renegotiated, Bush and Congress need to kill off these subsidy programs that cost the nation billions of dollars, and much more in prestige and credibility around the world.

By Nasser Karimi

AP, October 31, 2006

Iran's firebrand president warned on Monday that his country would respond with an "appropriate and firm response" to any U.N. sanction over its nuclear program.

The comments by Mahmoud Ahmadinejad came as key United Nations Security Council members were considering a draft European resolution that would impose punishing measures on Iran over its disputed nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0089243

"Efforts by the big powers will only incite anger and hatred," the hard-line leader told a large crowd on the outskirts of Tehran.

"The Iranian nation will respond to restrictive activities with an appropriate and firm response," he said without elaborating.

Meanwhile, Mohamed ElBaradei, who heads the International Atomic Energy Agency, said at the U.N. that his organization has not been able to verify that Iran's nuclear program is peaceful.

Tehran insists its nuclear efforts are solely geared at peacefully producing electricity. But the U.S. and its allies fear Iranians want to build atomic weapons.

Russia and China, which wield veto power as permanent Security Council members, have shied away from imposing punitive measures on their trade partner Iran, saying they prefer a diplomatic solution to the impasse. But the United States says the proposed sanctions are not tough enough.

Russian President Vladimir Putin told Ahmadinejad on Monday that Moscow strongly favors further negotiations on Tehran's nuclear program, the Kremlin said.

The brief Russian statement after a telephone conversation between the two leaders was the latest indication that Russia opposes sanctions against Iran and believes the international community should try to defuse tension through talks.

With Iran waving threats of a firm response to any U.N. sanction, it also appeared aimed at cooling Tehran's rhetoric and casting Russia as a peacemaker.

In the Iranian-initiated conversation with Ahmadinejad, "Putin outlined the fundamental position of the Russian side in favor of a continuation of the negotiation process," the Kremlin said.

President Bush insists that Washington will only agree to negotiate about Tehran's nuclear program if the Iranians first halt uranium enrichment, a key step to produce either peaceful nuclear power or an atomic bomb.

With the council divided, Ahmadinejad remained defiant, telling the crowd that Iran would prefer to endure sanctions rather than bow to Western pressure.

"We want to stand on our own feet," he said. "You should know that our nation will not give in one iota in the nuclear case."

He also mocked Britain as a "follower of arrogance," for aligning itself with U.S. foreign policy, days after British Prime Minister Tony Blair called on the Security Council to achieve a "proper, binding resolution" on Iran's nuclear activities.

The British "have simply become the guide for a blind U.S," Ahmadinejad said.

"We do advise Britain not to squirm and not to do childish activities concerning the resolution. Iran's nation has stood up and will not let you achieve anything except humiliation," he added.

His speech was delivered after Iran officially confirmed on Friday that it has doubled its uranium enrichment capacity.

On Monday, ElBaradei said that the IAEA was "unable at this stage to confirm the peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear program which, obviously, is a matter of serious concern."

ElBaradei referred to his earlier report to the Security Council verifying that Iran had ignored the Aug. 31 deadline to halt uranium enrichment.

The U.N. nuclear watchdog had not been able to "make progress resolving the outstanding issues — issues that require certain transparency measures on the part of Iran," ElBaradei said.

The Iranians have insisted on their right to pursue a peaceful atomic energy program as a member of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Iran's deputy U.N. Ambassador Mehdi Danesh-Yazdi criticized the "dangerous trend" where countries outside the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty face no pressure to join and acquire large stockpiles of nuclear weapons. He singled out Israel, accusing it of leading "a masquerade of lies and deception against Iran's peaceful nuclear program."

Iran wants all nuclear weapons eliminated but in the interim the international community should take "all necessary steps to ensure universality of the non-proliferation regime," he told the U.N. General Assembly.

At the same time, Danesh-Yazdi said, Iran has a right under the NPT to nuclear technology and is ready to resume negotiations with the six key powers that proposed a package of incentives to assure them of the peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear program. But he made no mention of suspending uranium enrichment — a key demand of Britain, France, Germany, the U.S., Russia and China for resuming negotiations.

Giving Iran The Bomb (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

Does the Bush administration seriously mean to give Iran a nuclear bomb? Look carefully at the confidential text of a forthcoming U.N. Security Council resolution, and the answer, it would seem, is yes.

DOJ_NMG_0089244

This is a Halloween column, but it is not a prank. Through diplomatic efforts spearheaded by Undersecretary of State Nick Burns, the administration is prepared to endorse a European draft of a U.N. resolution that imposes limited sanctions on the Islamic Republic for flouting its Aug. 31 deadline to stop enriching uranium. The chances the resolution will soon be voted and agreed on increased with last week's news that Iran has again enriched uranium using a second "cascade" of 160 or so centrifuges. Iran plans to operate 3,000 such centrifuges -- which can spin uranium hexafluoride to either reactor- or weapons-grade levels -- by March of next year.

In an interview last month with this newspaper, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice allowed that while a sanctions resolution would not satisfy the U.S. on every point, it would usefully ratchet up the pressure on Tehran and pave the way, if necessary, for tougher Security Council action later on. On its face, the current draft of the resolution does just that. After noting that the International Atomic Energy Agency "is unable to conclude that there are no undeclared nuclear materials or activities in Iran," the resolution forbids the sale or transfer of "all items, materials, equipment, goods and technology which could contribute to Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs." It also freezes the financial assets of everyone and everything known to be involved in those programs.

But then we come to the Bushehr exception, so broad the Iranians could drive a truck through it -- or, to be more precise, a truck carrying 330 kilograms of reactor-grade plutonium. That's enough to make about 55 Nagasaki-type atomic bombs.

Bushehr is a light-water nuclear reactor that Russia began building for Iran in the mid-1990s over the objections of the Clinton administration. Ten years on, the billion-dollar facility is nearly complete: All that remains to make it operable is reactor-grade uranium, which Moscow promises to supply by next October. In a sop to the Russians, the draft resolution specifies that the prohibition on technology transfers to Iran "shall not apply to supplies of items, materials, equipment, goods and technology, nor to the provision of technical assistance or training, financial assistance, investment, brokering or other services . . . related to the construction of Bushehr I."

For years it was widely believed that a light-water reactor could not be used -- at least not covertly -- to generate weapons-grade uranium or plutonium. It was for this reason that President Clinton agreed to supply two such reactors in 1994 to North Korea in exchange for freezing the reactor at Yongbyong, which lent itself more easily to nuclear-weapons production.

But as Henry Sokolski of the Washington-based Nonproliferation Education Center explains in a phone interview, the problem with that view is that it is at least 30 years out of date. Iran could secretly remove fuel rods of lightly enriched uranium pellets from Bushehr by substituting dummy rods, something the IAEA would be unlikely to notice using current inspection practices. It could then use its 3,000 centrifuges to enrich the uranium to weapons-grade levels in as little as five weeks.

That's not all. After a year's operation the Bushehr reactor would produce the previously mentioned 330 kilograms of plutonium in the form of spent fuel. That plutonium could be reprocessed at small and dispersed facilities, completely hidden from the IAEA's view. And unlike uranium, reactor-grade plutonium is only slightly less serviceable than the weapons-grade stuff when it comes to building a bomb. "It would take as little as 10 days of operation to get the first significant quantity [of plutonium] and then you could get a bomb's worth every day," says Mr. Sokolski. "You're talking about weeks, not months."

This means we need to radically revise our estimates of how soon the Islamic Republic will have all the ingredients and know-how it needs to build a bomb. National Intelligence Director John Negroponte speculated in June that Iran would be there sometime between 2010 and 2015 -- long after President Bush and presumably Mr. Negroponte are out of office. But as Mr. Sokolski notes, once Bushehr is operational, Iran could go nuclear "before the end of next year." We know that Iran already possesses a design for a functional weapon, probably courtesy of the A.Q. Khan proliferation network.

Proponents of the draft resolution argue that the Bushehr exemption is the only way the Russians will agree to any sanctions, and that an incremental resolution is better than none. This argument is questionable on three counts. Why would the Russians oppose the completion of Bushehr next year when they refuse to do so today? Why should the international community allow Iran to get a reactor when it is already in material breach of the safeguards agreement of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty?

Finally, why should the U.S. hand Moscow a bargaining chip for its broader strategic ambitions, which are increasingly antithetical to America's? Imagine if Vladimir Putin demanded that the U.S. abandon its support for the embattled Republic of Georgia in exchange for his compliance on the Iranian issue. Is that a trade-off George W. Bush would be willing to accept?

Tehran has grown shrill in its warnings that there will be "repercussions" if any step is taken to halt its nuclear programs. Whatever. It's time the Bush administration called Iran's bluff, and regained its nerve, by taking effective action in the face of the present danger. The Kabuki dance now being played out at Turtle Bay is not that.

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089245

ABOARD THE OIL TANKER BRAMBLELEAF, in the Persian Gulf, Oct. 30 — More than two dozen countries, including three gulf states, practiced intercepting and searching vessels suspected of trafficking in unconventional weapons in major military maneuvers on Monday that emphasized their coordination and willingness to aggressively block the spread of arms.

The daylong exercise, about 20 miles outside Iranian territorial waters, seemed to signal to Iran, too, that a coalition of Western powers and neighboring states was intent on denying it access to nuclear, chemical and biological weapons, even on its doorstep.

"The message is clear," said William T. Munroe, the American ambassador to Bahrain. "Responsible countries of the world will not stand aside as proliferators circumvent their international obligations. Responsible countries will not hesitate to deny proliferators a safe haven."

American officials insist that the training exercise, planned since January, was not related to tensions over Iran's uranium enrichment activities. Iran said Friday that it had stepped up enrichment in defiance of a Security Council demand to suspend such work.

"This is ultimately important because of where it's happening, when it's happening and why it's happening," said a diplomat observing the exercise, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment. "Iran and Korea are two main targets, but there are many others of interest to this effort."

Iran warned the exercise's participants on Monday against acts that could destabilize the region. Military officials taking part in the exercise said that Iranian patrol boats came close to coalition ships in recent days, inspecting their activities and positions.

"We do not consider this exercise appropriate," Muhammad Ali Husseini, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, told reporters on Sunday. United States actions in the region "go in the direction of more adventurism, not of stability and security," he said.

Instead, Iran has proposed that Persian Gulf states form a group, excluding the United States, to maintain security in the region.

The exercise on Monday was the first training maneuver in the Persian Gulf under the Proliferation Security Initiative, an American-led effort that seeks to coordinate and develop procedures for intercepting smugglers of unconventional weapons.

It was also notable for the involvement of Bahrain, and support by Qatar and the United Arab Emirates, which sent observers.

The operation began last week with war games to practice intelligence cooperation, then moved to the exercise at sea, which included Australian, British, French and Italian warships and three Bahraini frigates.

Sailors from the Italian and Bahraini Navies swooped onto the British oil tanker Brambleleaf in the choppy Persian Gulf waters, their machine guns waving in a scene that was half show, half test. Each team combed the ship's hold for almost two hours until they found a hidden simulated nuclear detonator.

Absent, however, were Saudi Arabia, a power in the Persian Gulf, and China. Officials involved in the Proliferation Security Initiative said that many states that had not signed on were largely concerned about legal aspects of the initiative.

Technically, teams conducting searches under the initiatives can board a ship only if given clearance by its owners or crew. Ships with no flag can be boarded at will. Organizers of the maneuvers said they hoped the exercise would convince those still on the fence of the legality of the initiative.

The initiative, first proposed by President Bush in May 2003, has held 24 other training exercises in Europe and Asia in the last three years.

Bush Opposes Nukes For Allies (AP)

AP, October 31, 2006

President Bush said Monday he would oppose helping Japan, South Korea and Taiwan develop nuclear weapons to guard against any threat from a nuclear-armed North Korea.

"I think the less nuclear armament in the Far East, the better off the world will be," the president said in an interview.

Bush said the United States should work closely with its allies in Asia on a missile defense system. "Our missile defense systems are getting better and better because of the money that we have been spending over the past five years," he said.

The president said the U.S. has convinced its partners in talks with North Korea that Pyongyang should not have nuclear arms. "The problem is, it's a little frustrating for people; diplomacy is a little frustrating for people because things don't happen overnight.

"So, it's a constant effort to keep people bound together and the best way to do it is to remind them of what the dangers will be to the stability in the Far East if there is either a nuclear arms race, or somebody, you know, uses a nuclear weapon."

Nuclear tensions in Asia were heightened by North Korea's underground nuclear test Oct. 9.

The U.N. Security Council unanimously adopted a resolution sanctioning the North for its test, but South Korea — a major aid provider to the impoverished North — has been reluctant to adopt stern measures against its volatile neighbor.

More N. Korea Nuke Tests Said Expected (AP)

By Burt Herman
AP, October 31, 2006

The top U.S. general in South Korea said Monday that more nuclear tests can be expected by North Korea as it develops its atomic weapons program, and stressed that U.S. and South Korean forces could deter any aggression.

U.S. Army General B.B. Bell didn't cite specific intelligence that another test was imminent, but said that could be expected in the future as part of North Korea's weapons program.

"I can only surmise that since they tested one, we would see at some time in the future yet another test of a nuclear device," Bell told a news conference, adding that missiles and other weapons also could be tested.

A South Korean newspaper reported that the North fired five short-range missiles during military training last week.

North Korea fired the ground-to-air and air-to-air missiles, with ranges from 6 miles to 30 miles, as part of an annual training session, the Chosun Ilbo newspaper reported, citing an unidentified South Korean government official.

The North fired a series of longer-range missiles in July, including an intercontinental ballistic missile that many believe could potentially hit the United States.

Bell said that the U.S. and South Korean allied forces could deter aggression from the North and defeat any possible attack. He argued that the North's confirmed nuclear capability since its Oct. 9 nuclear test didn't change the balance of force in the region, because intelligence agencies had believed for several years that Pyongyang had atomic weapons.

He called for a diplomatic solution to the standoff.

"I wish that North Korea would not only stop testing these devices, but stop making them and come back to the bargaining table," he said.

Bell added that the U.S. "nuclear umbrella" continues to protect the South as part of the two countries' security cooperation.

In a commentary in its main Rodong Sinmun newspaper, North Korea said the United States' nuclear weapons won't be able to protect the South but "will be a source of disaster and trouble bringing the holocaust of nuclear war."

The U.S. and South Korea have been negotiating to transfer wartime command of forces on the peninsula as part of Seoul's efforts to assume more responsibility for its own defense.

South Korea transferred control of its forces to a U.S.-led United Nations command during the 1950-1953 Korean War. Peacetime control of the Korean military was given to the South Koreans in 1994, but the United States retained control should war break out again.

At negotiations earlier this month in Washington, both sides agreed the South would assume wartime command of its own forces sometime between 2009 and 2012.

Bell said details will be decided in the first half of next year, adding that the change could take place within three years, in the earlier part of the agreed time span.

Critics of the transfer deal have said the South lacks intelligence and aerial support capabilities it needs to assume the new role.

Bell said that as the transition occurs the U.S. would provide "bridging" capabilities to help the South in areas where it is still developing its defenses — stressing that fighting capability would in no way be diminished.

He said the United States would remain in South Korea as long as it was "welcome and wanted."

Recent comments by the South's presidential security adviser that have been perceived as anti-American have reportedly drawn criticism from U.S. officials. But Bell said the "vast majority" of South Koreans supported the country's alliance with the United States.

About 29,500 U.S. troops remain in the South, a remnant of the Korean War, which ended in a cease-fire that persists to this day. Their numbers are set to decline by several thousand in coming years.

U.S. General Denies Any Plans For Attack (WT)

By Andrew Salmon
The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

SEOUL -- The commander of U.S. forces in South Korea said yesterday he "certainly" expects another North Korean nuclear test, but dismissed reports that his forces were preparing a pre-emptive strike on the North.

DOJ_NMG_0089247

"I can only surmise that since they tested one, they will test another," Gen. Burwell B. Bell said of North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test during a press conference at Seoul's Yongsan Garrison. "But I won't speculate as to when."

The Washington Times last week quoted nuclear experts including David Albright, a former inspector for the International Atomic Energy Agency, saying technical problems encountered by the North in its first test could likely be worked out within a few months.

Gen. Bell also addressed a published report last week that said U.S. and South Korean forces were planning a pre-emptive strike against North Korea.

His forces are "not in the business of developing pre-emptive strike plans," he said, explaining that the U.S. deployment on the Korea Peninsula is defensive in nature. South Korean government sources also denied the report.

Although some observers worry that the North's nuclear test shifted the balance of power on the peninsula -- an opposition assemblyman, for example, has said the South's armored forces are incapable of operating in a nuclear environment -- Gen. Bell adamantly rejected the argument.

The United States has acted under a mutual defense treaty to extend its "nuclear umbrella" to cover South Korea, he said, while allied forces continue to "overmatch" North Korea in conventional weapons.

The general said Washington remains committed to its half-century alliance with Seoul for as long as the U.S. forces are "welcome and wanted in this country."

There has been fierce debate in South Korea about the presence of U.S. troops, particularly since two schoolgirls were killed in a traffic accident involving U.S. soldiers in 2002.

Conservatives contend that pro-North Korean agitators have been behind anti-American movements in recent years, and over the weekend five persons -- including the deputy secretary-general of the minority Democratic Labor Party and a former student activist -- were arrested on suspicion of spying for North Korea.

Gen. Bell affirmed that the wartime command of South Korean forces will be transferred from American to Korean commanders between 2009 and 2012, and predicted a timetable would be announced in the first half of 2007.

He said the United States would extend "bridging capabilities" to make sure there was no gap in command, and warned that precise timing was essential. "We cannot have any doubt of who is in charge," he said.

He added that U.S. forces in Korea were now "air- and naval-centric" with South Korean forces making up the bulk of land forces. The infantry component of the U.S. contingent has been steadily reduced in recent years.

China Cited As N. Korea Supplier (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

China helped North Korea develop nuclear weapons and in the past year increased its support to Pyongyang, rather than pressing the regime to halt nuclear arms and missile activities, according to a congressional report.

The final draft report of the U.S.-China Economic Security Review Commission also says that Chinese government-run companies are continuing to threaten U.S. national security by exporting arms to American enemies in Asia and the Middle East.

The report is based on public testimony and highly classified intelligence reports made available to its members and staff. It indirectly criticizes the Bush administration for failing to pressure Beijing into joining U.S.-led anti-proliferation programs and calls for Congress to take action to force the administration to do more.

"China has contributed at least indirectly to North Korea's nuclear program," the report stated, noting that China was a "primary supplier" to Pakistan's nuclear-arms program.

A copy of the commission's final draft report, due to be released formally next month, was made available to The Washington Times by congressional aides. Congress created the bipartisan commission of outside experts in 2000 to analyze the impact of U.S.-China relations on security and the economy.

North Korea was a recipient of nuclear goods supplied by the covert Pakistani nuclear supplier network headed by Pakistani scientist A.Q. Khan, according to the group's fourth annual report. Several links between Pakistan and North Korea's arms programs have been identified, it stated.

The unclassified version of the report does not include details of the Chinese support but notes that China has "a history" of helping North Korea develop its weapons.

According to U.S. intelligence officials, North Korean front companies operate freely in China and have used China as a transit point for trade in missile and nuclear components.

One North Korean nuclear procurement agent was identified by U.S. officials in 2002 as Yun Ho-jin, who while working in Shenyang, China, sought to buy metal rods with nuclear applications in Germany while posing as an official of the Chinese aircraft manufacturer Shenyang Aircraft Corp.

DOJ_NMG_0089248

Also, Chinese language documents on how to design a small nuclear warhead for a missile were discovered by U.S. intelligence officials in Libya after Tripoli agreed to dismantle its nuclear program.

China's government has not explained how the warhead documents reached Libya. U.S. officials think the warhead documents likely were sold by the Khan network and were also supplied to Iran and North Korea.

On China's failure to pressure North Korea, the commission report said that China has refused to exert economic pressure and "instead has actually increased its assistance and trade with North Korea."

Disclosure of the report comes as China last week refused to join the U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative (PSI), which the Bush administration hopes to use in enforcing U.N. Security Council resolutions aimed at halting North Korean trade in illicit arms-related goods.

The Chinese turned down an appeal from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice during her recent visit to Beijing to join PSI. The refusal raises questions about whether China will cooperate in a United Nations embargo against weapons and technology going in and out of North Korea.

Administration officials have praised China for supporting U.S. efforts to curb North Korea's arms programs. However, the report makes clear that Chinese cooperation is limited.

On China's role in arms proliferation, the report stated that Chinese companies and government organizations "continue to provide weapons, weapons components and weapons technology" in violation of China's commitments to international nonproliferation agreements.

The arms transfers "harm regional security in East Asia and the Middle East," the report said.

"Given strong U.S. interests in both regions, China's proliferation threatens U.S. security and potentially could place at risk U.S. troops operating in those regions," the report said.

The report also raises questions about whether China is willing to play a responsible role in working for global peace and stability. Beijing's support for World Trade Organization commitments is "spotty and halting," it said.

"And China's apparent willingness to value its own energy needs above the needs of international security is indicative of a nation as yet unprepared or unwilling to shoulder the burdens of a stakeholder state," it said.

The report recommends that Congress take steps to pressure China into joining the PSI, and calls on Congress to press President Bush to force China to carry out both sea and land inspections of weapons related goods going in and out of North Korea under U.N. Security Council Resolution 1718.

The report recommends tightening sanctions on Chinese companies engaged in illicit arms sales, and says Congress should also require the president to provide regular reports identifying what actions China has taken to curb North Korean and Iranian nuclear activities.

China May Be Using Oil To Press North Korea (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 30 — China cut off oil exports to North Korea in September during heightened tension over North Korea's nuclear and missile programs, Chinese trade statistics show.

The unusual move — the figures show China sold no crude oil at all to its neighbor in September — reduced sales for the year by about 7 percent from the similar period in 2005. China's oil exports to North Korea, though uneven, had been averaging about 12,300 barrels a day.

North Korea depends on China for up to 90 percent of its oil supplies, much of which is sold on credit or for bartered goods, according to Chinese energy experts. Any sustained reduction could cripple its isolated and struggling economy.

There is no clear indication that the September figures represent a policy shift by China on providing vital food and fuel supplies to its neighbor and ally in the Korean War. North Korea conducted a nuclear test on Oct. 9, after the period covered by the latest customs data.

But North Korea tested ballistic missiles in July, defying sharp warnings from Beijing. China supported a United Nations resolution condemning the missile tests, and urged that North Korea not take any steps that might "worsen tensions."

China did not announce a reduction in oil exports. The figures were released normally by the customs administration, and the drop in supplies was first reported by [a news wire].

It remains possible the statistics are an anomaly or that supplies were cut because North Korea did not need more oil in September. Officials at the China National Petroleum Corporation, which sells oil and manages an oil pipeline to North Korea, declined to comment.

But several analysts said the reduction suggested that Beijing was using crude oil as leverage to press North Korea to resume negotiations over its nuclear program.

"It is a sharp and sudden reduction at a sensitive time, so political considerations cannot be ruled out," said He Jun, a Beijing-based energy expert and consultant. "China could be sending a clear signal."

If that analysis is correct, it suggests that Beijing may seek to punish North Korea in a variety of ways, both open and unspoken, in the aftermath of its nuclear test.

Although China has long protected North Korea against outside pressure, analysts said the nuclear test surprised and angered the Chinese leadership. Many here considered North Korea's nuclear technology primitive and argued that the country was using the threat of developing atomic bombs as an economic bargaining chip.

China took the unusual step of supporting United Nations sanctions on North Korea after the test. The sanctions restrict sales of military equipment to the North and allow inspections of North Korean cargo.

Both China and South Korea, North Korea's main trading partners, have opposed restrictions on economic ties. They have interpreted the United Nations sanctions narrowly and declined to intercept North Korea cargo at sea, as the Bush administration suggested might be necessary to prevent exports of nuclear material.

But last spring Beijing followed Washington's lead in freezing North Korean assets that the Treasury Department identified as connected to money laundering, according to Bush administration officials. Chinese officials never announced that they had done so, suggesting that they take some tough actions quietly.

Chinese experts on North Korea who took part in discussions of the nuclear issue this month said officials had discussed reducing oil shipments if North Korea continued to defy the outside world. Beijing's response would be especially sharp if North Korea conducted more nuclear tests or declined to resume negotiations about dismantling its nuclear program, these experts said.

If Beijing was already using oil to warn North Korea in September, its response to the October test could be more severe.

"I doubt you would see them cutting down on grain shipments, because that affects directly the lives of North Korea's people," said Han Xiaoping, who follows China's energy industry for the Beijing Qunying Enterprise Company. "My own feeling is that North Korea cannot expect normal supplies of crude in this environment."

China's crude oil exports, once robust, have fallen sharply in recent years, as it uses more domestic oil to power its surging economy. Beijing has already become the world's second largest oil importer after the United States, but still exports a small part of what it produces.

North Korea has remained a consistent customer even as China has stopped selling oil to some other countries. Volumes of oil shipped to the North varied in the past year from as low as 7,400 barrels a day to as high as 24,600.

The exception this year and last was February, when China celebrated its extended lunar New Year holiday. North Korea and other customers, including Japan, Malaysia, Thailand and Australia, got no Chinese oil supplies during that month in either year, customs figures show.

In September, China exported 125,185 tons of crude, the equivalent of 30,780 barrels a day, for a reported value of $62 million. All of that was exported to the United States, with North Korea receiving nothing.

For the first nine months of 2006, China exported 370,000 tons of crude to North Korea, valued by customs data at $176 million. That represented a 7 percent decline in volume but a 21 percent increase in value, according to the export prices recorded by Chinese customs.

Oil industry experts say the published price for the oil does not reflect discounts that China offers.

Meeting Held On Stopping Nuke Terrorism (AP)

By John Thorne

AP, October 31, 2006

The world's five leading nuclear powers and seven other nations kicked off a new program Monday aimed at keeping nuclear weapons beyond the reach of terrorists.

Amid the global concerns over North Korea's test of an atomic bomb and suspicions Iran is trying to develop such weapons, delegations from the United States and the other states said it was paramount for the world to guard against terrorist groups joining the hunt.

"The concern is fundamental — we must stop terrorists from acquiring" nuclear weapons, said Robert Joseph, U.S. undersecretary of state for arms control and international security.

The world's five leading nuclear powers — the United States, Russia, China, Britain and France — form the core of the new Global Initiative to Combat Nuclear Terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0089250

Those five plus Italy, Japan, Canada, China, Turkey, Kazakhstan, Australia and Morocco signed two agreements on common principles and "terms of reference" that were not immediately made public after the start of the two-day meeting in Rabat.

The initiative aims to provide guidelines for keeping track of radioactive materials, ensuring the safety of nuclear facilities, and combating illicit trafficking that could deliver nuclear materials into the hands of terrorists.

While Russia and the United States have been at odds on how to rein in Iran's suspect nuclear program, the two countries combined to provide the impetus for this international effort to keep atomic arms from terrorist groups.

They hope the initiative will lead to better security for the world's nuclear materials and knowledge.

"It's about galvanizing the elements in the world to protect ... people from one of the most dangerous threats we face," Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Sergei Kislyak said.

"We do agree on some things. We have disagreements and nuances on others," he added, referring to the United States and dealing with North Korea and Iran. "I think we will work together, but we might disagree on the technique."

A senior Western diplomat said the meeting was an important sign of cooperation between Americans and Russians in an area where they haven't always seen eye-to-eye, particularly over whether to impose sanctions on Iran.

The U.S. and its allies are seeking to force the Iranians to halt uranium enrichment, which can produce material for fueling nuclear reactors but also for nuclear warheads.

Russia and China, which have economic links to Iran, have shied away from imposing punitive measures. Iran insists its nuclear effort is solely aimed at using reactors to generate electricity.

The diplomat, who agreed to discuss the meeting only on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity, said the initiative's sponsors hope to prevent nuclear terrorism by doing more to curtail terrorist financing and improving safeguards for radioactive materials, from naturally occurring sources to hospital equipment.

President Bush and his Russian counterpart, Vladimir Putin, announced the initiative July 15 at the Group of Eight summit in St. Petersburg, Russia.

In a statement, the two leaders urged like-minded countries to expand joint efforts to "combat nuclear terrorism on a determined and systematic basis."

Bolton Faults Syria, Iran On Lebanon (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, October 31, 2006

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton accused Syria and Iran on Monday of trying to destabilize Lebanon's democratically elected government by violating a U.N. arms embargo.

Bolton stressed that Syria's obligations to respect a U.N. arms embargo authorized by the Security Council resolution that ended the 34-day Israeli-Hezbollah conflict in August "are particularly important as it is the one country other than Israel that borders Lebanon."

Syria and Iran are supporters of Hezbollah, providing weaponry, training and funding to the group.

He called on Syrian President Bashar Assad to abide by the commitment he made to Secretary-General Kofi Annan to support the resolution and the arms embargo.

In a speech to the U.N. Security Council, Bolton welcomed the Lebanese government's extension of its authority throughout the south of the country for the first time in almost 40 years and its deployment along the eastern part of the U.N.-drawn boundary with Israel and the border with Syria.

"Despite this advance, we continue to be concerned that Syria and Iran are actively trying to destabilize the democratically elected government of Lebanon ...," he said. "We call on Syria and Iran to abide by their obligations to respect Lebanon's sovereignty, territorial integrity, unity and political independence."

Syria's U.N. Ambassador Bashar Ja'afari told reporters his country was fully complying with the arms embargo and all U.N. resolutions. The Lebanese defense and foreign ministers and a Lebanese intelligence chief had denied reports of Syrian violations, he told Al-Arabiya television.

The spokesman for Iran's U.N. Mission was unavailable for comment.

But Terje Roed-Larsen, the top U.N. envoy for Syria-Lebanon issues, said representatives of the Lebanese government "have stated publicly and also in conversations with us that there has been arms coming across the border into Lebanon."

The U.N. has not received any information on quantities and types of weapons or where they come from, however.

Bolton said Roed Larsen told the U.N. Security Council "that the government was afraid to be specific about these arms coming across the Syrian-Lebanese border because of the fear of retaliation."

DOJ_NMG_0089251

Roed-Larsen, when asked about Bolton's comments, said he had no specific information about threats of retaliation. But he said there had been 14 assassinations and assassination attempts in Lebanon since the February 2005 killing of former prime minister Rafik Hariri in Beirut.

Israel has said enforcement of the arms embargo, which blocks any entity in Lebanon except the national government from obtaining weapons from abroad, is crucial.

Bolton's made his remarks to the closed-door council meeting on implementation of Resolution 1559, which was adopted in September 2004 and called for the extension of Lebanese authority throughout the south and the disarming of all militias in the country.

The Security Council said in a presidential statement at the end of the meeting that "important progress" has been made toward the implementation of the resolution, particularly through the deployment of the Lebanese army in the south.

But the council also noted that some provisions of the resolution have yet to be implemented, namely the disbanding of militias, strict respect for Lebanon's "sovereignty, territorial integrity, unity and political independence," and free and fair presidential elections "without any foreign interference and influence."

In his report to the council earlier this month on implementation of 1559, Annan said Lebanon should seize the opportunity resulting from the end of the Israel-Hezbollah conflict by establishing diplomatic relations with Syria and resolving the dispute over Chebaa Farms, a plot of land along its border with Israel and Syria.

Syrian troops only withdrew from Lebanese territory the assassination of Hariri, a longtime opponent of Syria, provoked an outcry that eventually forced Syria to relent.

Chebaa Farms was captured by Israel when its forces seized Syria's Golan Heights in the 1967 Middle East war.

The United Nations determined that the area is Syrian, and that Syria and Israel should negotiate its fate. But Lebanon claims the Chebaa Farms — a claim backed by Syria — and Hezbollah continues to fight over the disputed land, arguing that Israel's occupation justifies its "resistance."

Roed Larsen called the issue "very complex," saying U.N. cartographers are working "full speed" to analyze what the territory encompasses.

Olmert Says Israel May Widen Military Role In Gaza (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 30 — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel said Monday that the Israeli military might expand operations in the Gaza Strip in an attempt to halt Palestinian rocket fire, but that there was no intention to reoccupy the territory.

His comments came on another day of turmoil, in which Palestinian gunmen kidnapped a Spanish aid worker in southern Gaza and held him for several hours before releasing him, and a Palestinian militant was killed in northern Gaza in disputed circumstances.

In a closed session with a parliamentary committee, Mr. Olmert was asked about the military's plans for Gaza. Israeli forces, which re-entered the territory in late June after an Israeli soldier was seized, have been clashing with Palestinian militants almost daily. Several Israeli political and military officials have hinted recently that a larger operation could be coming.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Olmert, Miri Eisin, who was at the parliamentary session, quoted the prime minister as saying: "We aren't going to reoccupy Gaza. But we will continue to fight terror, and there may be a change in the level of forces there at any given time."

Mr. Olmert also said the military killed about 300 armed Palestinians in the past four months, according to Ms. Eisin. Monitoring groups have said that more than 250 Palestinians were killed during this time, about half militants and half civilians. Two Israeli soldiers were killed in the fighting.

In Gaza City, Ismail Haniya, the Palestinian Authority prime minister, said, "We call on the international community to intervene immediately to halt the Israeli aggression."

On Monday, Mazen Abu Oudah, 20, a member of Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, was killed by Israeli fire near the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanun, according to Palestinian medical workers. However, the Israeli military said it had not been involved in any shooting in the area.

Also, Palestinians fired two rockets into southern Israel on Monday, Israeli officials said, but they caused no damage or injuries.

Palestinian gunmen kidnapped Roberto Vila, 34, a Spaniard who works for a Spanish aid group, according to Palestinian security officials and news media reports. He was freed unharmed late Monday night, according to Palestinian television.

In Israeli politics, Mr. Olmert's cabinet and the Parliament approved the inclusion of Israel Beiteinu, a far-right party, in the governing coalition. Mr. Olmert's coalition now controls 78 of the 120 seats in Parliament, and the increased majority is intended to make the government more stable.

However, with parties from the right, left and center, as well as a religious party, the coalition is so broad that the factions have little common ground on many issues, such as how to deal with the Palestinians.

Ophir Pines-Paz, the minister of science, culture and sports, who is from the left-leaning Labor Party, voted against including the new faction and announced that he was resigning as a cabinet minister.

Mideast Governments Watching U.S. Vote (AP)

By Robert H. Reid

AP, October 30, 2006

Arab governments are looking for change in U.S. policy in the Middle East after the midterm elections, hoping a politically weakened President Bush will talk with Iran and Syria, show greater interest in the Palestinians and find a way out of the crisis in Iraq.

Israel too is watching for any sign of change in U.S. strategy — especially toward the Palestinians, Syria and Iran.

"The whole region is volatile and it cannot face more problems and challenges," Arab League official Hesham Youssef said in a recent interview. "They cannot leave it like this, neither in Iraq nor in Gaza nor in Lebanon. More conflicts could be ahead."

The Bush administration came into office in 2001 committed to reshaping the political map of the Middle East, which was suffering from authoritarian regimes, Islamic extremism, the conflict with Israel and sluggish economies.

Bush has spoken repeatedly of his dream of creating a new Middle East. But five years later, most analysts believe few things have improved. And, U.S. influence in the region is at a low point, in part because despite Saddam Hussein's overthrow, Iraq has never stabilized.

A June poll by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press found that less than one-third of the people in Egypt, Jordan, Pakistan and Turkey had a favorable view of the United States.

"Virtually everything is worse than it was five years ago," said Jon Alterman, a Middle East analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "Iraq is worse, the Palestinian issue is worse, Iran is worse."

Many Arabs blame on the Bush administration, citing the war in Iraq especially, but also unqualified support for Israel in the battle against Hezbollah in Lebanon and inattention to the Palestinians.

Democracy efforts have stalled. Non-democratic but pro-U.S. governments in Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan now largely shrug off the administration's campaign for strong steps toward democracy.

The victory by the Islamic militant Hamas group in Palestinian elections last January gave a boost to arguments that stability was more important than democracy. And the biggest democratic experiment of all — Iraq — has degenerated into a vicious sectarian war.

"If the U.S. is going to help itself, its policy needs to change in the Middle East," the Saudi ambassador to the U.S., Turki al-Faisal, said Monday in Washington. He urged the U.S. to start by pressing Israel to relinquish all occupied Arab land — and Jerusalem — to the Palestinians.

Many Arab officials question, however, whether the Democrats have better answers to the region's problems. They consider the Democrats traditionally more supportive of Israel than the GOP is. Even as they eye the possible political upheaval in the United States, Arab countries like Egypt and Saudi Arabia are maintaining close ties to the Bush administration.

"At the level of those who follow politics closely, there is fear that if the Democrats win, there will be an imbalance in foreign policy," said Kuwaiti analyst Ayed al-Mannah. "Support for moderate forces and governments ... will be weakened."

Still, the belief is that heavy Republican losses in the House and Senate will force the administration into a major re-evaluation of policy, especially over Iraq. To that end, Arab governments are looking to the forthcoming recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group as a catalyst.

After the elections, the group headed by former Secretary of State James Baker, a Republican, and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, a Democrat, plans to announce recommendations on Iraq.

It's unclear what the group will recommend, but Baker has publicly questioned the administration's policy of not talking to Iran or Syria. Both countries have influence with Iraqi armed groups.

Contacts with Syria would have to be done carefully to avoid undercutting the fragile government in neighboring Lebanon, which fears Syrian influence, or Saudi Arabia, with whom Damascus' relations are frosty.

Saudi Arabia "has no problem with contact if it's going to lead somewhere" an Arab diplomat familiar with the kingdom said. But indications at the moment are that contacts with Damascus would not produce results, said the diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to speak for the kingdom.

DOJ_NMG_0089253

It remains unclear if the Bush administration would be willing to engage in talks on a range of issues with Iran and Syria. And contacts alone are unlikely to produce quick results. The United States has no diplomatic relations with Iran, which turned down U.S. offers for talks on Iraq this year.

The Iranians would doubtless seek U.S. acceptance of their nuclear program, which they say is for peaceful purposes — something the United States is highly unlikely to do because it suspects Iran wants an atomic bomb.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad alluded to this in a speech Monday, telling the Americans "you need someone to save you from the sadness of the Iraqi quagmire and then you threaten us" with sanctions.

Syria would likely press for an end to the investigation into the assassination of a former Lebanese prime minister and a tacit U.S. acceptance of Syrian influence in Lebanon — a move that could undermine pro-democracy forces in Lebanon.

Syria and Iran also hold the key to the Palestinian issue — more so even than in the past. Both countries are believed to be blocking efforts to replace the Hamas-led government in Gaza with technocrats — a step many feel is necessary before any peace moves could happen.

Traditionally, the Americans have worked with their moderate Arab allies, Egypt and Jordan, to influence the Palestinians. But Jordan never had influence with Hamas and some fear Egypt's influence with the militant group is now low — creating the push to talk directly with Syria and Iran.

"No quick or easy fixes exist to solve the problems of this critical region," Richard Haass of the Council on Foreign Relations wrote in The Financial Times. "The Middle East will remain a troubled and troubling part of the world for decades to come."

US Must Press Israel: Saudi Ambassador (AFP)

AFP, October 31, 2006

Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the United States firmly urged the Bush administration to push Israel into opening final peace talks with the Palestinians.

Prince Turki al-Faisal told a conference on Washington's relations with the Arab world that the United States was the only nation with the power to jolt the stalled international roadmap to Middle East peace into motion.

"We want you to remain friends with Israel, we have no objection to that," Prince Turki said.

"But that friendship should be used to push Israel to engage in the peace process," he added, rejecting arguments that political conditions in the volatile region were currently too inflamed to permit negotiations.

"These excuses will continue ... we have heard them for the last 50 years," Prince Turki said.

"Implementation should be done now. The United States devised the roadmap, it needs to implement it," he said.

"The United States is the only country that can do the right thing for everybody in the Middle East," Prince Turki told the conference of the National Council on US-Arab Relations.

"The United States has been engaged and enmeshed in our political situation for the last 50 years or so, whether it likes it or not," he said.

The Bush administration has been less willing than many of its predecessors to engage in nuts and bolts peacemaking between Israel and the Palestinians -- despite calling for the formation of a Palestinian state.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice returned from her sixth visit to Israel and the Palestinian territories earlier this month, but failed to break the peacemaking stalemate.

The process has been frozen since the radical Islamic movement Hamas, which refuses to accept Israel's right to exist and is listed as a terrorist organisation by Europe and in Washington, won legislative elections in January and gained control of the Palestinian government.

The international "roadmap" to peace was designed by the so-called Middle East quartet of the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations.

It was announced in 2003, with the aim of establishing by 2005 a viable Palestinian state living alongside Israel in peace.

Bush To Meet US Sudan Envoy Tuesday (AFP)

AFP, October 31, 2006

US President George W. Bush will meet his special envoy for Sudan, Andrew Natsios, on Tuesday, to get an update on efforts to end violence in Darfur, the White House said.

Bush and Natsios were to meet in the Oval Office at 9:00 am (1400 GMT) to discuss the humanitarian crisis in the war-wracked Darfur region amid stalled attempts to bolster an international peacekeeping presence there.

"The president will meet with his special envoy for Sudan, Andrew Nastios, to receive a report from Mister Natsios and to discuss the way forward," said a spokesman for Bush's national security council, Gordon Johndroe.

DOJ_NMG_0089254

The meet comes roughly one week after US national security adviser Stephen Hadley, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Natsios, and Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Jendayi Frazer held talks on Darfur at the White House.

Natsios recently returned from Egypt after a week-long visit to Sudan, his first since Bush named him his special envoy for Darfur in September.

The UN Security Council adopted a resolution on August 31 calling for the deployment of up to 20,000 peacekeepers to replace an embattled African Union contingent that has failed to restore peace and stability in Darfur.

At least 200,000 people have died as a result of fighting, famine and disease, and more than two million have fled their homes since rebels launched an uprising in Darfur in early 2003, prompting a scorched-earth response from the military and militia allies.

Sudanese President Omar al-Beshir has rejected deployment of UN forces, charging the plan was part of a US-engineered plot to invade and plunder resources.

Russian, U.S. Military Chiefs Ink Pact (AP)

AP, October 31, 2006

The top Russian and U.S. military officers signed a cooperation agreement Monday that lays out plans for joint activities for the coming year, officials said.

Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said he and Gen. Yuri Baluyevsky, his Russian counterpart, signed the document, but did not disclose details of the proposals.

"I came to listen and learn about ways we can do good military-to-military for both Russia and the United States," said Pace, who was making his first appearance in Moscow since becoming chairman of the joint chiefs.

Baluyevsky said the Russian and U.S. analysis of many issues was "very close" but he and Pace would discuss "problems to which ... we must find solutions and adopt these solutions as quickly as possible."

Pace said he had no doubt that "together we can find proper solutions."

"I am anxious for military-to-military cooperation to show through its transparency the potential for our two nations to walk into the future hand in hand," Pace said.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said the former Cold War foes bear the brunt of responsibility for 'supporting strategic security in the world.

"This is a unique responsibility, and other countries look to us with the hope that we will continue to support it," Lavrov said after meeting with Pace.

Earlier, Pace lay a wreath at the tomb of the unknown soldier and called the experience "a very poignant reminder to me of the very special relationship our two nations have had for many years."

Russia has been highly critical of the American-led campaign in Iraq, while the U.S. has criticized Russia's cooperation with Iran despite that country's alleged nuclear weapons program. Russia has also objected to U.S. plans to deploy missile defenses in NATO nations in Eastern Europe.

US And Russia Miss Deadline On Trade (FT)

By Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

The US and Russia are close to a bilateral trade agreement that would remove a big hurdle to Russia's entry into the World Trade Organisation, but Tuesday's self-imposed deadline will not be met, US trade officials said on Monday.

"Both sides believe we are close, and we fully expect to continue our close co-operation to reach an agreement," the US trade representative's office said. However, Russian media reports did not indicate the two sides were on the threshold of an agreement.

The two failed to complete the stalled trade accord in time for the Group of Eight summit in St Petersburg in July, and set an informal end-of-October deadline for their negotiating teams.

With relations under strain on a number of fronts – notably over Georgia, energy and Iran – Presidents George W. Bush and Vladimir Putin would like to salvage something from a once-close relationship by the time of their next meeting, in mid-November during the Asia Pacific Economic Co-operation summit in Vietnam.

US trade officials would not say what issues remained unresolved following a week of talks in Washington with Maxim Medvedkov, Russia's chief WTO negotiator.

Russia's weak enforcement of existing intellectual property laws, access to its financial markets and imports of US beef and pork had been among issues under dispute.

DOJ_NMG_0089255

US businesses are lobbying the Bush administration to complete a deal as soon as possible, concerned they are losing out to European competition. A dozen US companies wrote to both presidents last week urging them to complete the talks.

Moscow's frustration over the delays is believed to have been a factor behind its decision this month to snub foreign partners and give its own Gazprom full control of the development of the Shtokman natural gas fields.

Even if the US and Russia do overcome the technical difficulties blocking a bilateral trade deal, the Bush administration has to persuade a sceptical Congress to exempt Russia from the Jackson-Vanik amendment for the trade deal to become law.

The amendment to the 1974 Trade Act denies normal trade relations to countries that do not have market economies or restrict emigration rights.

Although Russia meets the required conditions, Nikolas Gvosdev, editor of the National Interest in Washington, doubts that a weakened US president has the political capital to win over Congress, where many representatives have reservations over Russia's political direction.

"I see no effort by the administration to even begin prepping Congress to move forward on this," Mr Gvosdev said.

Report Puts Turkey's EU Hopes In Jeopardy (FT)

By Daniel Dombey In London And Fidelius Schmid In Brussels

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

Turkey's bid for European Union membership will be dealt a fresh blow next week when an official report will slate Ankara for failing to make enough progress on freedom of expression, curbing the use of torture and establishing civilian control over the military.

The draft European Commission report, obtained by FT Deutschland, the FT's sister paper, comes at a particularly sensitive time, with EU officials struggling to keep the accession talks alive.

Some EU member states, including the UK, fear that the pro-European consensus within Turkey may be fragmenting, and that the debate within the union on future enlargement has had the effect of alienating Turks, rather than encouraged reform.

"We would have hoped that Turkey would have delivered a lot more during the past 18 months, certainly since the beginning of negotiations in October last year," said one EU official. "If Turkey had been moving more, if there was greater freedom of expression, if there wasn't any torture, things would be a lot more promising."

Instead, the debate over Turkey's accession will come to a head at an EU summit in December, when Ankara will be judged both for its reaction to an EU deadline to open up its ports to ships from Cyprus – which so far it has refused to do – and to its broader reform record.

The Commission's report faults Ankara for failing to allow access to Cypriot ships, which it states infringes the EU's customs union agreement with Turkey. It is this issue that could formally halt negotiations, since as an EU member state, Cyprus wields a veto over Turkey's possible accession.

However, Turkey's reform record will also set the mood in December.

"Turkey needs to relaunch the reform process with full determination," Olli Rehn, the EU's enlargement Commissioner said last week, urging EU member states to focus on the issue.

The draft report, which Mr Rehn will present in its final form next week, says that "prosecutions and convictions for the expression of non-violent opinion...are a cause for serious concern." It cites the example of a journalist who was given a suspended six months prison sentence for articles he wrote on Armenian identity.

Recep Tayyip Erdogan, Turkey's prime minister, said at the weekend that he had no plans to change the article of the penal code used in such cases, which makes it a crime to insult the Turkish state. "On this matter, there is no work in hand," he said.

The Commisison draft adds that "cases of torture and ill treatment are still being reported, in particular outside detention centres," although it also notes a diminution in the incidence of torture.

"The armed forces have continued to exercise significant political influence," the report also says, citing statements made by senior military officials on Cyprus, secularism and the country's Kurdish minority.

The draft report faults Turkey for corruption, insufficient independence of the judiciary, and inadequate protection of minority rights.

However, it does commend Ankara for training the judiciary and for its steps towards establishing an ombudsman to help citizens win redress against the government.

Rumsfeld Hosts Turkish Defense Secretary For Wide-ranging Talks (IHT/AP)

International Herald Tribune/AP, October 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089256

WASHINGTON Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld thanked his Turkish counterpart Monday for NATO ally Turkey's support for the anti-terror operation in Afghanistan and the reconstruction effort in northern Iraq, the Defense Department said.

Navy Lt. Cmdr. Joe Carpenter, a Defense spokesman, said Rumsfeld and Turkish Defense Minister Vecdi Gonul discussed a variety of subjects in their Pentagon meeting, in which Rumsfeld's deputy secretary, Gordon England, participated.

Carpenter gave no details.

Turkey, which is working hard to bring about changes in its system demanded by the European Union before it is brought into that grouping, already is an active NATO member. Besides its contingent of 475 troops in NATO's Afghanistan force, it has 400 troops with the NATO peacekeepers in Kosovo and 300 with Operation Active Endeavor, the alliance's Mediterranean naval arm.

It is the only country with a Muslim majority in NATO and has close ties not only with the United States but with Israel as well.

Other items on the Rumsfeld-Gonul agenda included Turkey's support for the U.S.-sponsored Proliferation Security Initiative against the spread of weapons of mass destruction; the NATO summit scheduled Nov. 28-29 in Riga, Latvia; regional security, including arms sales and defense cooperation; and other NATO issues.

Turkey has a major interest in the northern Iraq question, where Iraqis of the Kurdish ethnic group live. Even under former Iraq President Saddam Hussein, the Kurds lived in a near-autonomous system.

Those Kurds are cousins of the Kurds of eastern Turkey, where the Kurdistan Workers Party, or PKK, has waged since 1984 a rebellion for autonomy that has killed around 37,000 people.

Early this year the Turks accused the Iraqi Kurds of providing havens for PKK fighters on the run from Turkish pursuers and issued veiled threats to cross into Iraqi Kurdistan to destroy the rebels.

The situation became so touchy that the United States warned against Turkish movements into Iraq. Then President George W. Bush appointed a special envoy on the PKK problem, who made his first trip this month.

UK To Ease Issuance Of 'Islamic Bonds' (FT)

By Gillian Tett In London

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

Britain looks set to become the first western country to introduce a regulatory regime to support the domestic issuance of sukuk – so-called "Islamic bonds", or those which do not pay overt interest.

The move is intended to ensure that companies in London can issue sukuk as easily as traditional corporate bonds, boosting the City of London's role in this fast-growing sector of the global capital markets.

"We are looking to place domestic sukuk on the same footing as conventional products," said Ed Balls, economic secretary to the UK Treasury. "Now that 85 per cent of all bonds issued in the [Gulf region] are sukuk, it is important that London is in a position to compete."

The UK hopes to introduce the new framework to support the issuance of sukuk in London next year, via parliamentary legislation.

The legislation would clarify that a sukuk can be treated as debt finance, so that issuers can set the interest payments against their profits for corporation tax purposes.

At present there is no guidance on how capital gains tax and capital allowances apply to sukuk – which has left UK companies nervous of issuing them in London, in case they would subsequently be liable for a large tax bill.

The move comes at a time of rapid growth in the global Islamic finance business, amid rising religious sentiment among Muslim investors and issuers and the growing oil-fuelled wealth of regions, such as the Gulf.

It also comes as the British government is eager to demonstrate its support for Islamic finance – and London's role in this sector.

This stance is a marked contrast to the attitude taken by the US authorities. However, the City's embrace of Islamic finance partly reflects hopes among senior British politicians that the sector could help build bridges with the Muslim world.

Meanwhile, City institutions are now scrambling to win lucrative business from the Middle East, including mandates from companies to issue sukuk.

London-based banks have already played a leading role in developing the sukuk market, which is now estimated to be worth $45bn globally, from almost nothing five years ago. But until now, all sukuk have been issued offshore, because the tax regime in London was unfavourable.

Separately, the Lord Mayor of London will on Tuesday unveil an initiative to create one of the first set of formal financial qualifications for Islamic financial scholars in the world. The study programme, which has been developed with the blessing of senior figures in the City and Lebanon's central bank, will train scholars in Islamic law and finance .

Pay Now Or Later For Warming, Study Says (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

London — A major study issued Monday concludes that without rapid and substantial spending, global warming will reduce worldwide productivity on the scale of the Great Depression, devastate food sources, cause widespread deaths and create hundreds of millions of refugees.

The report commissioned by the British government, which officials called the most comprehensive review of the economics of climate change, warns that failure to act could cost up to 20% a year in lost income worldwide. Acting now, however, could bring about meaningful control of greenhouse gases at an annual cost of 1% of global gross domestic product, it says.

The findings appear to counter the long-standing argument of the Bush administration that controlling greenhouse gases is costly and possibly ineffective.

However, the savings would occur only with the kind of rapid and comprehensive international cooperation on the issue that so far has proved elusive.

British officials said they would take immediate action to legislate carbon-reduction targets, push expanded international carbon-trading programs and move toward reducing carbon emissions in Europe by 30% by 2020 and 60% by 2050. Carbon trading allows companies to exceed emission limits by buying credits from those that are below their emission targets.

Prime Minister Tony Blair, calling the report by senior government economist Nicholas Stern "a landmark in the struggle against climate change," warned that there was a limit to what Britain alone could do.

"Britain is more than playing its part," Blair said. "But it is 2% of worldwide emissions. Close down all of Britain's emissions and in less than two years, just the growth in China's emissions would wipe out the difference. So this issue is the definition of global interdependence."

But the report's findings show that "if the science is right, the consequences for our planet are literally disastrous," Blair said. "And this disaster is not set to happen in some science-fiction future, many years ahead, but in our lifetime."

In Washington, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the lead U.S. agency on global warming, had no immediate comment on the British report. Agency spokesperson Jana Goldman said officials could not react to the report until they had read it.

The report examines the consequences of acting — or failing to act — to control rising temperatures due to greenhouse gases from deforestation and fossil fuels.

The current level of greenhouse gases is already 54% higher than it was before the Industrial Revolution, and could be double that level as early as 2035, the report suggests. Such an increase could raise temperatures by more than 3.6 degrees Fahrenheit by mid-century and a disastrous 9 degrees by century's end, it says.

The result would be melting glaciers that trigger floods and reduce snowpacks that supply drinking water, threatening a sixth of the world's population, the report says. Other effects would include reduced crop yields, leaving hundreds of millions of people unable to produce or purchase sufficient food; an increase in vector-borne diseases; up to 200 million people displaced because of rising sea levels and drought; and the possible extinction of 15% to 40% of species.

"The report sets out I think very clearly that this is not just an environmental issue, or even just an economic issue, but it is a security issue," Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said. "There are some people all over the world who still believe there can be some kind of trade-off between economic and climate security. I think this report knocks [that notion] on its head."

Stern, a former chief economist for the World Bank, said the study found that it was still possible to achieve meaningful temperature controls at a cost equivalent to consumers paying an average of 1% more for everything they buy, and substantially less than the cost of failing to act.

"That's manageable," Stern said. "We can grow and be green."

The report calls for using taxes and regulations to make carbon use more costly, policies supporting low-carbon technology, and changing the public's attitude toward energy efficiency.

Air carriers and utilities could be among those hit hardest by any new emissions-reduction laws. Already, Britons are looking at a possible end to bargain-basement fares to the Continent and higher prices for out-of-season and exotic vegetables from the tropics.

Poor countries will bear the brunt of the effects of climate change, the report says, but it suggests that rich countries must bear 60% to 80% of the responsibility for emissions reductions.

DOJ_NMG_0089258

"The conclusion of the review is essentially optimistic. There is still time to avoid the worst impacts of climate change if we act now and act internationally," Stern said. "But the task is urgent. Delaying action, even by a decade or two, will take us into dangerous territory. We must not let this window of opportunity close."

British Alarmed By Global Warming Financial Risks Cited; Gore Named Adviser (AJC)

By Shelley Emling

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 31, 2006

London — The British government warned Monday of an economic catastrophe if the United States and other large countries fail to quickly cut emissions of the gases blamed for global warming, and Britain named former U.S. Vice President Al Gore as its adviser on the issue.

"If the science is right, the consequences for our planet are literally disastrous," Prime Minister Tony Blair said in releasing the report. "This disaster is not set to happen in some science-fiction future many years ahead, but in our lifetime."

Highlighting the different path that Blair has chosen on climate change from that of President Bush, British officials announced Monday that Gore would offer advice on the issue.

A 600-page report by former World Bank chief economist Sir Nicholas Stern predicted that unchecked global warming would eventually cost the world between 5 percent and 20 percent of its gross domestic product each year, an impact comparable to that of the Great Depression of the 1930s.

It said the costs would come from effects such as rising sea levels, declining crop yields, drinking water shortages, higher death tolls from malnutrition and heat stress, and widespread outbreaks of malaria and dengue fever.

By contrast, taking the steps needed now to reduce greenhouse gas emissions would cost about 1 percent of global GDP each year, the report said.

Earlier, Blair and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California reached an agreement on a joint market for greenhouse gases that will lead to first-in-the-nation emissions caps being placed on California's utilities, refineries, and factories.

David Miliband, Britain's environment secretary, also announced Monday that the government soon would introduce a new global warming law that could include "green taxes," such as a new sales tax on airline flights.

He said families might also have to pay more to drive cars and run energy-wasting appliances.

Although Blair said disaster could be averted only if the world's major nations joined in "bold and decisive action," several British politicians expressed doubt that the U.S. government would be receptive to schemes designed to cut emissions that scientists blame for rapidly warming the planet.

UK Pushes For New Climate Change Treaty (FT)

By Christopher Adams and Fiona Harvey In London

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

A new European push for a successor international treaty to the Kyoto protocol was heralded on Monday with the publication in Britain of a government report calling for rapid action to tackle global warming while the economic cost of doing so was still manageable.

The report for the first time attempts to quantify the economic cost of taking action now – which it said would be just 1 per cent of world economic output by 2050 – against the cost of a failure to act, which it said would knock between 5 and 20 per cent off world consumption.

Tony Blair, British prime minister, is set to use the review by Sir Nicholas Stern, former World Bank chief economist, to announce a dramatic change to his stance on environment policy by calling for a new treaty that could set binding targets for carbon emissions.

In the past two years, Mr Blair has written off the prospect for signing a “Kyoto II” treaty, acknowledging strong US opposition to any attempt to impose emission targets.

But he will now try and inject fresh life into stalled talks on a post-Kyoto agreement, believing that George W. Bush, US president, could back proposals early next year for an international “cap and trade” market for carbon trading.

Mr Blair will press Angela Merkel, Germany’s chancellor, at a meeting in London on Friday to use her presidency of the Group of Eight richest nations next year to reach agreement on the key recommendations in the Stern report.

On Monday, Sigmar Gabriel, Germany’s environment minister, sounded a supportive note, saying climate change would rank high on its list of priorities when it takes over the presidency of the European Union and the chair of the G8 in January.

DOJ_NMG_0089259

The 700-page report, published on Monday by the UK government, was also well received by José Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission.

The report said establishing an international price for carbon, through tax, trading or regulation, was “an essential foundation” for tackling climate change.

Mr Blair said the report showed that the scientific evidence for global warming was “overwhelming” and its consequences “disastrous”.

The UK on Monday announced immediate plans for legislation that would give statutory force to projected cuts in greenhouse gas emissions. Sir Nicholas’s report said floods from rising sea levels could displace up to 100m people, melting glaciers could cause water shortages for one in six of the world’s population and droughts might create tens of millions of “climate refugees”.

In Britain, All Parties Want To Color The Flag Green (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 30 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair warned Monday that the world is heading toward "disastrous" and "irreversible" climate changes. Meanwhile, David Cameron, the popular leader of the opposition Conservative Party, vowed to install a wind-power generator and solar panels at the prime minister's residence if he wins the office.

Blair and Cameron are rivals, but their shared outspoken devotion to fighting global warming -- the subject of a stark British government report released Monday -- illustrates the unity among leaders across the political spectrum here on the dangers of climate change and, in the absence of U.S. leadership, their apparent determination to make Britain a world leader on the issue.

In a clear reference to President Bush, Blair used a column in the Sun newspaper Monday to say, "The case for action is the final piece of the jigsaw to convince every single political leader, including those in America, China and India, that this must be top of their agenda." While Bush has played down the dangers of climate change, Blair called the new findings "the most important report on the future which I have received since becoming Prime Minister" nearly a decade ago.

"There's consensus across the political parties on this," said Michael Cox, a professor of international relations at the London School of Economics. "And Blair genuinely believes that if the United States is not going to lead on this, then Britain will."

British politicians Monday enthusiastically embraced the conclusions of the report by Nicholas Stern, a senior British government economist and former World Bank chief economist. He found that the world will face catastrophic consequences without an urgent international effort to fight climate change.

Chancellor Gordon Brown, who commissioned the study and is Blair's likely successor as prime minister, said new economic opportunities would be created by finding alternative energy sources and other solutions. He said such moves would create "new markets, for new jobs, new technologies, new exports where companies, universities and social enterprises in Britain can lead the world."

Former U.S. vice president Al Gore, who has written a book and produced a film about the dangers of global warming, has become a symbol of Britain's nonpartisan commitment to climate change. He is advising Brown; during the Conservative Party's annual conference this month, Cameron attended a screening of Gore's film, "An Inconvenient Truth," and said, "I absolutely loved Al Gore's movie, and I think everyone here ought to see it."

Climate change is increasingly dominating British political discourse as leaders take to bicycles and hybrid cars in an effort to be more green than their opponents. The Conservatives recently adopted a tree as the party's logo, raising eyebrows among many in a party that is generally more committed to lowering taxes than raising trees. A political cartoon in Monday's Times newspaper here showed Blair, Cameron and Menzies Campbell, leader of the third-largest party, the Liberal Democrats, all hugging trees and pointing at each other, saying, "The other two are faking it!"

Peter Kellner, chairman of the Internet polling firm YouGov, said none of the major British parties has ever had the "intellectual hostility" to climate-change science that is often seen in political and business circles in the United States. He said political leaders are also reflecting public sentiment.

"The argument is won with the public about climate change," Kellner said. "There are very few people who take the Bush line of skepticism."

Polls have consistently shown the British public as supportive of measures such as higher taxes on sport-utility and other large-engine vehicles, Kellner said. Seventy-five percent of respondents supported such measures in a July 2006 poll, up from 69 percent a year earlier.

Tony Travers, a local government specialist at the London School of Economics, said British politics were a factor in the current emphasis on climate change. He said Blair needs to demonstrate "traditional left-of-center" values on issues such as the environment and African poverty to blunt criticism that he has led his party too far to the right. At the same time, he said, Cameron wants to emphasize his green credentials "to signal that he's not like the old Conservative Party."

Warming Poses A Fiscal Threat (USAT)

By Dan Vergano

USA Today, October 31, 2006

Pay now to fix global warming or risk a worldwide economic depression later, says a landmark British government report out Monday.

"The benefits of strong, early action on climate change outweigh the costs," concludes the 576-page Stern Review Report on the Economics of Climate Change. The report, authored by former World Bank chief economist Nicholas Stern, is called the most comprehensive projection of the economic impact of warming.

Failure to act carries the danger that rising temperatures will increase the likelihood of widespread drought, crop failure, sea-level rise and other economic calamities, the report warns.

"Our actions over the coming decades could create risks of major disruption to economic and social activity, later in this century and in the next, on a scale similar to those associated with the great wars and the economic depression of the first half of the 20th century," according to the report.

The report moves economic discussion of how humanity should deal with global warming to center stage, says Alden Meyer of the Union of Concerned Scientists in Washington, D.C., a science advocacy group. The report is endorsed by such economic heavyweights as Nobel Prize winner Joseph Stiglitz of Columbia University.

But critics, such as statistician Bjorn Lomborg of Denmark's Copenhagen Consensus Center, suggest ills such as disease and malnutrition are potentially more costly than global warming.

In 2001, an international science panel concluded levels of so-called greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide produced by burning coal and gasoline, likely would raise average global temperatures about 2 to 10 degrees by 2100. Letting them rise without levying financial penalties for the environmental impact would be a colossal failure, says economist Alex Bowen, a member of the Stern team.

The White House, in a statement responding to the report, said President Bush "has long recognized that climate change is a serious issue, and he has committed the U.S. to advancing and investing in the new technologies to help address this problem."

The report calls for spending 1% of global gross domestic product (GDP), about $600 billion yearly, by 2050 to shift the world to a "low carbon" economy that limits climate change in three ways:

·Research. Development of efficient and cleaner technology.

·Consumer action. Educating people to limit energy use.

Waiting to act will cut 5% to 20% of the world's yearly GDP by 2050, lost to environmental degradation expected from global warming. (For perspective, the Great Depression cut U.S. GDP by 26% from 1929 to 1933, according to the Economic History Association.)

Past estimates have generally anticipated a lesser financial impact from climate change. For example, a 2000 Yale University report found temperatures rising 3.6 degrees by 2100 would cut global GDP less than 2%. Such reports underestimated the risk of big temperature increases and severe weather, Bowen says.

Lomborg, however, says the Stern report overestimates benefits and minimizes costs in its call to move to a low-carbon economy.

Warming Called Threat To Global Economy (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Failing to curb the impact of climate change could damage the global economy on the scale of the Great Depression or the world wars by spawning environmental devastation that could cost 5 to 20 percent of the world's annual gross domestic product, according to a report issued yesterday by the British government.

The report by Nicholas Stern, who heads Britain's Government Economic Service and formerly served as the World Bank's chief economist, calls for a new round of international collaboration to cut greenhouse gas emissions linked to global warming.

"There's still time to avoid the worst impacts of climate change, if we act now and act internationally," Stern said in a statement. "But the task is urgent. Delaying action, even by a decade or two, will take us into dangerous territory. We must not let this window of opportunity close."

DOJ_NMG_0089261

Some economists questioned the British study's projections, however, saying they overestimated the impact of global warming on the world's economies, especially those of developed nations. At the same time, these critics said the report's assertion that it would cost only 1 percent annually of global GDP to curb climate change underestimated how much spending would be required.

"There's just a very small part of GDP" in industrialized nations "that's affected by weather in a direct or indirect way," said Jerry Taylor, a senior fellow at the libertarian Cato Institute, which accepts some contributions from fossil-fuel companies. "It's very difficult to sketch out this disaster scenario."

Yale University economics professor William Nordhaus, who has estimated that climate change will cost developed countries less than 1 percent of GDP over the next half-century, said the Stern report "appears to be an impressive effort to summarize the science and economics of climate change" despite the controversy surrounding its projections.

The report represents British Prime Minister Tony Blair's latest effort to enlist President Bush, a close ally, in his effort to make serious cuts in carbon dioxide emissions. Bush has declined to sign the 1997 Kyoto Protocol, which imposes mandatory reductions in greenhouse gases on most industrialized nations between 2008 and 2012, and yesterday his aides reiterated his commitment to fostering research and innovation rather than adopting federal emissions restrictions.

"The president has long recognized that climate change is a serious issue, and he has committed the U.S. to advancing and investing in the new technologies to help address this problem," said Kristen Hellmer, spokeswoman for Bush's top environmental adviser, James L. Connaughton. "His administration has already dedicated more than $29 billion to climate change sciences and technology programs and is working in strong partnership with nations around the world to accelerate progress. . . . The U.S. government has produced an abundance of economic analysis on the issue of climate change. The Stern report is another contribution to that effort."

In a telephone conference with reporters yesterday, Alex Brown, senior economic adviser for the Stern report, said the British government had conferred with Bush administration officials while drafting the study. But when asked whether these officials had indicated a willingness to shift course, Brown replied, "I don't think I can comment on that."

Still, several experts said the report could reshape the way policymakers consider the pros and cons of curbing carbon dioxide from power plants, automobiles and other sources.

"It's important for the people arguing for action to make the case that it's worth it, rather than the promise that it will be free," said Yale environmental law and policy professor Dan Esty, adding that the report puts "for the first time in stark relief, the costs and consequences of inaction and puts them on parallel with the known burdens of taking action.

The British government has also enlisted a prominent adviser to help promote its global warming message, by bringing on former vice president Al Gore as an unpaid consultant.

Even advocates of mandatory limits on greenhouse gases, however, said that to shift U.S. climate policy would entail policies that exact a price from politically influential and economically powerful industries.

"There are costs to addressing this problem," said Tim Profeta, who directs Duke University's Nicholas Institute for Environmental Policy Solutions. "This is only the beginning of the conversation."

Emissions Of CO2 Continue To Rise Despite Pledges (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, October 31, 2006

A United Nations agency said most industrial nations continue to increase their emissions of carbon dioxide and other so-called greenhouse gases thought to be warming the Earth's atmosphere, despite pledges under the Kyoto Protocol during the next six years to make a 5% cut.

While the shuttering of heavily polluting factories in the former Soviet Union and its satellites makes it appear as though industrial nations as a group reduced their emissions by 3.3% from 1990 to 2004, the agency said that without that statistical blip, the U.S. and most other industrial nations have increased their emissions by 11%.

"The rising trend is the worrisome part of it," said Yvo de Boer, executive secretary of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change. Since 2000, as their economies revived, countries in Eastern Europe also increased their emissions, rising by 4.1% according to the agency.

From 2000 to 2004, according to the U.N. data, the U.S., which isn't a party to Kyoto, had a slower increase in emissions (1.3%) than members of the European Union (2.4%). EU members have committed to drop their emissions by 8%, compared with 1990 levels, by 2012.

"This means that industrialized countries will need to intensify their efforts to implement strong [reduction] policies," Mr. de Boer said.

Spain and Austria had the highest increases -- 11.4% and 12.4%, respectively -- in Western Europe from 2000 to 2004. Canada, which has pledged a 6% reduction, saw its emissions rise by 4.6%. Germany's emissions dropped by 0.7% and the United Kingdom's emissions fell by 1%.

"The positive part of this is that across the board we're seeing emissions growing more slowly than economic growth," Mr. de Boer said. Parties to the Kyoto treaty meet next week in Nairobi, Kenya, to begin what is likely to be a multiyear debate on what emissions cuts will be required in the second round of the treaty's implementation, which starts in 2012.

The findings were released shortly after a report by Sir Nicholas Stern, head of the U.K.'s Government Economic Service. He estimated the cost of a nation's efforts to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions to avoid the worst effects of climate change would amount to about 1% of global domestic product each year. However, he calculated, the cost of "unabated climate change" including rising sea levels would be five times that much, or more. (See related article1.)

Scandal Below The Surface (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

The crucial issue this year is Iraq, and the most important issue this decade may be the risk that nuclear proliferation results in the incineration of Wall Street by terrorists. Both topics are spurring useful debate this campaign season.

But one of the more important issues this century is generating no serious discussion on the campaign trail. And, in place of a drumroll, let's look at the chemistry experiment in which we're all taking part.

If you think of the earth's surface as a great beaker, then it's filled mostly with ocean water. It is slightly alkaline, and that's what creates a hospitable home for fish, coral reefs and plankton — and indirectly, higher up the food chain, for us.

But scientists have discovered that the carbon dioxide we're spewing into the air doesn't just heat up the atmosphere and lead to rising seas. Much of that carbon is absorbed by the oceans, and there it produces carbonic acid — the same stuff found in soda pop.

That makes oceans a bit more acidic, impairing the ability of certain shellfish to produce shells, which, like coral reefs, are made of calcium carbonate. A recent article in Scientific American explained the indignity of being a dissolving mollusk in an acidic ocean: "Drop a piece of chalk (calcium carbonate) into a glass of vinegar (a mild acid) if you need a demonstration of the general worry: the chalk will begin dissolving immediately."

The more acidic waters may spell the end, at least in higher latitudes, of some of the tiniest variations of shellfish — certain plankton and tiny snails called pteropods. This would disrupt the food chain, possibly killing off many whales and fish, and rippling up all the way to humans.

We stand, so to speak, on the shoulders of plankton.

"There have been a couple of very big events in geological history where the carbon cycle changed dramatically," said Scott Doney, senior scientist at the Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution in Massachusetts. One was an abrupt warming that took place 55 million years ago in conjunction with acidification of the oceans and mass extinctions. Most scientists don't believe we're headed toward a man-made variant on that episode — not yet, at any rate. But many worry that we're hurtling into unknown dangers.

"Whether in 20 years or 100 years, I think marine ecosystems are going to be dramatically different by the end of this century, and that'll lead to extinction events," Mr. Doney added.

"This is the only habitable planet we have," he said. "The damage we do is going to be felt by all the generations to come."

So that should be one of the great political issues for this century — the vandalism we're committing to our planet because of our refusal to curb greenhouse gases. Yet the subject is barely debated in this campaign.

Changes in ocean chemistry are only one among many damaging consequences of carbon emissions. Evidence is also growing about the more familiar dangers: melting glaciers, changing rainfall patterns, rising seas and more powerful hurricanes.

Last year, the World Health Organization released a study indicating that climate change results in an extra 150,000 deaths and five million sicknesses each year, by causing the spread of malaria, diarrhea, malnutrition and other ailments.

A report prepared for the British government and published yesterday, the Stern Review on the Economics of Climate Change, warned that inaction "could create risks of major disruption to economic and social activity, on a scale similar to those associated with the great wars and the economic depression of the first half of the 20th century."

If emissions are not curbed, climate change will cut 5 percent to 20 percent of global G.D.P. each year, declared the mammoth report. "In contrast," it said, "the costs of action — reducing greenhouse gas emissions to avoid the worst impacts of climate change — can be limited to around 1 percent of global G.D.P. each year." Some analysts put the costs of action higher, but most agree that it makes sense to invest far more in alternative energy sources, both to wean ourselves of oil and to reduce the strain on our planet.

We know what is needed: a carbon tax or cap-and-trade system, a post-Kyoto accord on emissions cutbacks, and major research on alternative energy sources. But as The Times's Andrew Revkin noted yesterday, spending on energy research and development has fallen by more than half, after inflation, since 1979.

Melting glaciers and corroding pteropods aren't as sensational as a Congressional page scandal, or as urgent as the Iraq war. But they are just as scandalous. We have no responsibility greater than as stewards of our planet, and we're blowing it.

Two Forces Maintain Siege Of Oaxaca (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

OAXACA, Mexico, Oct. 30 -- The men who weave wool into boldly patterned rugs don't bother coming here anymore. The little shops that sold sweet, grainy chocolate are boarded up.

Oaxaca, Mexico's colonial-era jewel, was almost unrecognizable Monday, a barely functioning city befouled by smoldering trash and the charred hulks of burned-out buses. Five months after teachers launched a strike for better pay, and two days after the arrival of federal police, Oaxaca is a place under siege by equally determined opposing forces.

Police outfitted with gas masks control the town square. Masked protesters armed with rocks control the rest. No one seems to know what will happen next.

The police say they are determined to restore order. But the demonstrators have voted not to budge until the Oaxaca state governor, Ulises Ruiz, steps down. Some business owners are hopeful that local lawmakers will be able to persuade Ruiz to resign and end the crisis. But for now, the standoff is testing the resolve of a populist movement of poor Mexicans and bringing chaos to a town long known as a haven for tourists.

Oaxaca got to this point in flashes of gunfire Friday that killed two protesters and an independent American journalist and activist, Brad Will, who came here to support the teachers' strike. The shootings prompted Mexican President Vicente Fox to send in 4,500 federal police officers, who were met by a hail of rocks as they smashed through barricades and drove demonstrators out of the town square on Sunday.

Fox declared Monday that "today in Oaxaca social order and peace has been restored." But the president's declaration seemed out of sync with events on the ground.

Streets teemed with sweaty young men, some carrying medieval-looking clubs with nails jutting out of ax handles. Others collected rocks, for later use as weapons, in shopping carts. The few visitors to come here were dumped at taxi stands on the outskirts of the town's historic center because airport van drivers were afraid of getting hijacked.

Demonstrators control the university radio station, broadcasting a stream of political invective, protest songs and slogans. "The People United Will Never Be Defeated," their anthem, plays constantly.

Thousands of demonstrators spent hours under a wilting sun Monday taunting police, who stood 10 deep alongside armored vehicles to block the many streets leading into the town square.

"It smells like dogs," one protester screamed, drawing laughter from hundreds clumped on Cinco de Mayo, a street named in honor of Mexico's revolutionary spirit. The police just glared back, protected by helmets and thick plastic shields. At their feet were wooden crosses, smudged red by protesters who pricked their arms and squeezed out the blood.

While the standoff began as a teachers strike, it has morphed into a political movement here in the second poorest of Mexican states. Even as some teachers seem to be wavering in their resolve -- a few returned to work in outlying villages in the state Monday -- an umbrella group with an ambitious mission of social and economic reform has taken over. The group, the Popular Assembly of the People of Oaxaca, or APPO, is also demanding the resignation of Ruiz, who infuriated teachers by using force to disband their annual protest five months ago.

On Monday, APPO activists waved their fists at the helicopters that constantly swept overhead, yelling, "Murderers." They said two comrades were killed Sunday and more than a dozen had died since the protest began.

"These hotel people, all they want is repression. They're in league with the governor," said the man, who declined to give his name for fear of repercussions in his small village.

Daniel Velasquez, the lone vendor in the once-bustling Plaza Antonio Labistida, watched it all and frowned.

"Oaxaca is hurting," he said. "Oaxaca is ugly."

On the wall to Velasquez's left, a sign invited people to a tour marking the Day of the Dead, an important Mexican holiday, on Wednesday. It was accompanied by a sign-up sheet. But there wasn't a single signature.

Protesters Vow To Retake Oaxaca Center (AP)

By Mark Stevenson

AP, October 31, 2006

Thousands of protesters driven from the city center by federal police after months of paralyzing demonstrations vowed to retake the main plaza on Monday, but strike-weary residents pleaded for a return to life as usual.

Oaxaca remained deeply divided between the protesters demanding Gov. Ulises Ruiz's resignation and those yearning for a return to the tranquil days when foreign tourists browsed shops and dined on the region's famous mole sauce.

"Fight, fight, fight! Don't stop fighting!" the protesters chanted before arriving at the central main plaza, the Zocalo, carrying anti-government banners.

Ignoring protesters who screamed "Sellout!" a group of about 20 residents and business owners waged earlier countermarches to thank federal police for clearing away the demonstrators, who had kept the city under siege since May, shutting down businesses and repelling the scores of national and international tourists who traditionally are drawn to the picturesque colonial city of 275,000.

"Let them stay," Edith Mendoza, a 40-year-old housewife, said of the police. "We were held hostage for five months."

The city resembled a battleground early Monday, its streets littered with charred cars and lines of federal police blocking entrances to the Zocalo.

Inside the central plaza, guarded by hundreds of uniformed police in riot gear and manning water cannons, workers labored feverishly to remove and paint over graffiti, rip down banners and clean up tons of accumulated trash. The kiosk in the heart of the plaza, covered with protest banners and graffiti during the demonstrations, had already been restored to its original state.

The protests began as a teacher's strike but quickly spiraled into chaos as anarchists, students and Indian groups seized the central plaza and barricaded streets throughout the city to demand Ruiz's ouster.

Police and state forces — often in plainclothes — have shot at protesters, setting off clashes in which at least eight people have died.

The federal government indicated that it had no intention of letting the protesters take back the city. Interior Secretary Carlos Abascal said the federal forces would stay until order had been established.

President Vicente Fox said "today in Oaxaca social order and peace has been restored."

Fox, who leaves office Dec. 1, had resisted repeated calls to send federal forces to Oaxaca until Saturday, a day after gunfire killed a U.S. activist-journalist and two residents.

The demonstrators said Monday they hoped to attract other sectors of society, mainly the state's restive Indian population, to join their fight.

"The government is angering the other regions and they are going to come and that way they won't stop us," said Flora Gutierrez, a university student who was among protesters.

Protesters also pointed out that while police controlled the Zocalo, the demonstrators were still in charge of other areas of the city, where they erected additional barricades made of trash and vehicles.

"There are more than 3,000 barricades in the working-class neighborhoods," said Flavio Sosa, a protest leader.

The federal government's decision to send forces into Oaxaca came after teachers agreed to return to work by Monday, ending a strike that kept 1.3 million children out of classes across the southern state.

But teachers union leader Enrique Rueda told The Associated Press that no students had returned to class in the capital on Monday, although some had in cities and towns outside of Oaxaca City.

"We are not willing to go back (to work) until we get written guarantees" for teachers' safety, said Daniel Reyes, one of the last of the striking teachers to leave the main square as police gathered around it Sunday night.

During the strike, some dissident teachers tried to open schools, and parents armed with sticks and pipes fought off protesters who tried to keep children from entering.

Public Safety Secretary Eduardo Medina Mora said seven police were injured in the weekend clashes. A few were hit by gasoline bombs thrown by protesters.

Protesters claimed two of their own were killed, but federal authorities said they could not confirm that.

A scattering of businesses, including the city's famous marketplace, reopened Monday. As shoppers browsed through the market's stalls, stocked with supplies of fresh marigolds to celebrate the upcoming Day of the Dead, others lined up at several automatic teller machines that had reopened. But most of the city remained shuttered.

DOJ_NMG_0089265

Ruiz — whom the protesters accuse of corruption and rigging elections — was scheduled to give his state-of-the-state address on Monday.

The lower house of Congress on Monday called for Ruiz to resign, but he showed no signs of doing so. In a television interview, he said his departure "is not up for discussion."

Oaxaca Divided As Police Regain Control Of Plaza (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

OAXACA, Mexico — The state capital remained divided Monday as thousands of residents marched in defiance and many others praised government forces that dislodged a protest encampment from the city center this weekend.

The recovery of the plaza by federal police late Sunday marked a symbolic end to the five-month occupation by striking teachers and leftist supporters who have demanded the resignation of the state governor. But exactly when the tourist capital will return to normal is in doubt.

Although at least two deaths were reported during the 12-hour invasion by more than 4,000 riot police and armored equipment, Fox described the operation as "bloodless" and conducted without the use of weapons.

Flavio Sosa, a leader of the leftist movement known by its Spanish-language initials APPO, said Monday the government had recovered only a single block, after protesters ceded it in the face of overwhelming force.

"The control of the rest of the city is in the hands of APPO," he said in a radio interview. "I want to tell you that we are not going to hand over control of the city. We are going to resist at every barricade."

Protesters converged on the central plaza in the early afternoon from three directions in a largely peaceful demonstration calling for the ouster of federal police and the resignation of Gov. Ulises Ruiz.

They chanted slogans denouncing Ruiz and cursed the federal police, who stood in single-line formation on every street entering the square, backed by armored vehicles with water cannons.

The protesters' many grievances stem largely from the desperate poverty in this southern state, especially among indigenous people who are among the poorest and least educated in Mexico. The opposition began with the striking teachers but quickly mushroomed. Teachers since have negotiated a 30 percent raise over several years and have agreed to return to the classroom. "All we want is work, hospitals, better schools and the military out," said Veralisa Flores, a teacher who marched with friends. "This is a peaceful movement."

But despite pleas, protest organizers could not stop the young men who tossed rocks and fired a sky rocket at one line of police on the east side of the square, drawing several rounds of tear gas canisters that dispersed the assailants.

Rogue elements of the conflict have damaged the image of the fledgling movement, as well as local government. Plain-clothes police allegedly have killed several protesters, including independent journalist Bradley Roland Will, of New York, who was shot Friday along with three Mexicans.

Local authorities over the weekend announced the arrest of five men in the slaying of Will, including the police chief and two of his officers from nearby Santa Lucia del Camino.

"These tragic and senseless deaths over the weekend, in addition to the nine deaths already caused by the civil unrest in Oaxaca in the past several months, of course, underscore the critical need for a return to lawfulness and order," he said.

Many residents who took early morning walks Monday to see the plaza expressed the same feeling. They, too, hope the arrival of federal police will be the first step in bringing Oaxaca back to normal.

"The majority of people are relieved the police are finally here," Gloria Crisantos said. "We've been held hostage in our own city. Look around. Ask anyone."

And, as if on cue, a crowd of passers-by quickly gathered, eager to voice their support of the police. They said they had lost business and jobs, and their children have been out of school since May. They agreed with protesters that Oaxaca needs help but bristled at their tactics, which has turned the popular destination into a ghost town.

Their anger extended to Ruiz, who they say failed to quell the unrest by ignoring teacher demands, and then trying to evict them from the plaza in a violent police attack in June.

A majority of congressmen in Mexico's lower house of Congress voted Monday to ask for Ruiz to take a leave of absence or resign. And the Senate voted unanimously to ask him to consider stepping down, with four years remaining in his six-year term.

Mexican Protesters Try To Protect Their Rallying Cry (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

OAXACA, Mexico, Oct. 30 — As federal riot police hunkered down in Oaxaca's main square today, protesters sought to protect their not-so-secret weapon in their five-month-long siege of the city: the pilfered radio transmitter they use to mobilize the population.

"We are in a red alert, a red alert!" a nervous-sounding announcer said over and over from inside the bullet-scarred university station, which was ringed by sand bags and protected by masked supporters on the roof equipped with handmade mortars. "The police are moving in!"

The cry was premature but it drew hundreds of supporters from across this city in southern Mexico. They prepared Molotov cocktails and reinforced the barriers around the gates of Oaxaca University in anticipation of a raid.

"We will transmit until the last minute," an announcer who described himself as a law professor but declined to provide his name said in an interview. "We will not run. We are like the captains of the ship and we'll go down with the ship."

Oaxaca's beleaguered governor, Ulises Ruiz, was also hunkered down, on his own turf, facing increased pressure to resign.

Although the governor insisted in a television interview today that he was staying put, his support appeared thin as the Congress passed a nonbinding resolution urging him to cede power for the good of the state and the nation. Only Mr. Ruiz's Institutional Revolutionary Party and another small allied party stuck by the governor, and even their backing seemed lukewarm.

Emilio Gamboa, the leader of his party in the Chamber of Deputies, told reporters that it was up to Mr. Ruiz to make a decision of conscience as to "whether he can continue or not governing Oaxaca."

Members of the Oaxaca People's Popular Assembly, which has been coordinating the protests, have clearly made up their minds that he cannot, as their frequent anti-Ruiz messages over the radio make clear.

If the diffuse movement that has laid siege to Oaxaca has a nerve center it is the trash-strewn conference room where the people's assembly advocates broadcast regular updates to their comrades.

It is over the renegade station that announcers called on supporters to provide diesel fuel the other day to gas up some protest vehicles. Over the same airwaves, they informed the population that the police were moving in on the city Sunday afternoon. Today, the radio called people into the streets for three protest marches that drew thousands.

Even after the federal raid managed to take back the symbolic Zócalo, or central square, which had been the protesters main stage, the station kept the movement against Mr. Ruiz alive.

The protest began as a teachers strike but a deal was reached to raise their salaries. Some teachers returned to classes today, although it appeared that many were not yet sure it was safe enough to do so — especially since continued clashes between protesters and police appeared likely. Local residents have said the issue is less a people's movement than old political rivalries and patronage.

"It's strange but I'm not afraid," Alejandra Canseco Martinez, 22, a student who frequently sends out updates over the air waves, said from inside the radio station. "Maybe I should be afraid because we don't know what will happen and the police are only a few blocks away."

It is not the first time that the station has been under siege.

The current standoff began on June 14, when the police broke up a teachers' protest and smashed the transmitter that teachers were using to broadcast their messages from the main square. The following day, as supporters joined forces with the teachers, university students took over the campus station.

On July 22, gunmen opened fire on the station, sending workers ducking for cover and eventually knocking the signal off the air. But listeners heard the attack and converged on the station in support.

Then, on Aug. 8, someone sneaked into the station and poured acid onto the transmitter, again killing the signal. But by that time, protesters had taken over another station. Within weeks, a dozen public and private stations around Oaxaca were controlled by protesters.

The university station, with its transmitter repaired, remains the chief source of information for the protesters, though. Its messages are dismissed as revolutionary propaganda by critics, but supporters relish the hard-edge words that fly across the colonial city.

"The other stations only say things in support of Ulises," said Sal Lozano, 43, a farmer, speaking of the governor. "We're going to defend this station with everything with have."

Crisis As Sri Lanka Talks Go Nowhere (FT)

By Joe Leahy

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

No one was expecting much – at best an agreement on a schedule for more talks rather than any serious discussion of the main issues.

But relations between the Sri Lankan government and the rebel Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam have deteriorated so much that the two sides could not agree even on this modest goal when they met in Geneva at the weekend.

For the long-suffering people of Sri Lanka, the news could hardly have been worse. There is little to stop the two sides intensifying their slide back towards full-scale hostilities under the guise of the island's four-year-old ceasefire agreement, a situation that is already leading to an humanitarian crisis in the country's north-east. Heavy shelling resumed in the north only hours after the talks collapsed.

"It's back to war," says Paikiasothy Saravanamuttu, executive director of the Centre for Policy Alternatives. "The next lot of serious negotiations will come only after one side or the other feels it has got a decisive and consolidated military advantage or they're mutually exhausted and feel they can't proceed on the battlefield any further."

The talks were always going to be tough going. Since the two sides, which signed a ceasefire agreement in 2002 after nearly two decades of fighting, last met in Geneva in February, there has been a steady escalation of violence.

Starting with naval battles, air strikes and bomb blasts, the conflict had intensified by July into land battles on the northern Jaffna Peninsula. In the week preceding the talks, a suspected rebel suicide bomber rammed an explosive-laden truck into a navy convoy, killing more than 100 people in the worst attack since the ceasefire agreement and bringing the toll of combatants and civilians killed this year to 2000.

On the flipside, there were also more reasons for hope this time around. Last week, the opposition United National Party signed an unprecedented agreement with President Mahinda Rajapaksa's ruling Sri Lanka Freedom Party pledging to co-operate on economic affairs and security, including the peace process.

The talks were meant to be unconditional. But each side arrived in Geneva with an agenda that was bound to be unacceptable to the other.

The government wanted to discuss human rights, including the Tamil Tigers' alleged use of child soldiers, the re-establishment of multi-party democracy in the north and east, and a development programme for the area. The Tigers wanted the government to allow a referendum in the rebel-held areas.

But the talks faltered on the Tigers' demand that the government reopen the A-9 highway, a strategic road connecting the LTTE-controlled Jaffna peninsula to the rest of the island. The Tigers argue the closure of the road constitutes a new "Berlin Wall" and is leading to shortages of food and supplies on the peninsula.

The government refuses to reopen the road, which it says is used by the rebels for the smuggling of weapons and child soldiers. It offered to supply the peninsula using ships if the rebels would guarantee their security, which they have so far refused to do.

Palitha Kohona, one of the government negotiators, accused the rebels of using the road as an excuse to hamstring the talks.

"They came here unconditionally but all of a sudden the conditions emerged as an excuse to walk away. It's very difficult to come to the conclusion that they are interested in resolving this conflict in a peaceful manner," he told the Financial Times from Geneva.

Some analysts doubt the sincerity of both sides going into talks. They argue that the government should have anticipated the LTTE's demands regarding the highway and that it should reopen the road for humanitarian reasons.

And they suspect that the rebels' heart is not in the talks. The LTTE's dream is of an independent Tamil state, a proposal that has little international support and is unlikely to be achieved through the current negotiations.

Jehan Perera, director of the National Peace Council, said he was concerned that the situation in Jaffna would deteriorate further, with food shortages driving the price of rice there to five times its levels in Colombo amid daily assassinations and killings.

The only hope was that the new alliance between the ruling party and the UNP, headed by former Prime Minister Ranil Wickremesinghe, will help drive pressure for an accord.

"The UNP leader has said very categorically that he's supporting the government for peace, not for war," says Mr Perera.

Leaders Struggle To Repair Polish-German Ties (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

BERLIN, Oct. 30 -- It had already been a bad year for German-Polish relations, but things really soured this month when naval warfare between the two countries nearly broke out on the Baltic Sea.

On Oct. 17 , the Polish Coast Guard fired warning shots at a German tourist ship after it tried to evade inspection in the Polish port of Swinoujscie and made a run for the German border with three Polish customs officers on board. Polish officials accused the vessel, the Adler Dania, of hiding a cargo of tax-free cigarettes and booze; the German captain accused the Poles of overreacting. "Are Our Neighbors Insane?" blared Bild, Germany's largest newspaper.

No one was wounded or killed, but the incident only added to a string of diplomatic slights, political insults and other indignities that have left Germany and Poland feeling more raw about each other than perhaps at any time since the end of World War II.

Poles have been smarting for more than a year over Germany's decision to bypass their energy-dependent country by routing a major gas pipeline to Russia under the Baltic. The Polish defense minister, drawing on a painful history that is never far from the surface, compared the move to the secret agreement between Adolph Hitler and Joseph Stalin to carve up Poland in 1939.

Poles are also sore about efforts by some Germans to sue for monetary compensation for property their families were forced to abandon after the defeat of the Third Reich, when borders were redrawn and Germany ceded some of its eastern territory to Poland.

At times, Poland's leaders have made matters worse by displaying thin skins. In July, Polish President Lech Kaczynski canceled an official visit to Germany after a Berlin newspaper mocked him as "a little potato" who thirsted to rule the world. Polish officials demanded, unsuccessfully, that the German government take legal action against the journalists.

On Monday, Kaczynski's twin brother, Jaroslaw, Poland's prime minister, came to Berlin -- for the first time -- to meet with German Chancellor Angela Merkel in an attempt to repair some of the diplomatic damage. While the pair tried to put on a good face and held a joint news conference, they didn't report any breakthroughs.

Merkel rejected Poland's demand to sign a deal forswearing any private German property claims from the war. Although she acknowledged the "unease" the issue had caused in Poland, she said government intervention "would make things more complicated than they are."

Kaczynski said he welcomed Merkel's comments but added that Poland still wasn't satisfied. "In the Polish view, this issue is not resolved," he warned.

Germany and Poland are the two biggest countries in central Europe and share a long border, but polls show a widespread lack of familiarity between the two neighbors' people.

Two of every three Germans have never set foot in Poland, according to a survey commissioned last spring by the Institute of Public Affairs in Warsaw. Public views of Poles are also not favorable. When asked what they most associated with Poland, the top answer was "car theft and crime," followed closely by "illegal workers" and "poverty, backwardness."

Many Poles harbor skeptical views of Germany as well. In a similar poll conducted by the institute last March, 49 percent of Poles questioned said they feared Germany could pose "an economic threat" to Poland in the future, even though Germany is Poland's largest trading partner.

Also ruffling feathers in Poland are recent historical exhibits in Berlin that highlighted the hardships faced by millions of German refugees after World War II. Many Poles saw the exhibits, which closed just before Kaczynski's arrival, as an attempt to portray Germans as victims of a war that they started -- and that left 6 million people dead in Poland.

Sponsors of the exhibit, titled "Forced Paths," said they took pains to include the experiences of other political refugees in Europe throughout the 20th century and questioned whether Polish leaders were seeking to score political points at home.

"I also think politicians in Poland are trying to use the issue to divert attention from massive domestic problems," said Erika Steinbach, a member of the German Parliament and head of a group called the Federation of Expellees, which has drawn the ire of the Polish government. "I am an optimist and I think the differences can be resolved. If they are not, it certainly will not be the fault of the German expellees."

So far, Poland's government has shown little willingness to forgive and forget.

When the Forced Paths exhibit opened in August, the mayor of Warsaw canceled a visit to Berlin in protest. Kaczynski, the prime minister, trashed the event and responded with a historical lesson of his own: a visit to a former Nazi concentration camp in northern Poland.

Berlusconi And Former Lawyer To Stand Trial (FT)

By Adrian Michaels In Milan

Financial Times, October 31, 2006

Silvio Berlusconi, the former Italian prime minister, and David Mills, his former lawyer, were on Monday ordered to stand trial on corruption charges by a judge in Milan.

In a further deepening of the pair's legal woes, the judge accepted the prosecutors' request for a trial into allegations that Mr Berlusconi paid Mr Mills at least $600,000 after the lawyer had given favourable testimony at other trials of Mr Berlusconi in the 1990s.

The two men are already committed to trial in a separate case that starts this month.

The affair adds considerably to the embarrassment of the two men.

Mr Mills's reputation has taken a considerable beating and also created problems for his estranged wife, Tessa Jowell, the UK culture secretary who is a close ally of Tony Blair, the UK prime minister. Ms Jowell was forced to defend herself against accusations that she breached the ministerial code of conduct governing disclosure of financial arrangements.

Mr Berlusconi, who is Italy's richest man, has been beset by allegations of wrongdoing in his business empire for years.

He has been convicted on some occasions but the convictions have either been overturned on appeal or annulled by statutes of limitations.

Mr Berlusconi says that he has done nothing wrong and that sections of Italy's judiciary are targeting him to generate political advantage for his leftwing opponents.

Mr Mills also says he has done nothing wrong. He at first admitted to prosecutors that the money had come from Mr Berlusconi and later retracted that statement, saying it was related to business with another client.

Prosecutors allege that Mr Mills entangled the affairs of his clients so as to make it difficult to follow the trail of money.

Whatever the outcome of the trial, people close to the Milan prosecutors admit that it is very unlikely that a conviction will stand and that either man will go to jail.

The last part of the crimes of which the two are accused is alleged to have taken place in February 1998 and legal proceedings have 10 years to be completed.

The trial is at the moment scheduled to start in March, meaning the case and any subsequent rounds of appeal have 11 months to finish. People close to the case said on Monday that Milan prosecutors had the chance to ask a judge to bring forward the trial date but that no decision had yet been made.

Mr Berlusconi is hoping once again to be Italy's prime minister and is agitating for an early collapse of the government of Romano Prodi, his successor.

In the separate trial starting this month Mr Berlusconi, Mr Mills and 11 others are embroiled in allegations of money laundering, tax evasion and improper accounting.

Berlusconi To Face Corruption Trial (AP)

By Colleen Barry

AP, October 31, 2006

Berlusconi is accused of ordering the payment in 1997 of at least $600,000 to his co-defendant British lawyer David Mills, a close friend, in exchange for the lawyer's false testimony in two trials against Berlusconi. Both deny the allegations.

Mills is married to British Culture Secretary Tessa Jowell. They formally separated in March.

Prime Minister Tony Blair's office declined to comment on the decision, and a spokesman in Jowell's office also declined to comment.

Judge Fabio Paparella issued the ruling after refusing a defense motion to remove himself from the case because he is presiding over a separate case charging Berlusconi and Mills with false accounting, embezzlement and tax fraud in the purchase by Berlusconi's Mediaset empire of TV rights for U.S. movies.

The new case is set to go to trial March 13. If convicted, Mills and Berlusconi could be sentenced to between three and eight years in prison, according to prosecutors.

Berlusconi's lawyer, Niccolo Ghedini, said the decision to open another trial against Berlusconi was expected, but he expressed disappointment the judge didn't wait for a higher court to decide on whether he should step aside.

"Everything went as we thought it would. It is like scripted," Ghedini said outside the courtroom.

DOJ_NMG_0089270

He noted that two requests were pending to higher courts for Paparella to step aside in the case — leaving open the possibility if one or the other succeeds that the charges will supersede their statute of limitations, which runs out in February 2008. "This is not what we want. We want an acquittal," Ghedini said.

Mills' Italian lawyer, Federico Cecconi, said there was no evidence to support the charges.

"In the trial we will highlight that there is no evidence that there has been illicit payments on the part of Mediaset group," Cecconi said.

Berlusconi has a long history of legal troubles linked to his business interests based in Milan.

In past cases, he was either acquitted or cleared of the charges because the statute of limitations had expired. He has always maintained his innocence.

Pinochet Is Placed Under House Arrest (AP)

AP, October 31, 2006

Former dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet was placed under house arrest and indicted for the first time on torture charges for abuses at a secret detention center where President Michelle Bachelet and her mother were once held, the judge handling the case reported Monday.

Two court officials notified Pinochet at his suburban Santiago mansion of the decision by Judge Alejandro Solis, who on Friday had charged Pinochet with one homicide, 35 kidnappings and 24 cases of torture at Villa Grimaldi, one of the most infamous detention centers in the early years of his 1973-1990 dictatorship.

Pinochet's chief defense lawyer, Pablo Rodriguez, had said he will appeal Solis' ruling "all the way to the Supreme Court if necessary. We will use all the legal means at our disposal."

Rodriguez insisted the 90-year-old former military ruler is unfit to stand trial because of poor health. Pinochet has been diagnosed a mild dementia, has sustained several minor strokes, suffers from diabetes and arthritis and needs a pacemaker.

Pinochet has been indicted on human rights charges several times before, but this is the first time he faces torture charges.

Chile On Trial (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

VILLA GRIMALDI, in a suburb of Santiago, Chile, was where in the mid-1970s enemies of dictator Augusto Pinochet were sent to disappear. Thousands of his political opponents — including Chile's current president, Michelle Bachelet — were interned and tortured there by the secret police; many were never seen outside its walls again.

On Monday, the 90-year-old Pinochet was placed under house arrest for allegedly ordering the horrific human rights abuses that took place at Villa Grimaldi. It was his fifth arrest since 1998, but this is the first time he has been indicted on torture charges. Pinochet is in poor health, is believed to suffer from mild dementia and has repeatedly been ruled unfit to stand trial. But a judge has determined that Chile's ex-ruler is fit to face justice in this case.

Whatever happens in these proceedings, it is clear that Pinochet, at this late stage in his life, is unlikely to be held accountable for his actions. What is more dismaying is the degree to which many in Chile continue to defend the general's brutal actions when he ran the country from 1973 to 1990.

Indeed, it has taken accusations of financial improprieties to taint Pinochet, once hailed as an austerity-embracing, selfless anti-communist, in the eyes of Chilean conservatives. Reports in recent years that the general had stashed millions of dollars in a secret account at Washington-based Riggs Bank were more devastating to his legacy, bizarrely enough, than the illegal disappearance of thousands of dissidents.

Last week, documents allegedly showing that Pinochet had stashed nine tons of gold valued at $160 million in a Hong Kong bank were dismissed as cheap forgeries. But the episode may be another distressing sign of how even Pinochet's opponents feel as though they need to accuse him of corruption in order to forge a consensus against him. We can only hope that the latest round of proceedings against Pinochet will allow some of his victims to testify against him, and thus may offer up a mirror for all of Chilean society to come to terms with its dark past.

Call For Caution Over By Migrants' Cash (FT)

By Richard Lapper, Latin America Editor

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

The World Bank will on Tuesday urge policymakers to take a more cautious approach towards the development potential of remittances, the multi-billion dollar financial flows sent home by migrant workers in North America, Europe and Asia.

DOJ_NMG_0089271

In a report analysing their significance in Latin America and the Caribbean, bank economists argue that remittances are not "manna from heaven", that the benefits have been "overestimated" and that associated social and economic costs in developing countries have not been taken into account.

"Remittances are an engine for development but they are not a substitute for sound national policies in the countries," said Humberto López, World Bank senior economist for Latin America and the Caribbean, and co-author of the report. "Although positive, the impact of remittances on poverty and inequality is in most cases quite modest."

Remittances have risen sharply in recent years, reaching $167bn (€131bn, £88bn) worldwide in 2005 and accounting for roughly a third of all financial flows to developing countries. They help poor families meet basic food, education and health needs. In Latin America – one of the regions most benefiting from the trend – there has been growing interest in their potential as a source of investment capital. A report published this month by the Inter-American Development Bank showed that a growing number of recipient families were using remittances to invest in homes and small businesses.

The World Bank highlights the macro-economic impact of remittance flows, especially in the small economies of Central America and the Caribbean where they typically equal more than 10 per cent of economic output, and in Haiti amounted to 52.7 per cent of GDP in 2004.

But it suggests that the impact of these flows on development is limited. In a detailed analysis of the 1991-2005 period, it found that for each 1 per cent increase in the ratio of remittances to GDP the fraction of the population living in poverty was reduced by about 0.4 per cent. In addition, the 1.6 per cent jump of these flows as a share of GDP from 1991 to 2005 is estimated to have led to an increase of 0.27 per cent in per capita GDP growth.

Although these benefits are real, the report argues that more needs to be done to increase the positive economic impact. For example, it would be beneficial to increase the access of migrant families to the financial system. Relatively few recipients have bank accounts (although the number tends to be larger than for the population as a whole) and even fewer have access to credit, for example.

At the same time, the report says policymakers must be alert to the negative consequences of high rates of migration and remittance flows. Remittances in some cases simply replace earnings that migrants would have made had they stayed at home. Migration can also lead to labour shortages.

Some parts of the region are suffering from a "brain drain". In Haiti and the English-speaking Caribbean countries, 80 per cent of college graduates are living abroad, the report says.

To End Uganda's Nightmare (WP)

By John Edwards

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

At a moment of tremendous global hardship -- from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan to the killing fields of Darfur -- it is rare to find hope. So when there is the possibility for peace, we must seize it. That's why one of the world's great tragedies, the conflict in Northern Uganda, deserves our attention.

It is perhaps the worst humanitarian catastrophe to have gone practically unnoticed by most of the world. The two decades of violence in Northern Uganda have had devastating consequences -- nearly 2 million people have been run out of their homes and forced to live in overcrowded, squalid camps; tens of thousands have died; 30,000 children have been abducted by an organization called the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) and forced to fight as child soldiers or used as sex slaves. Hundreds of villages have been abandoned and destroyed.

To witness the ravaging of Northern Uganda is searing. But meeting its people inspires hope. During a recent visit, I went to the Palabek-Kal camp, where thousands have been crammed into a makeshift village. Hearing their stories of suffering and survival made two points abundantly clear: They are praying for peace every moment, and they expect the world community to do everything possible to help them achieve it. Their yearning was deeply moving, and their collective intensity and faith to build a better future in the midst of such hardship was powerful.

In areas where security is improving and people are beginning to go home, the challenges are just beginning. First among them is the need for adequate access to clean water and sanitation. The rehabilitation and reconstruction of schools, health clinics and other basic infrastructure are equally critical.

Yet before people will feel safe to go home, there must be peace. The talks between the government of Uganda and the LRA offer an unprecedented opportunity to secure a lasting peace in this long and deadly conflict. A cease-fire was signed at the end of August, but as was made clear during my discussions there, it is very fragile. As these African-led negotiations continue, the United States and the international community must step forward to support the talks -- not stand on the sidelines and hope for the best.

First, the United States and the United Nations should offer whatever support outside mediators, led by the government of southern Sudan, require. In particular, assistance in monitoring the cease-fire and the assembly of LRA fighters at two agreed-upon sites in southern Sudan would be critical to boosting the confidence of both sides -- while also holding them accountable to their commitments.

Second, the United States should publicly voice its support of the peace talks and encourage the Ugandan government and the LRA to maintain their commitment to the process. It's understandable that Uganda's government is skeptical of the LRA's intentions, given the atrocities that organization has committed. Yet this is the closest the two sides have ever come to a comprehensive agreement. Uganda needs to know that Washington stands behind the drive for peace and will be a supportive ally after an accord is signed.

Third, the key donors -- the United States, European countries and the United Nations -- must come together and make clear their commitment to providing the financial assistance necessary to help victims rebuild their homes and villages. This will create incentives for both sides and, just as important, lay the foundation for long-term reconstruction and reconciliation -- not only in Northern communities that have been terrorized by the LRA but also between Northern and Southern Uganda. Once the agricultural breadbasket of Uganda, the North has been marginalized and impoverished for decades. It must be integrated more fully into the country.

Finally, the United States and the international community must fulfill their pledges to help southern Sudan recover after more than 30 years of its own war. Peace and reconstruction in Northern Uganda have to be supported by reconstruction and development in neighboring southern Sudan, which is critical for regional economic recovery and cross-border trade.

In a world of unending troubles for the United States, few would argue that Northern Uganda's future is among the most urgent strategic challenges. But our actions in coming weeks will be a critical test of our global leadership. How we act -- and if and how we lead -- will send a message throughout Africa and the rest of the world about what America stands for. We must not sit idly by as Uganda's people strive for peace.

The writer, a former Democratic senator from North Carolina and the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee, traveled to Uganda recently with the International Rescue Committee.

Victory For Lula (WP)

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

LUIZ INACIO Lula da Silva overcame some formidable negatives to win reelection as Brazil's president on Sunday, including a squalid series of corruption scandals and a lackluster record of growth during the past four years by Latin America's largest economy. But the reasons for his victory are mostly positive. The former metalworker and union leader, universally known simply as Lula, has been able to mobilize millions of Brazil's poor, who previously were largely excluded from the country's developing economy and democracy. Many of those people have seen tangible improvement in their lives thanks to Lula's policies, which have lifted some 8 million people out of poverty in a country of 185 million.

Lula's achievements have come without the populist trappings, irresponsible fiscal policies or erosion of democracy seen in other Latin American countries -- most notably, neighboring Venezuela. Brazil's often precarious finances are in better shape today than four years ago. International Monetary Fund loans have been paid off, inflation is a mere 4 percent and the country has $60 billion in foreign reserves. Poverty reduction has come about largely because of an innovative program under which the government provides poor families with a monthly cash subsidy if they meet certain requirements, such as sending their children to school and having them vaccinated.

With four more years to work with, Lula's challenge will be finding ways to tackle the big problem he failed to address: Brazil's sluggish growth. Redistribution of wealth is important in one of the world's most economically unequal societies, but Brazil can't prosper when it is growing at a rate below 3 percent, or less than half the rate of other emerging economies. Economists in and outside Brazil largely agree about what is needed: reductions in the sprawling state bureaucracy and runaway government spending, and in Latin America's highest taxes.

Unfortunately, the president hasn't shown much inclination to tackle these tasks. During his runoff campaign against a centrist former state governor, Lula ranted against what he said was the danger that Brazilian state companies and banks would be privatized. In fact, such privatizations are needed, as are more steps to liberalize trade and encourage foreign investment.

Lula campaigned against Brazil's foreign creditors four years ago, then surprised them by adopting orthodox fiscal policies after he took office. He would be wise to take the same course now and tackle the reform of the state, even while continuing programs for the poor. He has the opportunity to propel himself, and Brazil, into a position of leadership in Latin America by demonstrating how poverty can be addressed by sensible and sustainable policies rather than ruinous populism.

TERRORISM NEWS:

An Administration Ally Goes Off-Message (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

Sensing GOP vulnerability, the Democrats' campaign ads focus on voter unhappiness with the Iraq war. The Republicans, in turn, prefer to talk about keeping us safe from terrorism.

So eyebrows popped up last week when none other than Richard Perle , former Reagan assistant secretary of defense , former Bush brain-truster on the Defense Policy Board, and a key promoter of the war to find Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, blistered the administration as "dysfunctional" when it comes to stopping someone from bringing "a nuclear weapon or even nuclear material into the United States."

Richard Perle called the Bush administration "dysfunctional." (Roger L . Wollenberg - Upi)

"Knowing that there are people who wish to do that," Perle said, "knowing they are seeking weapons of mass destruction, you would think that we would have put in place a system or at least be working assiduously in the development of a system that would allow us to detect nuclear material entering the New York Harbor or Boston Harbor or what have you.

"But we haven't done that," he said at a Center for Strategic and International Studies gathering. "And the reason we haven't done that is hopeless bureaucratic obstruction. Somebody needs to shake that loose." Perle added that while some have tried to overcome the bureaucracy, no one has succeeded.

"I think we have an administration today that is dysfunctional," Perle said. "And if it can't get itself together to organize a serious program for finding nuclear material on its way to the United States, then it ought to be replaced by an administration that can."

But President Bush , Perle emphasized, is not to blame for this sorry state of affairs. "I haven't the slightest doubt that if one could . . . put this proposition to the president, he would first be shocked to learn that we don't have the capability. Secondly, [he] would immediately order that we develop it."

Shocked? Well, let's see. Bush . . . Bush . . . Ah, yes, 202-456-1414.

Top-Shelf Tickets for a Cabinet Secretary

A coach-flying-government-employee Loop Fan reports that United Flight 915 from Paris on Saturday was delayed briefly during the boarding process to allow a small group of VIPs to get on.

So who might these folks have been? Secretary of Veterans Affairs Jim Nicholson , returning home from important conferences in Paris. Our caller was surprised to see Nicholson and his wife, Suzanne, not just in business class but in first class. Two agency aides were seated in business class. Nicholson's security detail was appropriately placed for security.

"The airline gave away their seats," a VA spokeswoman explained yesterday, "and couldn't get them back. So they bumped them up from business." Nicholson paid for his wife's ticket.

Nicholson was overheard chatting with an airline employee in what sounded like very good French. We were told he picked that up when he was an Army Ranger in Vietnam so he could work with his Vietnamese counterpart.

72 Muslim Workers Barred From Paris Airport (NYT)

By Katrin Bennhold

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 31 — The French authorities charged with assessing security risks at Charles de Gaulle airport have stripped 72 Muslim workers of their access badges because they had traveled to Pakistan or Afghanistan, or were suspected of having links to extremists, according to a government official who oversees the airport.

Several are suspected of having trained in terrorist camps in Pakistan and Afghanistan, though a mere trip to one of those countries would be enough for a revocation, said the official, Jacques Lebrot. One of the suspended workers, he added, was a friend of Richard Reid, the so-called shoe bomber.

About a dozen other workers have been notified that they are considered security risks, but remain on their jobs pending questioning, Mr. Lebrot said. The unions representing them said some were still cleaning planes and handling baggage.

Mr. Lebrot did not present any evidence against the workers, saying that would compromise French intelligence sources. But France's largest union filed a discrimination lawsuit in mid-October over the revocations, and at least 10 airport workers who lost their jobs have sued separately to regain their security clearance.

Among those still working is Hassane Tariqui, 37, a French citizen who was born in Morocco and supervises cleaners inside passenger planes, most of them bound for the United States. On Sept. 21, he received a letter from the authorities saying that his "attitude" and "personal behavior" posed a risk to airport security, but it did not specify how.

"If they really think I am a security risk, why am I still allowed to work here?" said Mr. Tariqui, who has been employed at the airport for 16 years. He said he was not a radical, nor even an especially devout Muslim, although he has made a pilgrimage to Mecca.

Mr. Lebrot said that some of the employees who received the letter were still working because they had not yet been interviewed. Those who lose their security clearance at the airport are at risk of dismissal by the private companies that employ them, like Air France and FedEx.

All who received the letter came to the attention of intelligence services in an antiterrorist investigation at French airports ordered by the Interior Ministry in May 2005, Mr. Lebrot said, and 72 had their security clearance revoked after questioning. Sixty-eight more people were investigated and cleared, Mr. Lebrot said.

The United States Homeland Security Department declined to comment on the development. "It's the government of France's jurisdiction," said a spokeswoman, Joanna Gonzalez.

The airport, north of Paris, is near suburbs with Muslim populations where rioting erupted last year. Unions estimate that at least a fifth of the airport's 83,000 employees are Muslim.

Mr. Lebrot, the deputy prefect in the Seine-St.-Denis district, where the airport is located, said the letters singled out employees suspected of links with movements or people who rejected "France and our values," or who were suspected of traveling to Pakistan and Afghanistan. Some are believed to have spent time in terrorist training camps and extremist Koranic schools in the two countries, Mr. Lebrot said.

One employee, he said, was discovered to have been a friend of Mr. Reid, a London-born convert to Islam who tried to blow up a flight from Paris to Miami in 2001 using explosives hidden in his shoe. Mr. Reid is now serving a life sentence in Colorado.

Another man is believed to have been close to a senior figure in the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, an Algerian terrorist group with links to Al Qaeda, Mr. Lebrot said.

Muslim organizations and human rights groups have accused the authorities of waging an anti-Muslim campaign in a presidential election year, while some terrorism experts say the government risks being too slow in removing security threats. "We need an emergency procedure to revoke badges, provided that the intelligence that calls the security of an employee into question is serious," said Alain Marsaud, a lawmaker and former antiterrorism chief.

But Eric Moutet, a lawyer for some of suspended workers, said "We have not seen any objective evidence against our clients. The only common denominator we see today is that they are all Muslim."

Mr. Lebrot insists that the decision to bar some airport employees has nothing to do with their religion.

"Monsieur or Madame X who goes to pray in the mosque and travels to Mecca for the pilgrimage is not a problem for us," he said.

Plotter Worked in London Tube

LONDON, Oct. 31 (AFP) — Critics accused London transportation authorities of a security gaffe Tuesday after learning that the son of a notorious radical imam had worked on the underground train network.

Mohammed Kamel Mostafa, 25, was jailed for three years in Yemen starting in 1999 for plotting a bombing campaign, but worked for a subcontractor of the subway's maintenance company. Mr. Mostafa is the son of Abu Hamza, the former imam of the Finsbury Park mosque in north London who was sentenced to a seven-year jail term in February.

A series of attacks by four suicide bombers on three underground trains and a bus in London on July 7 last year killed 52 commuters.

Would-be Bomber Planned DSHS Building Strike (KXLY)

KXLY-TV, November 1, 2006

SPOKANE -- A man who threatened to blow up a Spokane DSHS facility earlier this summer will face federal charges, an FBI sgent confirmed Tuesday afternoon.

DOJ_NMG_0089280

Anthony Garver will face federal charges for possession or receipt of firearms or ammunition by a person adjudicated as mentally defective, according to FBI Special Agent Norm Brown.

The charges stem from the relevation earlier this summer after Garver told a fellow inmate at the Spokane County Jail about his plan to blow up the DSHS office located at 1313 Maple Street. The plan included setting off a primary device and then a secondary once officials arrived after the first one detonated.

Tony Dawson, the inmate who Garver talked about his plans with, tipped off authorities who later found during their investigation that Garver had a variety of items including ammunition, knives, a GPS unit, police scanner and bomb-making recipes saved on a computer, which was enough for the FBI to launch an investigation into Garver.

Garver was placed under a 90-day evaluation at Eastern State Hospital in late August.

Bombing Suspect May Have Written Letter To Police (KTVX)

KTVX-TV, November 1, 2006

The man accused of bombing the Salt Lake City Library in September may have also written a letter to police claiming responsibility for the crime.

The author also promises more attacks in the future according to the FBI. The letter was addressed to Chief of Police Chris Burbank one week ago.

Thomas James Zajac, 53, is behind bars in Illinois awaiting extradition to Salt Lake City to face bombing charges here, police are trying to find out if he was the one who wrote the letter.

In the letter, the author gives details about the materials used to construct the bomb. The letter writer also tells police someone close to him was a victim of police brutality in Salt Lake City, he or she goes on to say if they see more cases of police brutality they will return and bomb again.

Right now Zajac, who lives in Illinois, is a person of interest in two separate bombings in the western suburbs outside of Chicago, including a bombing in Downers Grove in 2004 and Hinsdale just two weeks before the Salt Lake City bombing.

The Chief of Police in Hinsdale is quoted in the Chicago Tribune as saying that his department received a letter after the explosion there, and he tells reporters it is very similar in content and style to the letter received by Salt Lake City Police.

Zajac is accused of setting off a pipe bomb at Salt Lake City's main library on September 15th. The library was evacuated but no one was hurt and the bomb caused only minimal damage.

Zajac is being held in an Illinois jail and will be extradited back to Utah, possibly in 5 days.

ATF Investigates Whether SLC Library Bomb Suspect Linked To Illinois Blast (SLT)

By Nate Carlisle

Salt Lake Tribune, November 1, 2006

Investigators are probing whether the suspect in a Salt Lake City library bombing is linked to an explosion at a train station in suburban Chicago, a federal agent said Tuesday.

Lori Dyer, the resident agent in charge of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives in Salt Lake City, said Thomas Zajac's fingerprints are being tested against evidence connected to a bomb that detonated in Hinsdale, Ill.

That bomb exploded Sept. 1 - the same month as the library bomb - in a trash can at a commuter train station, according to the Daily Herald in suburban Chicago. No one was injured.

Federal authorities on Friday in Utah filed a criminal charge against Zajac that accuses him of planting a bomb Sept. 15 at the main branch of the Salt Lake City Public Library. The explosion destroyed a window but hurt no one.

The FBI arrested Zajac Friday at his home in Oakbrook Terrace, Ill. He is awaiting extradition to Utah.

Dyer said Zajac might have allegedly planted the Salt Lake City bomb in retaliation for his son apparently having been arrested, but added that's just one theory.

"I think we're still sorting through some things to figure out what the [alleged] motive is," Dyer said.

Salt Lake City police spokesman Joe Cyr said Tuesday the department cannot find Lawyer: Woman In Nuclear Probe Not A Spy (FWST)

By Deborah Baker

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, November 1, 2006

SANTA FE, N.M. - The woman who lived in a home where classified material from Los Alamos National Laboratory was seized by authorities wasn't a spy - she was just trying to do her job for the lab, her lawyer said Tuesday.

The FBI began investigating a security breach at the nuclear weapons laboratory after police seized three portable computer storage drives during a drug bust at Jessica Quintana's home on Oct. 17.

Her attorney, Stephen Aarons, said Quintana formerly worked in a secure area called a vault at the lab, scanning hard copies of documents into an electronic format and then indexing them so they could be searched by title or author.

"It's not espionage. It's a 22-year-old ... that mishandled documents, and it doesn't appear that third parties got hold of them," Aarons said.

"Her only intent was to work with these documents herself, and to get them indexed in a timely fashion. ... She was working with these documents and she shouldn't have left the facility with them, but apparently she did."

Lab Director Michael Anastasio confirmed last week that classified information was seized from the home, but he didn't provide any details. Lab officials aren't discussing the investigation.

Quintana had worked for a lab subcontractor until she was laid off recently. She was working for a child care program at the YMCA when the flash drives were taken by authorities, but was fired from that job.

Authorities searched the home and arrested a man who was renting a room there on drug and probation violation charges. Quintana, who was not at home at the time, has not been charged.

Stone said that one of the USB flash drives was his, and that he had traded it for methamphetamine. He said the FBI told him it contained pornography. He has denied any knowledge of lab documents.

Aarons said that Quintana knows enough to be able to index the documents, but that she did not necessarily understand their significance. He also said that although the documents were classified, he did not believe they fell into the category of "top secret."

"It's our belief that she did not handle - and therefore mishandle - any top secret documents," he said.

Intelligence Agencies Launch 'Intellipedia' (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The CIA and other U.S. intelligence agencies have created a new computer system that uses software from a popular Internet encyclopedia site to gather input on sensitive topics from analysts across the spy community, part of an effort to fix problems that plagued prewar estimates on Iraq.

The new system, dubbed "Intellipedia" because it is built on open-source software from the Wikipedia Web site, was launched earlier this year. It is already being used to assemble intelligence reports on Nigeria and other subjects, according to U.S. intelligence officials who on Tuesday discussed the initiative in detail for the first time.

After being criticized for downplaying dissenting views on Iraq's alleged weapons programs, "we're trying to transform the way we do business," said Michele Weslander, a senior official overseeing the initiative for the director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte.

The system allows analysts from all 16 U.S. intelligence agencies to weigh in on debates on North Korea's nuclear program and other sensitive topics, creating internal Web sites that are constantly updated with new information and analysis, officials said.

The system, which is not accessible to the public, is divided into three classification categories ranging from "sensitive but unclassified" to "top secret." Officials said that the program is still under development and has not replaced existing procedures used to create intelligence reports delivered to President Bush and other policymakers. But it is being used to assemble preliminary judgments for a forthcoming National Intelligence Estimate on Nigeria and could someday supplant the more cumbersome mechanisms used to create such reports.

"I think in the future you'll press a button and this will be the NIE," said Michael Wertheimer, assistant deputy director of national intelligence for analysis.

The system is based on the software used by millions of Internet users to create encyclopedia entries at www.wikipedia.org. But unlike that largely anonymous environment, the individuals who add material to pages on the intelligence system have to attach their names to their contributions.

More than 3,600 analysts and other intelligence officials have registered to use the service since it was launched in April, officials said.

In a meeting with reporters at the Office of the Director for National Intelligence, officials showed how analysts from multiple agencies had used the network to post frequent updates on recent events, including the crash of a small plane into a New York City apartment building last month and North Korea's test of a missile in July.

Officials said they were not making the network available to members of Congress or other policymakers, largely because of a reluctance to disseminate material that analysts view as a work in progress.

The officials acknowledged some concerns, including the possibility that making sensitive information available to a much larger group of intelligence officials could increase the risk that secrets might be leaked to the press. They said that partly for that reason, detailed information obtained from satellites or from human sources is being kept off the system.

But they stressed that disseminating material to the widest possible audience of analysts is key to avoiding mistakes like those that contributed to erroneous assessments that Iraq possessed stockpiles of banned weapons and was pursuing a nuclear arsenal.

One official said that dissenting views that were treated as footnotes in prewar estimates on Iraq will be much more prominent on the new system, and that doubts about sources are likely to surface earlier and be more difficult to ignore.

"It moves us away from homogenized intelligence," said Sean Dennehy, a CIA official involved in creating the new system.

Student Unleashes Uproar With Bogus Airline Boarding Passes (WP)

By Brian Krebs

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

Christopher Soghoian said he was simply trying to highlight a flaw in the nation's airline security procedures when he put a tool on his Web site letting anyone create fake boarding passes, but federal authorities didn't see it that way.

FBI agents visited the 24-year-old doctoral candidate's home in Bloomington, Ind., Friday and returned on Saturday to cart off his computers and other equipment. While Soghoian has not been charged with a crime, the incident has stirred a national tempest and renewed concerns about passenger screening procedures.

Soghoian, a Virginia native and student at Indiana University's School of Informatics, declined to comment yesterday on the advice of his attorney. But he has been writing about the incident on his Web site.

"I came back today, to find the glass on the front door smashed," Soghoian wrote on Saturday. "Inside, is a rather ransacked home, a search warrant taped to my kitchen table, a total absence of computers -- and various other important things."

Wendy Osborne, a special agent with the FBI's Indianapolis field office, confirmed that a search warrant was executed at Soghoian's home but declined to discuss the case further because she said it had been sealed.

Osborne said that the FBI would investigate jointly with the Transportation Security Administration and then decide whether charges would be filed.

Reached at his home in Charlottesville, Stephen Soghoian, Christopher's father, defended his son's actions. "Chris was only pointing out that the government is not using its resources in a good way to provide real public safety at airports," the elder Soghoian said. "Instead, what they're doing is probably best described as security theatre."

The feature Christopher Soghoian created, which was removed from his Web site Friday night, allowed anyone to type in their name and flight information and print a boarding pass for Northwest Airlines. The bogus passes might help a terrorist get past the initial security checkpoints, Soghoian wrote, but probably would not let a terrorist board a plane. That's because at the departure gates, boarding passes are screened electronically and compared against the airline's passenger list.

Amy Kudwa, a spokeswoman for the TSA, declined to say whether the agency was considering changing check-in procedures because of the incident. She said that while the fake boarding pass generator "had the potential to promote illegal activity, it will not aid anyone in circumventing airport security."

She added: "The TSA assures that every person is thoroughly screened at the checkpoint for dangerous weapons or explosives. There are many layers of security at the nation's airports, including many methods that are not obvious to the casual observer."

Last week, Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) publicly called for the arrest of Soghoian and the shuttering of his site. But on Sunday, Markey praised Soghoian's actions as a public service that called attention to a security weakness.

"He picked a lousy way of doing it, but he should not go to jail for his bad judgment," Markey said. "Better yet, the Department of Homeland Security should put him to work showing public officials how easily our security can be compromised."

Markey said yesterday that the TSA was contradicting itself by saying fake boarding passes were not a problem but the pass-generator was. "TSA has to make up its mind, but it can't have it both ways," he said. "Either the public is in jeopardy or it is not. If the public is not in jeopardy, then this young man should not be in jeopardy."

Markey indicated Congress might have to act if the TSA doesn't. "I think TSA should close the loophole," he said. "We shouldn't have to wait until a new Congress reconvenes to protect the public if a loophole jeopardizes public safety."

Critics of airline security restrictions say Soghoian's site automated a loophole that others have written and spoken about for more than three years. The loophole is that boarding passes are compared to a person's ID only at initial security checkpoints, not at the gates where passengers board planes. Also, the passes are scanned and verified only at departure gates, not security checkpoints.

Bruce Schneier, a security expert and chief technical officer for Mountain View, Calif.-based Counterpane Internet Security, wrote about the loophole in 2003. To close it, he said, airports should scan boarding passes and compare passes with photo IDs at both checkpoints.

Schneier said yesterday that it would be easy for someone to use a fake boarding pass to bypass the TSA's "no-fly list," which contains the names of thousands of people whom the U.S. government has flagged as potential security or terror risks. A terrorist on the list could make a reservation in someone else's name and print a legitimate pass, along with a fake one in his real name. He'd present the fake pass and real ID at the security gate, then use the legitimate pass to board.

"I think we really need to ask why the government is shooting the messenger here when it should be spending its time fixing this obvious loophole," Schneier said.

After The Storm, Students Left Alone And Angry (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Oct. 31 — John McDonogh High School has at least 25 security guards, at the entrance, up the stairs and outside classes. The school has a metal detector, four police officers and four police cruisers on the sidewalk.

In the last six weeks, students at McDonogh, the largest functioning high school here, have assaulted guards, a teacher and a police officer. A guard and a teacher were beaten so badly that they were hospitalized.

The surge hints at a far-reaching phenomenon after Hurricane Katrina, educators here say. Teenagers in the city are living alone or with older siblings or relatives, separated by hundreds of miles from their displaced parents. Dozens of McDonogh students fend largely for themselves, school officials say.

“They are here on their own,” Wanda Daliet, a science teacher, said. “They are raising themselves. And they are angry.”

The principal, Donald Jackson, estimated that up to a fifth of the 775 students live without parents.

“Basically, they are raising themselves, because there is no authority figure in the home,” Mr. Jackson said. “If I call for a parent because I’m having an issue, I may be getting an aunt, who may be at the oldest 20, 21. What type of governance, what type of structure is in the home, if this is the living conditions?”

In a second-floor cosmetology class, two of the six girls said their parents were elsewhere.

“I don’t get to talk to her as much as I want,” one girl, Tiffany Mansion, 16, said as she looked down.

DOJ_NMG_0089284

Her mother is in Little Rock, Ark.

In the lunchroom, a shy 18-year-old who was asked whom he went home to in the evenings, said: "Nobody. Myself."

His parents are in Baton Rouge.

Mr. Jackson said many parents whom he had spoken to were in Baton Rouge, Houston or elsewhere. "That's the question that's buzzing in everybody's heads," the McDonogh curriculum coordinator, Toyia Washington Kendrick, said. "How could you leave your kids here, that are school-age kids, unattended?"

The answer is as various as the fragmented social structure, which the hurricane a year ago made even more complicated. Some students describe families barely functional even before the storm. Others say pressing economic necessity has kept parents away.

Rachelle Harrell was living in Houston, working as a medical assistant and trying to pay off a $1,300 electricity bill in New Orleans. But she yielded to her son Justin and his cousin Kiante, both 16, and sent them back to New Orleans on a Greyhound bus while she stayed in Texas.

The decision anguished Ms. Harrell, 36, even though Justin was being picked on in Houston and yearned to return to McDonogh. Justin; his sister, Eboni Gay, 18; and Kiante set up housekeeping in Ms. Harrell's old house in the Algiers neighborhood. A monthly check from his mother and a job at a fast-food restaurant helped make ends meet.

Ms. Harrell anticipated the inevitable question.

" 'Why are your children at home, and you're in Texas?' " she asked. "Well, I'm trying to get home. It's just crazy. But my kids know my situation. When school started, I had to work a couple of more weeks, because I had that light bill.

"It's like, 'Oh my God, is everything O.K.?' I couldn't even sleep at night. O.K. Lord, if anything happens, I'm going to be seen as such a bad mama, and I'm a hundred miles from home."

Last week, she left her job in Houston and returned to New Orleans — for good.

If the causes are complicated, the consequences seem evident to school officials: a large cadre of belligerent students, hostile to authority and with no worry about parental punishment at home.

Since McDonogh reopened nearly two months ago with enrollees from 5 of the city's 15 high schools, the students have committed six "very serious" assaults, Mr. Jackson said.

A young man suddenly bent over in the milling crowd waiting for a bus after school. The police were handcuffing him, for smoking marijuana, a school official said.

In the halls, students jostle one another and laugh on the way to class. In some classes, students strain attentively toward the blackboard.

But there is tension. The storm overturned their world, teachers and administrators say, destroying houses and scattering families.

"They're rebelling against authority," Ms. Daliet, the science teacher, said. "You ask them to do something, they have an attitude."

In the lunchroom and in the corridors, students are ordered to tuck in their shirts. Many just grin in response.

"When you have guidelines at home that reflect guidelines at the school, it's a seamless transition," Mr. Jackson said. "But when it's not there, you deal with a student who's genuinely, 'I don't care, I'm going to do what I want to do.' "

Fights break out daily. About 50 students have been suspended; 20 have been recommended for expulsion.

Of the 128 schools in the city, fewer half have reopened. The state took over many of them after the storm. That change, hailed at first as a bright beginning, has proven to be partly stillborn, as teachers, textbooks and supplies came up drastically short in the state-run schools.

The McDonogh library has no books. State officials, fearing mold, threw out all of them.

Rundown before the storm, the school buildings are now even more battered. The stalls in a girls' restroom have no doors.

Recrimination and finger pointing have been ample, and state officials are on the defensive.

"The same way other residents are calling it quits, teachers are no different," Leslie Jacobs, a member of the state school board, said. "The teacher shortage is real. The book shortage is real. We have a labor shortage. There is a shortage of bus drivers. The whole food-service industry is short of workers."

DOJ_NMG_0089285

Mr. Jackson is a smiling, purposeful presence, friendly but firm, upbraiding youths for slovenly dress and pursuing others along for slacking in the halls. At every turn, it can seem, an omnipresent security guard or police officer speaks to teenagers, searching for weapons or admonishing for back talk.

As a group milled on the street corner of the three-story 1911 brick building, a guard called out from the steps: "He's taken his shirt off! They're getting ready to fight!"

Mr. Jackson conceded that the scale of the unrest had taken him aback.

"I knew it would happen," he said. "I had some forewarning. But I didn't know it would be of this magnitude. We've seen things that really shouldn't occur in a school."

Several weeks ago, a teacher was "beaten unmercifully" by a ninth grader enraged at being barred from class because he was late, Mr. Jackson said. The teacher, hospitalized, has not returned to work. The student was arrested.

An 18-year-old knocked a guard unconscious. The police charged him.

The reputation for violence, first acquired through a shooting in the gymnasium in 2003 in which a young man with a rifle killed a student in front of 200 others, has grown.

Three weeks ago, a group of students summoned reporters to the school to complain about the many officers.

"We have a lot of security guards, and not enough teachers," Maya Dawson, 17, said.

Jerinise Walker, 15, added: "It's like you're in jail. You have people watching you all the time."

Mr. Jackson said the time had not come to reduce security.

"When we get our students to respond in a different way," he said, "then I can back off. We're trying to train our students to resolve conflict, and that's something they haven't been able to do."

WAR NEWS:

Rumsfeld OKs Increase In Iraqi Forces (AP-Y)

By Robert Burns

AP, November 1, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Tuesday endorsed a proposal to spend at least $1 billion to expand the size and accelerate the training and equipping of Iraqi security forces.

While the plan still must get final approval from the White House and the money would have to be approved by Congress, Rumsfeld's support underscores the Bush administration's effort to shift more of the burden of Iraq's security to that country's forces.

"I'm very comfortable with the increases they've proposed and the accelerations in achievement of some of their targets," Rumsfeld told reporters at the Pentagon, noting that the Iraqi government and Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, both recommended expanding Iraqi forces.

"Now it's simply a matter of our pressing forward and getting our portion of the funding from the Congress and working to see that it's executed," Rumsfeld said. He did not say how much extra U.S. money would be required.

So far, the U.S. government has spent roughly $10 billion on developing the Iraqi security forces, according to the latest report released by the Pentagon special inspector general who audits U.S. work in Iraq. One official, speaking on condition of anonymity, described the proposed extra money as more than $1 billion, but would not offer specifics.

Rumsfeld "approved going forward" with the proposal, which is intended to be part of an add-on to the 2007 budget, according to Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff. It will next be submitted to the White House and other government agencies for their review, Ruff said.

The defense secretary's move comes at a time when the Bush administration has been pressing Iraqi officials to agree to benchmarks with which progress in the war-torn country can be measured. The effort has produced strains with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who has resisted being portrayed as beholden to Washington.

Rumsfeld did not cite a dollar figure or reveal how many extra Iraqi forces would be developed, beyond the 325,000 target that U.S. officials say they expect to reach before year's end.

Two defense officials said Tuesday that the expected increase was far fewer than 100,000, and one official suggested it might be about 30,000. Those officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the matter publicly.

CBS News reported on Monday that Casey had recommended expanding the Iraqi security forces by as much as 100,000.

Rumsfeld said the final decision on expanding the Iraqi security forces would be announced in Baghdad.

Asked whether such an increase would mean that U.S. troops would have to stay in Iraq longer to train the extra forces, Rumsfeld said he doubted it. Nor would it necessarily require a higher number of U.S. trainers, he said.

U.S. government approval is required for any plan to expand the size of the Iraqi forces because it could not be accomplished without additional U.S. funds and the provision of U.S. trainers and U.S.-acquired equipment.

Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the top Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee, said expanding the Iraqi security forces likely means it will take more than the 12 to 18 months Casey has estimated it will take to get the Iraqis fully in control of their own security.

"Congress must have a clear explanation of why these additional forces are needed, what additional American training resources will be put in place, and how this new training plan will allow for a decreased commitment from American forces," Skelton said.

The current plan is to develop 325,000 Iraqi security forces, including the army, police and border control forces. The number trained and equipped thus far is about 310,000, and the final target is expected to be reached by year's end.

However, there are actually fewer than 310,000 Iraqi security forces who are available for duty, since about one-quarter of them are on leave or otherwise not available at any given time, U.S. officials say. Also, their effectiveness has been limited by a lack of heavy weapons and armor, by a high rate of absenteeism, and by an unwillingness of some locally recruited units to fight outside their home areas.

The Pentagon said Tuesday that there are now 150,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, up from 147,000 last week.

Rumsfeld Faces Poll Uncertainty (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, November 1, 2006

The midterm elections next week could help decide the fate of two of the most controversial Bush administration officials, Donald Rumsfeld, the defence secretary, and John Bolton, the ambassador to the United Nations.

Mr Bolton, the hardline official known for his abrasive approach who was given a “recess” appointment last year after the Senate failed to approve his nomination, might only have three weeks or so left in office if, as is generally expected, the elections result in a swing to the Democrats. Mr Rumsfeld, on the other hand, is coming under increased fire from Republicans for his handling of the Iraq war.

When a recess appointment expires is not precisely defined, and it has been reported that Mr Bolton will stay until January before the next session of Congress begins. But two officials told the FT that, unless the Senate confirmed him, Mr Bolton’s term would end when Congress recessed after the elections, which is likely to happen before Thanksgiving on November 23.

Mr Bolton could leave at a crucial moment in negotiations over a Security Council sanctions resolution to be imposed on Iran, which the Bush administration hopes to settle before Thanksgiving.

Mr Rumsfeld faces a different problem. The two-time defence secretary will next month overtake Robert McNamara, the Vietnam-era Pentagon chief, as the longest-serving holder of the office. But Mr Rumsfeld is facing increased criticism over the violence in Iraq.

A group of retired generals earlier this year took the rare step of publicly calling for his resignation.

In his latest book, Washington Post journalist Bob Woodward reported that Andrew Card, former chief of staff to Mr Bush, and Laura Bush, the president’s wife, had both urged Mr Bush to replace his defence secretary. A recent CNN poll found that 52 per cent of Americans believed Mr Bush should fire Mr Rumsfeld, compared with only 39 per cent six months ago.

DOJ_NMG_0089287

A former senior administration official said Mr Rumsfeld might leave if the Iraq Study Group – a bipartisan commission led by James Baker, former secretary of state and close friend of Mr Bush's father – comes up with radical policy suggestions for Iraq.

Another influential Republican with close ties to the White House said the consensus among Republican insiders was that Mr Rumsfeld would remain only until next summer. That would provide enough time after the elections to avoid the impression he was going because of the war, and also allow time for the situation on the ground to improve.

But Peter Brookes, a former senior Pentagon official under Mr Rumsfeld, said that while a Democrat victory in the elections would prompt Republicans into wielding "long knives", Mr Bush was unlikely to waver in his support for Mr Rumsfeld, partly out of loyalty, and partly because it would be counter-productive to change horses mid-stream.

U.S. Central Command Charts Sharp Movement Of The Civil Conflict In Iraq Toward Chaos (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 30 — A classified briefing prepared two weeks ago by the United States Central Command portrays Iraq as edging toward chaos, in a chart that the military is using as a barometer of civil conflict.

A one-page slide shown at the Oct. 18 briefing provides a rare glimpse into how the military command that oversees the war is trying to track its trajectory, particularly in terms of sectarian fighting.

The slide includes a color-coded bar chart that is used to illustrate an "Index of Civil Conflict." It shows a sharp escalation in sectarian violence since the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February, and tracks a further worsening this month despite a concerted American push to tamp down the violence in Baghdad.

In fashioning the index, the military is weighing factors like the ineffectual Iraqi police and the dwindling influence of moderate religious and political figures, rather than more traditional military measures such as the enemy's fighting strength and the control of territory.

The conclusions the Central Command has drawn from these trends are not encouraging, according to a copy of the slide that was obtained by The New York Times. The slide shows Iraq as moving sharply away from "peace," an ideal on the far left side of the chart, to a point much closer to the right side of the spectrum, a red zone marked "chaos." As depicted in the command's chart, the needle has been moving steadily toward the far right of the chart.

An intelligence summary at the bottom of the slide reads "urban areas experiencing 'ethnic cleansing' campaigns to consolidate control" and "violence at all-time high, spreading geographically." According to a Central Command official, the index on civil strife has been a staple of internal command briefings for most of this year. The analysis was prepared by the command's intelligence directorate, which is overseen by Brig. Gen. John M. Custer.

Gen. John P. Abizaid, who heads the command, warned publicly in August about the risk of civil war in Iraq, but he said then that he thought it could be averted. In evaluating the prospects for all-out civil strife, the command concentrates on "key reads," or several principal variables.

According to the slide from the Oct. 18 briefing, the variables include "hostile rhetoric" by political and religious leaders, which can be measured by listening to sermons at mosques and to important Shiite and Sunni leaders, and the amount of influence that moderate political and religious figures have over the population. The other main variables are assassinations and other especially provocative sectarian attacks, as well as "spontaneous mass civil conflict."

A number of secondary indicators are also taken into account, including activity by militias, problems with ineffective police, the ability of Iraqi officials to govern effectively, the number of civilians who have been forced to move by sectarian violence, the willingness of Iraqi security forces to follow orders, and the degree to which the Iraqi Kurds are pressing for independence from the central government.

These factors are evaluated to create the index of civil strife, which has registered a steady worsening for months. "Ever since the February attack on the Shiite mosque in Samarra, it has been closer to the chaos side than the peace side," said a Central Command official who asked not to be identified because he was talking about classified information.

DOJ_NMG_0089288

In the Oct. 18 brief, the index moved still another notch toward "chaos." That briefing was prepared three days before General Abizaid met in Washington with President Bush, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to take stock of the situation in Iraq.

A spokesman for the Central Command declined to comment on the index or other information in the slide. "We don't comment on secret material," the spokesman said.

One significant factor in the military's decision to move the scale toward "chaos" was the expanding activity by militias.

Another reason was the limitations of Iraqi government security forces, which despite years of training and equipping by the United States, are either ineffective or, in some cases, infiltrated by the very militias they are supposed to be combating. The slide notes that "ineffectual" Iraqi police forces have been a significant problem, and cites as a concern sectarian conflicts between Iraqi security forces.

Other significant factors are in the political realm. The slide notes that Iraq's political and religious leaders have lost some of their moderating influence over their constituents or adherents.

Notably, the slide also cites difficulties that the new Iraqi administration has experienced in "governance." That appears to be shorthand for the frustration felt by American military officers about the Iraqi government's delays in bringing about a genuine political reconciliation between Shiites and Sunnis. It also appears to apply to the lack of reconstruction programs to restore essential services and the dearth of job creation efforts to give young Iraqis an alternative to joining militias, as well as the absence of firm action against militias.

The slide lists other factors that are described as important but less significant. They include efforts by Iran and Syria to enable violence by militias and insurgent groups and the interest by many Kurds in achieving independence. The slide describes violence motivated by sectarian differences as having moved into a "critical" phase.

The chart does note some positive developments. Specifically, it notes that "hostile rhetoric" by political and religious leaders has not increased. It also notes that Iraqi security forces are refusing less often than in the past to take orders from the central government and that there has been a drop-off in mass desertions.

Still, for a military culture that thrives on PowerPoint briefings, the shifting index was seen by some officials as a stark warning about the difficult course of events in Iraq, and mirrored growing concern by some military officers.

U.S. Military Deaths In Iraq Still Mostly Outside Capital (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And David S. Cloud

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 31 — About two-thirds of the deaths among American troops in Iraq in October occurred outside Baghdad, even with a sharp increase in combat deaths in the capital that made it the fourth deadliest month of the war for the United States, Defense Department figures show.

The October death toll, which stood at 103 by late Tuesday, was the highest since January 2005, when 107 American troops were killed.

Forty American soldiers were killed in and around Baghdad in October, double the number there just two months ago, a review of casualty reports shows.

Military officers and civilian analysts said the rise in October resulted in part from more aggressive American security operations in Baghdad, which exposed larger numbers of troops to danger. The security operation in the capital put American troops on the streets not only in greater numbers, but more often on foot patrols outside their armored vehicles, where they were more vulnerable to improvised bombs and a growing threat of snipers.

The spike in violence in the capital was accompanied by higher tolls in other parts of the country, notably in Anbar Province, where 37 Americans died and deaths have climbed steadily since this summer.

The jump in combat deaths in October mirrored the annual rise in violence that coincides with the Islamic holy month of Ramadan. Military officers and civilian analysts rejected assertions by some Bush administration officials that the insurgents had planned offensives to influence the elections in the United States next Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0089289

Hidden bombs remained the single biggest killer, and more deaths occurred throughout Iraq from such devices in October than in any previous month but one. Beyond that, more soldiers were also killed by small-arms fire and snipers than in the past, according to officials and the casualty reports.

Throughout Iraq, more American soldiers were killed by snipers in the first 10 days of October than were killed by sniper fire in all of September, according to an Army spokesman, Paul Boyce. He declined to release precise numbers.

"When you put people into urban warfare, they have to come out of their vehicles," said Anthony H. Cordesman, a military analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "No matter how you run it, if your orders are to be more active on the ground, you are more vulnerable."

Lt. Col. Jonathan B. Withington, an Army spokesman for the multinational division responsible for Baghdad and central Iraq, said casualties were high in October because there were "twice as many forces on the ground conducting operations in Baghdad." He also cited Ramadan, and said the enemy was "attempting to push back on us" in response to the new security operation.

There are now about 150,000 American troops in Iraq, and troop numbers are likely to remain at that level until the end of the year, as units rotating into the country overlap with others due to leave, according to Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros, a Pentagon spokesman.

The Department of Defense posts cumulative statistics on those killed and wounded in Iraq at its Web site www.defenselink.mil/news/, where statistics on Tuesday showed 2,258 American military personnel had been killed in Iraq in combat and 556 in nonhostile incidents. The number of troops wounded in Iraq who have returned to duty stood at 11,682, and the number of those wounded so severely that they could not return to duty was 9,737.

Statistics provided by Michael S. White and Glenn Kutler of ICasualties.org, a privately operated database that uses the Defense Department's official casualty announcements, indicated the geographical distribution of October fatalities: roughly one-third in Baghdad; one-third in Anbar Province, the restive western area that is a haven for Sunni insurgents and associates of Al Qaeda; and one-third in volatile cities to the north, including Taji, Tikrit, Samarra, Kirkuk and Mosul.

All are areas that have proven persistently difficult to pacify since the American-led invasion of March 2003.

"This was a significant month for casualties," said Lt. Col. Bryan F. Salas of the Marine Corps, the spokesman for multinational forces in Anbar. "We are in more towns, and we are clearing and holding parts of Ramadi and other cities where we haven't been before."

Mr. White also wrote, "The current spike, which is indeed the highest in a year, occurred during Ramadan, as did the last spike of comparable magnitude a year ago." He added: "This Ramadan spike is not a one-time phenomenon. It is the fourth that we have experienced since the war began."

Senior administration officials, including Vice President Dick Cheney, have acknowledged the trend of increased violence during Ramadan, but also have sought to portray this October's increase in violence as timed to the midterm election, with insurgents hoping to influence the American political process.

"It's my belief that they're very sensitive of the fact that we've got an election scheduled, and they can get on the Web sites like anybody else," Mr. Cheney said Monday in an interview with Fox News. "And I do believe that that's a part of it. I think we've also seen, of course, a higher level of violence because of Ramadan."

Michael E. O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, a policy research center, said the casualty statistics not only showed the overall strength of the insurgency, but also reflected the increase in sectarian violence and the decision over the summer by the Americans and the Iraqi government to confront killings by both organized militias and renegade insurgents.

"Now we have to juxtapose the insurgency with the strength of militias," Mr. O'Hanlon said.

More Than Ever, Insurgents Are Targeting U.S. Forces (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

Baghdad — For U.S. troops, October was a month of gritty skirmishes against fighters religiously motivated to risk their lives during the holy Muslim month of Ramadan.

DOJ_NMG_0089290

October's death toll, the highest for American forces in nearly two years, came during a period without conventional battles or catastrophic helicopter crashes.

Rather, the 103 troops killed in Baghdad and across Iraq were victims of a steady onslaught of assaults, primarily by their longtime nemeses, Sunni Arab insurgents.

The number of attacks on American forces increased in October to unprecedented levels, U.S. military officials said.

"There has been a much more considered effort to specifically target coalition and Iraqi security forces," Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the spokesman for U.S.-led forces in Iraq, told reporters in Baghdad as the month wore on. "There has been a steady increase in the number of attacks specifically against security forces."

There were 224 Iraqi security forces and 1,315 civilians killed in October.

It was a month in which U.S. forces were shot by snipers, struck by rocket-propelled grenades or lured into ambushes where they were sprayed with automatic-weapon fire from the AK-47s found in so many Iraqi homes.

Despite jamming devices, tactical adjustments and the increased armoring of military vehicles, at least 51 of the U.S. deaths resulted from makeshift bombs detonated by remote control from a comfortable distance.

At least 43 deaths occurred in Baghdad, indicating a shifting focus away from the Sunni heartland toward Iraq's capital "due to our more deliberate presence, more active involvement out there," Caldwell said last week.

U.S. forces were more exposed than usual in Baghdad because of an ongoing offensive aimed at taking back the streets from the forces of sectarian warfare — Sunni insurgents and Shiite Muslim militiamen, some allied with officials of the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government.

Though U.S. officials say the Shiite militias dominating Iraq's south pose the biggest long-term threat to the country's stability, the vast majority of the Americans were killed in Sunni-dominated areas.

The deaths in Baghdad occurred largely in Sunni-dominated neighborhoods on the west side. Thirty-seven American troops died west of Baghdad, in largely Sunni Al Anbar province. Sunni insurgents in the Euphrates River towns and cities of Iraq's desert hinterlands deem U.S. troops an occupation force and the Baghdad government, run by the nation's long-subjugated Shiite majority, little more than an American puppet.

The Marine Corps, unlike the Army, does not release information about the exact location or cause of deaths. Senior Marine officers think such information could help the enemy. The Marines, in public announcements, described at least 18 of the October deaths as "hostile" incidents in Al Anbar.

Most officials acknowledge that many of the Marine casualties in October occurred in Ramadi, the rundown provincial capital where insurgents have intimidated most Iraqi government workers into fleeing. Marines face daily threats from roadside bombs, snipers and assaults on their fortified bases.

"It's combat nearly every day," one Marine officer said, speaking on condition of anonymity. "Ramadi is where the terrorists want to establish their capital. They're armed and they're relentless."

Another 17 Americans were killed in Sunni Arab areas north of Baghdad, in and around the provincial capitals of Tikrit, Baqubah, Mosul and Kirkuk, where Kurds and Sunni Arabs are fighting for dominance.

October's death toll was the highest since the month preceding Iraq's Jan. 31, 2005, elections.

On average, the American troops who died last month were men in their mid-20s, many on patrols or combat missions in and around a jittery Baghdad full of trash fires, dust storms and morning explosions.

He died Oct. 20 in Baghdad when an improvised explosive device detonated near his vehicle during a combat patrol.

Such roadside bomb explosions in densely populated areas smash windows and cause panic among Iraqi pedestrians, drivers and residents. Wild gunfire erupts. Alarmed and confused, their eardrums shattered, U.S. troops start shooting or receive small-arms fire from hidden insurgents.

Helicopters arrive to scour the terrain for culprits and attend to the wounded and dying. Bradley fighting vehicles block off the area as the injured are ferried to medical facilities.

Iraqi PM Ends Some Joint Checkpoints (AP)

By Christopher Bodeen

AP, November 1, 2006

Exploiting GOP vulnerability in the Nov. 7 elections, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki flexed his political muscle Tuesday and won U.S. agreement to lift military blockades on Sadr City and another Shiite enclave where an American soldier was abducted.

U.S. forces, who had set up the checkpoints in Baghdad last week as part of an unsuccessful search for the soldier, drove away in Humvees and armored personnel carriers at the 5 p.m. deadline set by al-Maliki. Iraqi troops, who had manned the checkpoints with the Americans, loaded coils of razor wire and red traffic cones onto pickup trucks.

Their departure set off celebrations among civilians and armed men in Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite district controlled by the Mahdi Army militia loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Small groups of men and children danced in circles chanting slogans praising and declaring victory for al-Sadr, whose political support is crucial to the prime minister's governing coalition.

The prime minister's challenge to U.S. conduct of the war was the latest in a series of acts designed to force the American hand and test Washington's readiness to give him a greater say in securing the world's most violent capital.

Al-Maliki finds himself in a maze of conflicting political pressures. After the Bush administration unveiled a plan last week for Iraq's government to adopt timelines for progress, especially in curbing violence, al-Maliki accused Washington of infringing on national sovereignty. There was no doubt he was talking tough to show both the Americans and his political base that he would not be pushed around.

The prime minister has further said that he feels stanching bloodshed might be better handled by Iraqi forces, although his argument does not wash given the present state of his military. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld endorsed a proposal Tuesday to spend at least $1 billion to expand the size and accelerate the training and equipping of Iraqi security forces, underscoring the Bush administration's effort to shift more of the burden away from U.S. troops.

Sen. Jack Reed, a member of the Armed Services Committee, said al-Maliki was yielding to sectarian pressure and undermining U.S. efforts to curb attacks. "Today, the critical issue in Iraq is whether the Maliki government can muster the political will to confront those who use violence to destabilize Iraq," Reed, a Rhode Island Democrat, said in a statement.

Al-Maliki's move Tuesday came three days after his closest aide, Hassan al-Suneid, said unabashedly that the prime minister was trying to capitalize on American voter discontent with the war and White House reluctance to open a public fight with the Iraqi leader just before the midterm election. Much of the discontent is fueled by soaring death tolls among U.S. troops and their inability to contain raging sectarian violence 3 1/2 years after the ouster of Saddam Hussein.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of two soldiers in fighting in the Baghdad area Monday, one from small arms fire, the other from a roadside bomb. The October death toll stood at 103, the fourth highest monthly figure of the war.

More than 40 Iraqis were killed or found dead across the country Tuesday, including 11 Shiites who perished in a suicide car bombing at a wedding on the north side of the capital. Four of those killed at the bride's home were children, and among the 21 wounded were several youngsters with burns over much of their bodies.

There were conflicting reports on whether al-Maliki ordered the blockades lifted with or without prior consultation with American military officials in Baghdad.

State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said the decision was reached jointly at a meeting Tuesday among al-Maliki, Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

They agreed to make adjustments in the checkpoints because of problems with traffic and pedestrian flows in the area, the spokesman said. He said Casey ordered the actions after the meeting.

A senior American diplomat said al-Maliki issued the order after the meeting "to address the problems that resulted with the flow of traffic and the disruption of essential daily activity for the average citizens of Baghdad. This was a joint decision." The diplomat spoke on condition of anonymity.

DOJ_NMG_0089292

Defense Ministry spokesman Brig. Qassim al-Moussawi said the U.S. military was consulted, but only after al-Maliki made the decision at a meeting Tuesday with his ministers of defense and interior and the national security adviser.

Al-Suneid said the prime minister acted without checking first with the Americans because the blockades had "backfired and made the security situation in Baghdad worse. It is not important that such decisions always be made jointly."

U.S. troops have increased their presence on Baghdad streets as part of a 3-month-old security crackdown, but they had rarely set up checkpoints in the city until the U.S. soldier was abducted a week ago in the Karradah district in central Baghdad. American forces sealed the neighborhood Oct. 23 and closed Sadr City two days later, apparently believing the missing man was being held there. U.S. forces lifted the blockades in both areas Tuesday.

Al-Maliki's order came just hours after al-Sadr announced a campaign of civil disobedience in Sadr City, a district of 2.5 million people in the northeast corner of Baghdad. Armed men forced shops to close, hustled children out of schools and blocked residents from going to jobs in other parts of the capital.

As soon as news broke that the security cordon was lifted, al-Sadr supporters declared it a victory for their leader.

"If they had not lifted the siege, our strike would have spread to the rest of Baghdad tomorrow and the whole of Iraq the next day," said Jalil Nouri, a senior al-Sadr aide.

In issuing the order to lift the blockade, the prime minister said U.S.-manned checkpoints should not be established in Baghdad except during curfew hours from 9 p.m. to 6 a.m. He also said U.S. and Iraq forces would not give up on trying to calm the capital.

"Joint efforts continue to pursue terrorists and outlaws who expose the lives of citizens to killings, abductions and explosions," said the statement, issued in al-Maliki's name in his capacity both as prime minister and commander of the Iraqi armed forces.

Iraqi Demands Pullback; US Lifts Baghdad Cordon (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 31 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki demanded the removal of American checkpoints from the streets of Baghdad on Tuesday, in what appeared to be his latest and boldest gambit in an increasingly tense struggle for more independence from his American protectors.

Mr. Maliki's public declaration seemed at first to catch American commanders off guard. But by nightfall, American troops had abandoned all the positions in eastern and central Baghdad that they had set up last week with Iraqi forces as part of a search for a missing American soldier. The checkpoints had snarled traffic and disrupted daily life and commerce throughout the eastern part of the city.

The language of the declaration, which implied that Mr. Maliki had the power to command American forces, seemed to overstep his authority and to be aimed at placating his Shiite constituency.

The withdrawal was greeted with jubilation in the streets of Sadr City, the densely populated Shiite enclave where the Americans have focused their manhunt and where anti-American sentiment runs high. The initial American reaction to the order, which was released by Mr. Maliki's press office, strongly suggested that the statement had not been issued in concert with the American authorities.

"Our commanders have his press release and are reviewing how best to address these concerns," Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a military spokesman in Baghdad, said early Tuesday afternoon, about an hour after the order was issued.

Late Tuesday night, after hours of silence, a senior American Embassy official who had been delegated to return reporters' phone calls said the prime minister's order was "the result of a meeting" between Mr. Maliki, Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq. "It was essentially something that Maliki wanted to do and Casey agreed to it," the official said.

But Mr. Maliki's announcement may have been a foregone conclusion: the meeting was at 1 p.m., officials said, and the prime minister's office issued his press release at about 1:20 p.m.

DOJ_NMG_0089293

Tensions between Mr. Maliki and President Bush have been building for months. American officials have grown impatient with the Iraqi government's inability to curb Shiite militias accused of sectarian killings and to reduce the insurgent violence. For their part, Mr. Maliki and other leading Shiites have begun to chafe at American control of the military and what they view as American favoritism toward Sunnis.

Those tensions erupted publicly last week, to be followed by shows of reconciliation.

On Wednesday, Mr. Maliki challenged an American assertion that the two governments had agreed on a timetable for stabilizing Iraq. On Thursday and Friday, he issued angry comments pointedly voicing his independence from the Americans, including an account circulated by his aide of an acrimonious meeting with Mr. Khalilzad, during which Mr. Maliki was said to have told the ambassador that he was "a friend of the United States, but not America's man in Iraq." On Saturday, the White House convened a videoconference at which Mr. Maliki publicly praised President Bush.

The abrupt declaration by Mr. Maliki on Tuesday followed a visit to Baghdad on Monday by President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, who was here to discuss how to reverse the country's slide toward all-out civil war.

Violence continued to torment the country on Tuesday, including the mass kidnapping of at least 50 civilians by gunmen on a road north of Baghdad, and the announcement that 2 more American troops had been killed, raising the toll of American deaths this month to at least 103.

Mr. Maliki had been under pressure from his Shiite backers to push the Americans to lift an eight-day-old cordon around Sadr City, where American authorities believe the kidnapped American soldier is being held.

The soldier was abducted in the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karada on Oct. 23 after leaving the fortified Green Zone without authorization. Three people were detained early Tuesday in the latest raid in Sadr City as part of the manhunt, the American military said. Although the military has not released the name of the soldier, members of an Iraqi family who said they were the missing soldier's in-laws identified him as Ahmed Qusai al-Taei, 41.

Moktada al-Sadr, the powerful Shiite cleric who counts Sadr City as his greatest bastion of support and who wields considerable influence in Mr. Maliki's ruling Shiite coalition, called for a general strike in the neighborhood on Tuesday to protest the cordon. In its search for the soldier, the American military has singled out the Mahdi Army militia, which has grown increasingly fractured but still answers in part to Mr. Sadr.

Joint American-Iraqi roadblocks and checkpoints at the entrances to the neighborhood, and others erected in Karada, have caused major traffic jams, impeded commerce, turned short commutes into ordeals lasting hours and provoked the ire of Iraqis. On Monday, Mr. Sadr, who led two uprisings against American troops in 2004, threatened unspecified action if the American "siege" continued.

The wording of Mr. Maliki's statement on Tuesday seemed intended to curry political favor with the residents and power brokers of Sadr City. "Mr. Nuri al-Maliki, the general commander of the armed forces, has issued an order to remove all barriers and checkpoints and open all entrances in Sadr City and all other areas in Baghdad and ease traffic jams in these areas no later than 5 p.m. today," it said.

Under United Nations resolutions that remain in effect, the American military exercises control over American troops in Iraq, but consults closely with the Iraqi government as a partner. For that reason, the declaration appeared to be as much about Mr. Maliki's stagecraft as about practical effects on the ground.

Within an hour of the statement, American troops had already begun pulling away from the checkpoints on the edge of Sadr City, according to witnesses, though Iraqi security forces remained behind. Lt. Col. Jonathan B. Withington, a military spokesman in Baghdad, said the order would affect only the checkpoints established in the last week, not all the checkpoints manned by Iraqi security forces.

When asked whether the American withdrawal was a response to the prime minister's statement, Colonel Withington chose his words carefully: "We were ordered by our military chain of command not to impede traffic" in Karada and on the eastern access roads to Sadr City, he said.

The country's Sunni leadership condemned Mr. Maliki's decision, saying it would upend the Baghdad security plan and expose the population to greater violence. General Casey said last week that Iraqi security forces still needed at least a year before they would be ready to take over full control of the country's security.

Tariq al-Hashemi, one of Iraq's two vice-presidents and the leader of the largest Sunni Arab bloc, said the prime minister's decision "will allow the terrorists and the insurgents to move freely." He said that civilians' lives should be more important than saving a few hours during a commute.

A National Police officer posted at a checkpoint near the Habibiya Bridge entrance to Sadr City said the departure of the Americans, who had left 15 minutes earlier, would make his job more difficult. "They helped us to stop everyone," said the officer, who gave only his first name, Salam. "If we are alone, we can't say a word against certain people."

Mr. Maliki's order said that special security measures, such as the latest roadblocks, "will be carried out only during the curfew period and in emergencies." It added: "Joint efforts to track down the terrorists and outlaws who jeopardize the lives of people by killing and kidnapping will continue."

According to senior Shiite politicians close to Mr. Maliki, the Americans had been extremely reluctant, if not opposed, to withdrawing from their roadblocks and checkpoints in Karada and Sadr City.

Ali al-Adeeb, a Shiite member of Parliament and a senior member of Mr. Maliki's Islamic Dawa Party, said the prime minister had discussed the matter of the roadblocks with American officials during the past several days. In a meeting on Monday, Mr. Adeeb said, American officials had asked Mr. Maliki to give them 72 hours before issuing his order.

Hassan al-Sined, an adviser to the prime minister and a senior Dawa Party member, said he doubted that the order was coordinated with the Americans. "I don't think he got the Americans' opinion," Mr. Sined said, though he said he was not privy to details of Tuesday's meeting.

If the declaration was intended to show Mr. Maliki as a forceful and decisive leader, as far Mr. Sined was concerned, it had that effect. The order demonstrated that Mr. Maliki was "a strong and brave prime minister," he said. "He behaved like a successful prime minister."

The senior American Embassy official said that the embassy applauded the boldness of Mr. Maliki's declaration. "We're actually encouraging the prime minister to take responsibility," he said. "So trying to sound like he's a leader here in Iraq is a good thing."

Mr. Maliki was not available for comment and his spokesman, who is the only administration official authorized to speak on the prime minister's behalf, was in Kuwait on Thursday. When contacted by telephone late Tuesday, the spokesman said he had only just heard about Mr. Maliki's order and could offer no details.

The victims of the mass kidnapping north of Baghdad on Tuesday were mostly Shiites and were ambushed by gunmen as they traveled in cars along a road from the capital to Balad, according to an official in the news media office of Salahuddin Province, north of Baghdad. The gunmen stopped the cars and scrutinized the occupants' identification before abducting the victims, the official said.

The American military announced that two soldiers died in Baghdad on Monday, one when a bomb exploded next to his vehicle and the other by small arms fire. With at least 103 announced deaths, October has been the fourth-deadliest month for American troops since the beginning of the war. The other highest monthly tolls were 107 in January 2005, 135 in April 2004, and 137 in November 2004.

U.S., Iraqi Forces Lift Baghdad Slum Blockades (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, November 1, 2006

BAGHDAD — U.S. and Iraqi troops dismantled checkpoints around the capital's Sadr City slum, a Shiite militia stronghold, after an order Tuesday by Iraq's prime minister to pull back.

The directive from Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was his latest attempt to assert authority over the 4-month-old joint U.S. and Iraqi campaign to stabilize Baghdad.

U.S. and Iraqi troops cordoned off Sadr City after the Oct. 23 disappearance and apparent kidnapping of a U.S. soldier of Iraqi descent. On Tuesday, U.S. troops were searching the neighborhood and checking vehicles entering and leaving the district when they got the order to remove the checkpoints.

DOJ_NMG_0089295

Sadr City is home to 2.5 million Shiites and is the political base of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army.

Al-Maliki's government, nominally a coalition of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds, is dominated by a Shiite majority bloc. Al-Sadr's political organization is among the most powerful groups within that bloc.

The Sadr City security cordon had caused hours-long traffic backups. Residents celebrated after the blockade was lifted.

Al-Sadr had warned on Monday that his forces might retaliate in response to the security ring around Sadr City.

"If this siege continues for long, we will resort to action," he said.

Al-Maliki's office said Tuesday that he had ordered the pullback.

In a statement, the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad said U.S. and Iraqi forces opened "selected" checkpoints and crossing points after a meeting between al-Maliki, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George Casey, the U.S. commander in Iraq.

The changes were made "to address problems with the flow of traffic and the disruptions to essential daily activity for the citizens of Baghdad," the embassy said.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad, said checkpoints were pulled away in time to meet a 5 p.m. deadline set by al-Maliki.

Al-Maliki has chafed at pressure from the U.S. military and the Bush administration to force militias to disarm immediately. In recent days, he has sharply differed with U.S. statements that his government had agreed to specific goals and dates for reaching political and security aims, including disbanding sectarian militias. He also criticized a U.S.-led raid in Sadr City and vowed it would not be repeated.

"It shouldn't be surprising to see al-Maliki pushing back," said Stephen Biddle, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. "It means we're leaning on him and it's having an effect."

Al-Maliki said in a recent interview with USA TODAY that he has targeted rogue militia cells. He said he plans to disband militias later this year or early next year.

Col. Talib Abdul Razzaq, a commander with the 2nd Brigade of the Iraqi army's 6th Division, said al-Maliki's government has interfered in military operations.

The joint U.S.-Iraqi security operation underway in the capital since June has not eased violence, in part because sectarian militias remain active. Many are affiliated with political parties that are blocking efforts by security forces to confront the militias, Razzaq said.

"Every area in Baghdad is supported by a specific militia, and this militia is supported by a specific political party that's in government," he said. When security forces target militias, political groups "call the government quickly and they stop our operation."

Some U.S. military officials in Baghdad said tension between al-Maliki and U.S. officials has not interfered in their day-to-day operations. "Does the prime minister's decision appear to be influenced by al-Sadr and (the Mahdi Army)? Sure, on the surface it may look like that," said Maj. Mark Cheadle, a spokesman for U.S. troops in central and southern Baghdad. "But from our perspective, we don't feel a conflict of interest.

"At our level, there's no question of our objective: We want to get the bad guys and we want security for these neighborhoods."

Some Sadr City Barriers Removed (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki today ordered U.S. and Iraqi forces to remove roadblocks enclosing a vast Shiite Muslim neighborhood in the capital that is part of his power base.

Soon after, U.S. forces removed some of the concrete barriers that have restricted movement in and out of Sadr City since last week, when troops began searching for a missing U.S. soldier and hunting for a death squad leader in the mainly Shiite community.

DOJ_NMG_0089296

Maliki, who has engaged in tense exchanges with the Bush administration during the past week over the extent of the U.S. involvement in security matters, said in a statement that such checkpoints would only be set up at night or in emergencies.

The move came as Iraqi authorities said they were investigating reports that a busload of people had been kidnapped on a main highway between Baghdad and northern Iraq.

Witnesses said gunmen stopped three minibuses and seized more than 30 people. During the wave of sectarian violence that has gripped the country for months, kidnapping victims have often turned up dead.

Meanwhile, a car bomb outside a pre-wedding gathering in northeastern Baghdad killed at least 15 people, including four children, and injured more than 20 others. A separate bomb attack earlier killed three people at the edge of Sadr City.

Maliki's order to take down the roadblocks could help boost his political standing among Iraqis who have grown disappointed in his leadership and irritated over what they view as American meddling. Shiite militants in Sadr City earlier in the day had called a general strike to protest the checkpoints, where long queues had formed as U.S. troops stopped and searched cars.

Maliki, a Shiite, has chafed at the American role, urging President Bush last week to give Iraqi forces more leeway in dealing with armed militias after months of sectarian killing.

The prime minister criticized a raid in Sadr City last week as a sign of inadequate coordination between the two governments and asserted to Bush that he was not "America's man in Iraq."

U.S. forces had failed to locate the missing soldier and were under increasing public pressure to loosen the closures on the vast Sadr City neighborhood, with 2.5 million residents.

While some observers said the restrictions had curbed violence by impeding the movement of armed groups, many residents of Sadr City held U.S. forces at least partly responsible for a fatal bomb blast in the neighborhood Monday that killed 31 people at a crowded gathering spot for day laborers.

Residents said that U.S. and Iraqi forces had left them without effective defense by removing members of the Al Mahdi army, the militia tied to anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr.

The cleric's followers ordered businesses in the community to close in protest. Sadr warned a day earlier that his supporters would take unspecified actions unless the restrictions were eased soon.

Al-Maliki Wins Pact With U.S. To Lift Blockades (WT/AP)

By Christopher Bodeen

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki flexed his political muscle yesterday by winning U.S. agreement to lift military blockades on Sadr City and another Shi'iite enclave where an American soldier was abducted.

U.S. forces, who had set up the checkpoints in Baghdad last week as part of an unsuccessful search for the soldier, drove away in Humvees and armored personnel carriers at the 5 p.m. deadline set by Mr. al-Maliki.

Iraqi troops, who had manned the checkpoints with the Americans, loaded coils of razor wire and red traffic cones onto pickup trucks.

Their departure prompted celebrations among civilians and armed men in Sadr City, the sprawling Shi'ite district controlled by the Mahdi Army militia loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

The prime minister's challenge to U.S. conduct of the war was the latest in a series of acts designed to force the American hand and test Washington's readiness to give him a greater say in securing the world's most violent capital.

Mr. al-Maliki's move yesterday came three days after his closest aide, Hassan al-Suneid, said unabashedly that the prime minister was trying to capitalize on American voter discontent with the war and White House reluctance to start a public fight with the Iraqi leader just before the midterm election.

More than 40 Iraqis were killed or found dead across the country Tuesday, including 11 Shi'ites who perished in a suicide car bombing at a wedding on the north side of the capital. Four of those killed at the bride's home were children, and among the 21 wounded were several youngsters with burns over much of their bodies.

There were conflicting reports about whether Mr. al-Maliki ordered the blockades lifted with or without consultation with American military officials in Baghdad.

State Department spokesman Tom Casey said the decision was reached jointly at a meeting attended by Mr. al-Maliki, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Army Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

They agreed to make adjustments in the checkpoints because of problems with traffic and pedestrian flows in the area, the spokesman said. He said Gen. Casey ordered the actions after the meeting.

A senior American diplomat said Mr. al-Maliki issued the order after the meeting "to address the problems that resulted with the flow of traffic and the disruption of essential daily activity for the average citizens of Baghdad. This was a joint decision."

Defense Ministry spokesman Brig. Qassim al-Moussawi said the U.S. military was consulted, but only after Mr. al-Maliki made the decision at a meeting with his ministers of defense and interior and the national security adviser.

Mr. al-Suneid said the prime minister acted without checking first with the Americans, because the blockades had "backfired and made the security situation in Baghdad worse. It is not important that such decisions always be made jointly."

U.S. Officers Detail Problems With Iraqi Soldiers (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

U.S. military advisers are confronting difficult behavior from Iraqi soldiers, who tend to fire all their ammunition in response to a single sniper shot or go on rampages even against civilians upon witnessing the death of a colleague, according to Lt. Col. Carl D. Grunow, a former adviser to an Iraqi army armored brigade.

"The 'burst reaction' may be attributed to Iraqis experiencing denial, anger and grief all at the same time," Grunow wrote in a recent article published in Military Review, the bimonthly publication of the U.S. Army's Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan.

He attributes that reaction to the Iraqi army's experience in the "high-intensity Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s, a war with clear battle lines fought with mass military formations." At that time, Grunow writes, "Iranian human-wave assaults presented Iraqi soldiers with a target rich environment" and "battlefields covered with bodies following huge expenditures of ammunition."

His article, based on his year in Iraq, which ended in June, is in the July-August Military Review and is one of several in recent issues that have dealt forthrightly with concerns of military participants with the U.S. effort to rebuild Iraq's army during the ongoing war.

For example, Grunow writes that Iraqi units drop in strength as much as 20 percent after paydays because soldiers take leave and go home. Lt. Gen. John R. Vines, who commanded the Multi-National Corps-Iraq in Baghdad from January 2005 to January 2006, picks up that theme in an article in the most recent Military Review. "The lack of a central banking system detracted from forces available. . . . Soldiers once a month must journey back to their homes to pay debts and pass the money on to their families . . . [and] are normally gone for up to a week, with the resultant loss to the unit of ready combat power," Vines writes.

Grunow also notes that some Iraqi soldiers do not show up for training that is difficult, and he says that up to 40 percent of some Iraqi units run away in the face of dangerous situations -- without punishment. Their officers, Grunow writes, value relationships rather than results and frequently fail to notice misconduct or failure.

He argues that U.S. advisers must deal honestly with the local culture because Iraqi soldiers "are under no effective contract and they always have the option to leave the service. The only power holding them is the promise of a paycheck (not always delivered) and a sense of duty."

Not all the critiques in recent Military Affairs issues center on lessons learned abroad. Some are aimed at officials in Washington.

"The trust senior officers repose in senior civilian officials has eroded," writes F.J. Bing West, who was an assistant secretary of defense in the Reagan administration and is a frequent traveler to Iraq and a consultant to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's office. "Inside the senior levels of the military and among those who follow foreign policy, anger is directed at elected and appointed civilian officials seen as too blithe in initiating the war and too obtuse in leading once the going got tough," West writes in his article on the U.S. military performance in Iraq in the new Military Review.

"While there is no unity of military judgment about the civilian management of the war, the Bush administration has been injudicious in its consultations with the military," West writes. Both he and Grunow say a key event was the May 2003 decision to disband the Iraqi army, which was made by former Coalition Provisional Authority chief L. Paul Bremer III at the direction of the Defense Department. Grunow notes that only the Iraqi army can prevent anarchy, and West describes the disbanding as having "changed the mission of the American soldiers from liberators to occupiers."

They agree that the Iraqi army must continue to grow and that the Iraqi police must be reformed. West writes that "training alone was not the answer" for the Iraqi police. "Too many police were corrupt and controlled by Shiite militias, and senior Iraqi leaders were doing little to punish disloyalty." Sectarian issues continue to disrupt police performance, he says: "How Sunni police can be effective and not be assassinated in their own cities has yet to be shown. Conversely, the Shiite police in Baghdad have lost all trust among the Sunnis."

Vines says that even keeping track of friendly forces has been a problem. "Battle-tracking the Iraqi Army, Police, Special Police, Border Enforcement Forces and armed contractors moving around Iraq was difficult, but essential to preventing armed engagements between coalition forces," he writes.

In the Iraq theater of operations, he writes, "we had more than 300 different databases tracking friendly and enemy event data across all the warfighter functions." About 82,000 radio frequencies were used by U.S. military units, government agencies, coalition organizations and Iraqi security forces.

Syrian Official Considering Baghad Visit (AP)

By Albert Aji

AP, November 1, 2006

Syria's foreign minister is considering a visit to Baghdad in November — the first by a top Syrian official since the fall of Saddam Hussein and a major step toward restoring diplomatic relations, Iraqi and Syrian officials said Tuesday.

President Bush has called on Syria to help quell sectarian violence in Iraq, and some in the U.S., including former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, have urged the White House to make overtures to Syria to enlist its help. Syrian analysts said the visit could signal Syrian willingess to address the sectarian killings in neighboring Iraq.

Foreign Minister Walid al-Moallem is considering traveling to Iraq, said a Syrian Foreign Ministry official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to give statements to the press.

In Baghdad, an Iraqi Foreign Ministry official, who spoke on condition of anonymity for the same reason, said the ministries agreed "in principal" that al-Moallem would visit Iraq in November. Both the Syrian and the Iraqi official said no date had been set.

Imad Fawzi Shueibi, a Syrian political analyst, said the visit sends a "clear Syrian message that what is happening in Iraq — the sectarian killing and violence — is a red line for Arab national security and Syrian national security that can't be accepted by Damascus."

Damascus broke relations with Baghdad in 1982, accusing Iraq of inciting riots by the banned Muslim Brotherhood in Syria. Damascus also sided with Iran in the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq war.

Commercial ties improved during the last few years of Saddam's rule before he was overthrown in 2003, but no Syrian ministers have gone to Baghdad for more than six years.

DOJ_NMG_0089299

Syrian Deputy Foreign Minister Fayssal Mekdad said in October that al-Moallem would visit Baghdad after the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, which ended Oct. 23-24, and that he would discuss the restoration of diplomatic ties with senior Iraqi officials.

Syrian officials had said in February that Syria would exchange ambassadors with Iraq once a new Iraqi government was formed, marking the first time Damascus set a time frame for restoring full diplomatic ties.

The new Iraqi government took office in May, but there has been no exchange of ambassadors.

George Jabbour, a Syrian legislator and political analyst, said the "circumstances may be more suitable now" for the neighboring states to re-establish ties.

"This visit is expected as Syria and Iraq need each other, and Syria, no doubt, can play a calming role in Iraq and it has always announced its keenness to help Iraq's security and stability," Jabbour said.

Syria has been increasingly isolated and pressured over, among other things, allegations from the U.S. and Iraq that it does not take steps to stop foreign fighters from infiltrating across its border into Iraq.

Syria has denied the charge, countering that the U.S. military and its Iraqi allies are not doing enough to police the border.

Blair Dodges Defeat In Vote On Iraq War Inquiry (AFP-Y)

By Robin Millard

AFP, November 1, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair's government survived a potentially damaging vote in parliament on whether he should order an inquiry into how Britain joined the war in Iraq.

Opposition parties had demanded an immediate investigation by a committee of senior members of parliament into the government's handling of the build-up to the US-led March 2003 invasion.

However, the motion, proposed by the small Scottish and Welsh nationalist parties in the lower House of Commons, was defeated by 298 votes to 273, with Blair's 62-seat working majority cut to 25. The government later promised an inquiry once the situation permitted.

A dozen rebels from Blair's ruling Labour Party, largely drawn from a group known as "the usual suspects", voted against the government although other lawmakers who have previously shown dissent over Iraq fell into line.

Blair is seen by some as a lame duck after pledging to step down by September 2007 and a parliamentary defeat would have further weakened his authority and could even have hastened his departure.

In a stormy debate before the vote, Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said a defeat would signal uncertainty and endanger Britain's 7,000 troops in war-ravaged Iraq.

"We are at what could potentially be a turning point in Iraq," she told MPs, adding it was not the time "to rehash all the debates and all the arguments that have been had over and over again".

But Beckett hinted that the government may hold an inquiry at some point in the future.

"It is perfectly sensible and legitimate to say that there will come a time when these issues will be explored in the round and in full so that we can learn whatever lessons we can from them."

The Defence Secretary Des Browne went one further, saying the government would hold a "retrospective inquiry" into the Iraq war, telling the BBC: "When the time is right, of course there will be such an inquiry."

The main opposition Conservatives, who voted for military action in Iraq, backed the opposition motion Tuesday having seen their demands for an inquiry once troops come home go unheard.

"I think they came near enough to losing it that they will have taken the message that they can't ignore these concerns in the future," Conservative foreign affairs spokesman William Hague told Sky News television.

"We don't need this self-righteousness to put us back on track," he told Sky News.

In a second Commons vote, the government's amendment to the opposition motion was carried by 294 votes to 264, a majority of 30.

DOJ_NMG_0089300

It said that there had already been four independent committees of inquiry and rejected the idea of holding another one which would "divert" resources away from efforts to improve conditions in Iraq.

Tuesday's debate -- the first on Iraq for more than two years -- came after it was disclosed that the total cost of Britain's military involvement in Iraq has passed four billion pounds (six billion euros, 7.6 billion dollars).

The ministry of defence said that operations in the country cost 958 million pounds in the last financial year, a rise from 910 million in 2004-05.

Sir Menzies Campbell, the leader of the Liberal Democrats, the second-biggest opposition party, conceded that Blair had won the battle, but not the political war.

"Although the government may have won the day this evening, there is no doubt that it did so on the basis of many of its own supporters really making their support conditional," he told Sky News.

"They want to hear some change of strategy," he said, adding that he would keep pushing for an inquiry.

Welsh nationalist Adam Price, who opened the debate, told MPs: "The issue at its heart is far bigger than party politics -- it's about accountability, it's about the monumental catastrophe of the Iraq war -- the worst foreign policy disaster certainly since Suez, possibly since Munich and it's about the morass in which we regrettably still find ourselves."

Outside parliament, a group of about 200 demonstrators protested as the vote took place, carrying placards calling for British troops to leave Iraq and shouting slogans criticising Blair.

A total of 120 British troops have been killed in Iraq since the invasion.

Blair Survives Attack On War (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, November 1, 2006

London — British Prime Minister Tony Blair survived a blistering attack Tuesday on his government's handling of the war in Iraq, narrowly defeating moves to open a parliamentary inquiry into a conflict one former ally called "a huge blunder."

In a gauge of how far British public opinion has swung toward opposition to the war, Blair's majority Labor Party could muster only a 25-vote margin to defeat the measure. The inquiry would have explored suspicions over evidence used to justify the war and growing suspicions that the conflict has swirled dangerously out of control.

"We were wrong to go to war in Iraq, and we cannot wash our hands of the harm that we've done in doing so," said Labor lawmaker Gavin Strang, a former Blair ally.

"Because of his tragic misjudgment, our prime minister is more steeped in blood than any Scottish politician since Macbeth," said Peter Tapsell, the longest-serving Conservative in the House of Commons. "We need an inquiry to tell us how he led us into this disaster, and to make sure that no vainglorious and ignorant prime minister can ever do so again."

But government ministers warned that launching an inquiry now would send a message of weakness to Britain's adversaries, threaten the morale of the troops and undermine support for Iraqi attempts to build a unified and democratic nation.

"Our words in the House today will be heard a very long way away. They can be heard by our troops who are already in great danger … and by the Iraqi people, whose bravery and fortitude is humbling, and who need our support," Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett told the House of Commons.

"I have no doubt that there will come a time when we will want to look at the lessons learned from our experience in Iraq…. But now, I repeat, is not that time," she said.

Britain has 7,200 soldiers deployed in Iraq, mainly in the south near Basra, and has seen 120 soldiers die in the conflict. Another 5,600 British troops are posted in Afghanistan and facing increasingly fierce resistance from Taliban fighters there.

Tuesday's vote in the House of Commons came amid eroding British support for the war, with even a senior British military commander recently expressing doubts about the wisdom of keeping large numbers of troops deployed in Iraq much longer.

The new head of the British army, Gen. Richard Dannatt, told the Daily Mail last month that troops should leave Iraq "soon" because "our presence exacerbates the security problems" in some parts of the country.

In a Guardian/ICM poll published Thursday, 61% of respondents said they wanted British forces to leave Iraq this year, even if they have not completed their mission, and even if the U.S. wants them to stay.

DOJ_NMG_0089301

A day earlier, Beckett was asked on BBC Radio 4 whether historians may judge that Iraq had been a foreign policy disaster for Britain. Opposition lawmakers hauled out her answer during Tuesday's debate: "Yes, they may," she said. "Then again, they may not."

The debate was launched by nationalist parties from Scotland and Wales, where elections scheduled next spring threaten Labor deputies and were probably a factor in the defection of a number of Labor lawmakers in the final vote of 298 to 273. The margin was substantially short of Labor's 67-vote majority.

Blair's support for the Bush administration's policy in Iraq has been the biggest factor in a political nose-dive that prompted a recent move within the Labor ranks to force him to pledge his resignation by the end of next summer.

"On the political tombstone of the prime minister will be one word," Charles Kennedy, former leader of the Liberal Democratic Party, told the House of Commons. "Iraq."

Baby Boom Echoes In Iraq (WT)

By James Palmer

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

BAGHDAD -- In the face of relentless violence, political chaos, economic uncertainty and nightly curfews, Iraq's maternity wards are experiencing an unlikely baby boom.

Despite the obstacles, the birthrate in Iraq actually has increased since the U.S.-led invasion 43 months ago, according to the country's Health Ministry. The rate of births in the country has jumped from 29 births per 1,000 people in 2003 to 37 per 1,000 last year, according to government figures.

In neighboring Iran, the birthrate is half that -- 21 per 1,000 population, while the average birthrate in the Middle East is 25, according to the World Bank. The birthrate in the United States is about 14 births per 1,000 people, according to the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Thanaa Alladin Mohammed, a doctor who helped compile the statistics, said the Iraqi tradition of large families is primarily responsible for the birthrate.

"People want to have children, regardless of the violence," she said.

Haithem Ramdam, a 34-year-old engineer and first-time parent, agreed.

"I'm more concerned about the money needed to take care of my family than I am about the security situation," said Mr. Ramdam, whose child, a girl named Jamani, was born Oct. 2. "This is part of the cycle of life, and you can't stop it."

That cycle, Iraqis say, also drives many parents whose children have been killed by war-related violence to produce more.

Fourat Hameed, 29, watched his 3-year-old son, Youseff, die after the taxi they were riding in struck a roadside bomb near Baqouba, 40 miles north of Baghdad, in September 2003. The following year, Mr. Hameed's wife, Dunai, gave birth to a girl, and in April, they had another son, also named Youseff.

"That boy is a gift from God," said Mr. Hameed, who noted the importance many Iraqis place on bearing a son to lead the family and carry on its name. "Of course, we can never replace the child we lost, but we wanted a son."

The Iraqi Health Ministry numbers differ from those in the CIA World Factbook, which notes a slight decline in the birthrate in the years since 2000. Both sources agree, however, that Iraq's birthrate is far above the regional average, and has remained so despite the war.

As a result of the swelling birthrate in Baghdad's volatile environment, many physicians here also say they are performing more scheduled Caesarean deliveries than ever.

"Patients cannot always see their doctor or reach a health facility when they need to because of poor security," said Simone Kurchin, 38, an obstetrician at the Dominican Sisters of St. Catherine of Siena Hospital, a private facility in south Baghdad. "This is always a problem now."

According to the hospital's records, Caesarean births have more than doubled since 2003, from 1,107 to 2,447 last year, when they outnumbered natural births.

Iraqi women seeking to give birth in a hospital but unable to afford the $200 fee charged by most private facilities in Baghdad must turn to government-run hospitals. These hospitals, Iraqis say, often lack staff, equipment and medicine.

DOJ_NMG_0089302

Sabrya Fahed, whose daughter Kamel delivered her first child at the Al-Wiyah Hospital in east Baghdad on Oct. 4, said giving birth in a Baghdad hospital is more arduous now.

"I gave birth for the last time in this same hospital 11 years ago, and everything was much better then," said the 43-year-old Mrs. Fahed, who has five children. "Now everything is worse, from the treatment of the staff to the condition of the building."

And the exodus of doctors -- 10,000 since 2003, according to an estimate from the Iraqi Medical Association -- has been a serious blow to the quality of the health care system, medical officials said.

Even private hospitals, where doctors' salaries are up to three times higher than those of their counterparts at government-run facilities, are encountering problems retaining physicians.

The Dominican Sisters of St. Catherine of Siena, the private facility in south Baghdad, has lost six of its 10 obstetricians in the past three years, including Dr. Hana Al-Baea, who had been practicing for 26 months in Iraq before moving to Syria last month.

'My Country Needs Me' (WSJ)

By Heather Robinson

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

With the midterm elections fast approaching, the panic over Iraq seems more intense than ever. That country, the thinking goes, is a hopeless mess, and there could be a precipitous American withdrawal, especially if the Democrats win.

But doing so would leave the silent majority of Iraqis hostage to the most vicious extremists, abandoning those Iraqi leaders who have championed liberal democratic values. One of them is Mithal al-Alusi, a 53-year-old Sunni Arab who won a seat in parliament last December after having served as director general of the National Commission on de-Baathification. Mr. al-Alusi ran on a platform of religious pluralism, human rights, free markets and a free press. He calls for an alliance among democracies -- including the U.S., Iraq, Israel and Turkey -- to fight terrorism.

Not only does Mr. al-Alusi champion values many in the West hope will define the new Iraq, he has risked his life -- and lost more than his life -- for the cause. In September 2004 he attended a counterterrorism conference in Herzliya, Israel; after which insurgents threatened his family. The following February assassins opened fire on Mr. al-Alusi's car as it approached his Baghdad home. He wasn't in the vehicle, but his sons, 30-year-old Ayman and 22-year-old Gamal, were. Both were killed as their father watched. Still, Mr. al-Alusi was unbowed. "Even if these terrorists try to kill me again, peace is the only solution," he told reporters minutes after the attack. "Peace with Israel is the only solution for Iraq. Peace with everybody, but no peace for the terrorists." He continued to build his Iraqi Nation Party, which his fallen sons had helped establish, and which now has 15,000 members.

He describes his views less in ideological terms than in human ones. "An Iraqi mother, she has the right to have normal feelings for her baby. It's the same for an Israeli mother," he told me in a phone interview from Baghdad. "This is the best way to drive the world's politics. Not to make it complicated."

Mr. al-Alusi is not the only Iraqi political leader to reject ethnic and sectarian separatism. Hajim al-Hasani, a former parliament speaker, testified at a September congressional hearing. When Rep. Christopher Shays referred to him as a Sunni, Mr. al-Hasani politely corrected the congressman: "I am Iraqi." Afterwards, Mr. al-Hasani told me it is a misconception to view the violence in Iraq as the expression of popular will: "The few bad apples can rotten the rest of the apples if nobody stops them." Many of those "bad apples" aren't even grown in Iraq. Following Saddam Hussein's fall, foreign jihadists such as the Jordanian Abu Musab al-Zarqawi rushed to join former Baathists in an effort to undermine the fledgling democracy. And Mr. al-Alusi told me that "Iran is fully involved in terrorist activity in Iraq." He believes Tehran is playing both sides, backing Sunni terrorists as well as Shiite ones.

Polls suggest a majority of Americans think it was a mistake to enter Iraq. Mr. al-Alusi respectfully disagrees. "We didn't have any kind of hope, and now, even with all our difficulty, we have hope." Iraq today is a central front in a war against extremists who view the murder of civilians as political expression. "I will be killed -- if not today, tomorrow," Mr. al-Alusi says. "The point is not me, but children -- for a child to be a child, not a killer; for a teenager to be a teenager, not an extremist."

Mithal al-Alusi could have left Iraq for a comfortable life in exile; Mr. Shays, a friend, offered to help him relocate to the U.S. But he said no: "My country needs me."

He has not given up the fight. How can we?

NATO Forces Fight Taliban In 5 Provinces Of Afghanistan (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 31 — Clashes erupted in five provinces in eastern and southern Afghanistan on Monday and Tuesday, with roadside bombs, suicide bombings and gun battles killing four NATO soldiers and an estimated 67 Taliban fighters, NATO officials said.

The violence came as NATO forces continued a military operation started last week intended to put pressure on Taliban forces through the fall and winter, and to allow reconstruction and development to reach the country's restive south and east, NATO officials said. Taliban forces, meanwhile, continued to demonstrate their ability to carry out multiple roadside bombings and suicide attacks.

In the eastern province of Nuristan on Tuesday, a roadside bomb killed three NATO soldiers and wounded one as they patrolled in Weygal district, NATO officials said. In separate attack on Tuesday, one Afghan policeman died and two NATO soldiers were wounded in a suicide bombing in Ghazni Province, just south of Kabul.

On Monday, NATO soldiers involved in the new operation, named "Oqab," or eagle, battled Taliban fighters in a six-hour firefight in the Daychopan district of the southern province of Zabul, NATO officials said. The clash killed one NATO soldier and an estimated 55 Taliban insurgents, they said.

In a second attack on Monday, three NATO soldiers were wounded by a roadside bomb in the eastern province of Kunar. In a third clash on Monday, NATO forces in the Zhera district of the southern province of Kandahar called in an airstrike on a group of suspected insurgents on the roof of a compound. The bombing killed as many as 12 insurgents, according to NATO officials.

Maj. Luke Knittig, a NATO spokesman, cautioned that the Taliban toll from Monday and Tuesday was an estimate. He said the figures had been based on sightings by pilotless aerial vehicles, aircraft and NATO soldiers directly involved in gun battles with insurgents.

"It is not a precise endeavor," he said. "But we had eyes on these targets."

Last week, Afghan villagers reported that dozens of civilians were killed in an errant NATO airstrike in the Panjwai district of Kandahar Province. An investigation ordered by the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, is still under way.

The clashes on Monday and Tuesday came after dozens of suspected Taliban were reportedly killed by NATO-led forces in fighting on Saturday in southern Oruzgan Province.

Since NATO took over responsibility for the region from American troops at the beginning of August, 56 of its soldiers have been killed in fighting. The nationalities of the four NATO soldiers killed Monday and Tuesday were not released.

Pakistan's Leader Defends Airstrike On School (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Oct. 31 — Faced with protests across the country, President Pervez Musharraf on Tuesday defended a military strike that killed 80 people at a religious school, and insisted that the dead were militants undergoing terrorist training.

General Musharraf's claim came amid protests across the political spectrum, but especially by an alliance of Islamic parties and thousands of people in the semi-autonomous tribal areas straddling the Afghan border where the strike took place.

Angry speakers at rallies across the country condemned General Musharraf's alliance with the United States and the airstrike on Monday, when helicopter gunships fired missiles into the Islamic school, or madrasa, in the village of Chingai, near the town of Khar in the Bajur region.

DOJ_NMG_0089304

General Musharraf said the dead were militants, and Pakistani military officials maintained that the madrasa was being used as a staging post for Al Qaeda and that it was frequently visited by Qaeda leaders.

Some local residents and opposition politicians have said that there were children in the school, and alleged that American warplanes had taken part in the attack. But the president dismissed the suggestion that the dead were innocent.

"Anyone who is saying that these were innocent Taliban is telling lies," General Musharraf said while addressing a seminar in Islamabad, the capital.

"We were watching them since the last six, seven days," he said. "We knew exactly who they are, what they were doing. They were all militants, using weapons, doing military training within the compound."

Local news outlets on Tuesday quoted unidentified intelligence officials as saying that Ayman al-Zawahri, the top deputy to Osama bin Laden, and Abu Faraj al-Libbi, a senior Qaeda operative, used to visit the madrasa.

The local television station AAJ reported that satellite images showed militant activity going on within the madrasa and that it was used as a staging point for attacks in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

"Militants were given training to prepare explosives, and the madrasa was used to provide ideological motivation," the report said.

Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, the chief military spokesman, refused to confirm or deny the news report. "I cannot comment on that," General Sultan said in a telephone interview on Tuesday evening.

When asked the reason for the attack, he said, "We had confirmed information about militant training going on in the madrasa."

He denied that the military had any information about the presence of any high-level Qaeda leader at the madrasa at the time of the strike.

He also denied comments attributed to him by The Associated Press in which he appeared to acknowledge sharing intelligence with the United States to carry out the operation, an extremely delicate issue in Pakistan.

"That was wrong," General Sultan said. "I was grossly misinterpreted. If there was any intelligence sharing, we cannot open it to media."

In Washington, however, officials said Tuesday that American officials had provided intelligence to the Pakistani government that in part led to the strike on the madrasa. Before the attack on Monday, American and Pakistani officials discussed the intelligence and signed off on the target.

"There was a body of evidence that both sides agreed on," said an American official, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was discussing classified information.

The official said American and Pakistani officials had agreed on the target in part because the madrasa was training militants to carry out attacks in Pakistan and Afghanistan. Liaquat Hussein, an associate of Mr. Zawahri's who ran the madrasa, was killed in Monday's airstrike.

The strike is expected to further polarize the political environment in the country. General Musharraf's alliance with the United States has incensed hard-line Islamists who accuse him of being subservient to the United States.

"This was a very ill-planned operation," said Enver Baig, a senator from the opposition Pakistan Peoples Party. "They knew that there were students inside the madrasa and in case of an aerial operation, the casualties would be on a large scale.

"It has not gone well with the common man on the street."

Are You Sure You Were Really in Philadelphia When You Wrote That?

In her Oct. 20 essay "A Tale of Several Cities," Julia Vitullo-Martin is so anxious to recycle Digby Baltzell's 25-year-old thesis about "Puritan Boston and Quaker Philadelphia" that she trashes Philadelphia in a way that bears no resemblance to reality (Taste page, Weekend Journal). She writes that "Downtown Philadelphia seems to be a bleak postindustrial landscape" with "the few good buildings that are still standing routinely visited by street people begging at their entrances." I'll give her the benefit of the doubt and assume that her zeal for literary license, combined with her ignorance of Philadelphia, made that colorful language too good to pass up, true or not.

Here's an offer, Ms. Vitullo-Martin. Take the train to Philadelphia -- from your cocoon in New York it's less than an hour and a half trip, even without spending the extra money for the Acela -- and I'll give you a walking tour of Center City. We'll start off with some new office buildings and public spaces, and some existing "good buildings still standing." But mostly we'll concentrate on all the burgeoning neighborhoods with both gorgeous old homes and new apartment and condominium buildings, going for prices that would not have been dreamed about in Baltzell's time. These neighborhoods are bustling at all hours with both visiting suburbanites and a resident population that has grown remarkably in recent years. (Sort of like the Boston neighborhoods that you said "look like Hollywood's idea of a hip, fabulous place to live.") That's the real downtown Philadelphia, and I look forward to showing it to you.

Darryl May

Wynnewood, Pa.

What an absurd description. Yes, there are street people begging here and there in Center City Philadelphia, as there are in all large cities. But Ms. Vitullo-Martin must not have been in Philadelphia for many years. As a resident of a nearby suburb, I go to Center City once or twice a week because it's a great place -- restaurants, coffee shops, book- and music-stores, cinemas, public squares and other green spaces, wonderful fountains, churches, historic sites, etc. The place is booming! It's full of people day and night and, for better or worse, with much new construction going on. I cannot imagine what Ms. Vitullo-Martin was thinking.

I suggest that a hurried walk to just one neighborhood cannot possibly give anyone a clear view of what is happening in this great city. Anyone who has been to our city, which National Geographic Traveler magazine recently called "America's Next Great City," knows this city is hot. That's why so many people are moving here, from the young professionals coming down from New York and elsewhere, to empty nesters moving into our hot downtown condo market. Come see for yourself. We believe you'll love what Philadelphia has to offer.

Ms. Vitullo-Martin's article gives praise to the "sheer excellence" of the harbor in Upper Sandusky, Ohio. Ohioans are justifiably proud of the acclaim but hope that Wall Street Journal readers don't all flock at once to our 38-acre, man-made reservoir. If you find our single- launch ramp too busy, you might consider the other Sandusky, downstream (and hence lower) at the mouth of the Sandusky River. The Sandusky River, like the Nile, flows south to north. That puts the Upper Nile south of the Lower Nile and Upper Sandusky south of the Lower Sandusky. The other Sandusky's little harbor (miles across), minor facilities (many marinas and dockage for Great Lakes boats), and dregged channels (for the freighters) may accommodate the overflow. However, if you do choose Upper Sandusky for your boating pleasure, please respect the "electric motors only" regulation.

Once Again, Musharraf Is Routinely Maligned

Tunku Varadarajan, in his review of Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf's autobiography "In the Line of Fire," describes Gen. Musharraf as "self-congratulatory, narcissistic and mendacious" ("An 'Ally' With His Own Agenda," Bookshelf, Leisure & Arts, Oct. 19). Such words are unfair, reflecting the mindset of those determined to malign the president come what may. For instance, Mr. Varadarajan does not give credit to Gen. Musharraf for Pakistan's economic turnaround, attributing it instead to the U.S. Treasury secretary.

To answer other criticisms in the review: Omar Shaikh Saeed, the master of Daniel Pearl's murder, was kept in secret for a week after his arrest because authorities wanted to arrest his dangerous accomplices, who otherwise would have fled if they were aware of their leader's arrest. A number of terrorists were arrested on the basis of information divulged during the interrogation. Was that a blunder or the right decision?

In regard to Mukhtaran Mai, the woman Mr. Varadarajan says was subjected to a travel ban when an NGO wished to fly her to the U.S. to publicize her plight of having been subjected to a sexual assault decreed by a village tribunal: Ms. Mukhtaran has visited a number of foreign countries, including the U.S., with the permission of the Pakistan government. Mr. Varadarajan did not mention that President Musharraf sent Mukhtaran Mai a check for $10,000 as a token of support. The government also facilitated the establishment of a school, a police post and a women's crisis center in her village at the cost of $300,000.

Empowerment of women in Pakistan has been ensured by reserving almost 30% seats at the district, provincial and federal levels in the respective representative bodies. People at the grassroots level have been empowered through a local government system that has entrusted political, administrative and financial powers to their directly elected representatives.

War Deaths Methodology: Greater Rigor Is Needed

In their Oct. 24 Letter to the Editor, Johns Hopkins researchers defend the cluster survey methodology used to estimate "excess" deaths in Iraq since the war began in 2003. They mention that 12,800 Iraqis were surveyed. But large numbers don't make a sample representative. They claim "the effective sample size is roughly 3,700 independent people." (Apparently they arrived at 3,700 by simply doubling the 1,849 households in the survey.) But participants who live together and answer survey questions together aren't independent. While acknowledging that only 47 clusters were sampled, they omit the fact that only adjacent households within a cluster were surveyed.

To put this in perspective, imagine a door-to-door survey in California to gauge the impact of an earthquake. Like war, earthquake destruction is widespread, but more intense in some areas than in others. Surveyors randomly choose 47 neighborhoods and interview 40 adjacent households in each (i.e., fewer households than in a city block). Would this "snapshot" provide a fair assessment of earthquake damage from a true cross-section of California's population?

If neighborhoods near the earthquake epicenter were over-sampled, the survey results would be skewed significantly. Likewise, if clusters near the most violent war zones in Iraq were sampled disproportionately, estimates of war deaths could be wildly exaggerated. In fact, Johns Hopkins reported an "extreme statistical outlier" when it sampled 33 clusters in Iraq in 2004: "More than a third of reported post-attack deaths, and two-thirds of violent deaths happened in the Falluja cluster" (see http://www.thelancet.com/journals/lancet/article/PIIS0140673604174412/fulltext).

An issue as important and complicated as counting war deaths demands more rigor than Johns Hopkins used in its two surveys.

Antitrust Amnesty Grants: A Constitutional Problem

Holman W. Jenkins Jr. correctly identifies the problems with the Stolt-Nielsen case and the Justice Department's larger campaign against "price fixing" ("If Sergio Leone Made a Movie About Antitrust . . . ," Business World, Oct. 25). I would add that the Stolt-Nielsen case has shed valuable light on the secrecy that surrounds the department's amnesty program. Unlike plea bargains, which are disclosed to the court and the public, amnesty grants are secret and not subject to outside scrutiny. The department says amnesty is an internal matter of "prosecutorial discretion"; but from a constitutional standpoint, the amnesty grants the equivalent of a full pardon.

DOJ_NMG_0089307

Pardons are supposed to be the exclusive province of the president, not mid-level lawyers at the Antitrust Division. The framers were careful in concentrating the pardon power in the chief executive, who is subject to congressional and public oversight. The department's amnesty program eliminates these checks, however, in order to keep cartel prosecutions in-house. Once a company receives its amnesty, the evidence provided to prosecutors forces other cartel members to plead guilty without going to trial. In this manner, the government can extract millions in fines from defendants without ever having to publicly address the types of economic arguments raised in Mr. Jenkins's column.

With Corruption Rampant, 'Snitches' Are Necessary

Kudos to Karen Richardson for her excellent, insightful article "The Secret Life of an Informant" (page one, Oct. 21). Public corruption cases, particularly those involving elected officials, are notoriously difficult to prove in court. Most Americans don't necessarily like government "snitches" gathering evidence, but they should realize that public malfeasance is a much worse alternative.

At the time when spending for public infrastructure has skyrocketed nationwide, the temptation to bribe elected officials is now greater than ever. The exceedingly small number of those who betray the public trust should realize that the watchdog of their public conduct isn't only found in the results of their election, but within the judicial system as well.

The Dark, Hidden World of Auto Repair Pricing

While the transparency of pricing data on the Internet has been a big boon for consumers ("Savvy Car Buyers Drive Bargains With Pricing Data From the Web," Personal Journal, Oct. 24), I wonder if car dealers are offsetting the lost profits on new-car sales with premium pricing for service and repair?

Auto makers know exactly what they pay dealers for every conceivable warranty repair. If they made these repair and replacement costs known to the consumer, they would begin to reduce one of the most stressful aspects of car ownership: the dreaded mechanic's bill. Of course, dealers would strongly resist the publication of this data, but perhaps some enterprising Web site could penetrate this veil of secrecy. After all, in the pre-Web days, the price a dealer paid for any car was also a closely guarded secret.

Anti-Growth Tax Rule Was Defended by Spitzer

In his Oct. 25 editorial-page commentary "Spitzer Is Good for Business," Donald G. Kempf Jr. argues that Eliot Spitzer, as governor, will make New York's regulatory environment more business-friendly. Perhaps. However, Mr. Spitzer, as attorney general, fought to preserve one of New York's most antigrowth tax rules—taxing nonresident telecommuters on days they work at their out-of-state homes. Most recently, New York taxed an Arizona resident for days he worked at home there.

Many nonresidents and businesses respond to this foolishness by cutting their ties to New York. If one is looking for a prime example of New York's self-destructive tax policies, this is it. As attorney general, Mr. Spitzer aggressively and successfully defended this policy in the courts up to and including the U.S. Supreme Court. It is hoped that Gov. Spitzer will undo the handiwork of Attorney General Spitzer.

For science-fiction buffs, it's probably a common-sense solution. Two months after arriving in Iraq, a second lieutenant with the 16th Military Police Brigade was handed the Phraselator, a hand-held device that promised to digest his English phrases and produce a prerecorded Arabic translation with an Iraqi accent.

But after a brief test last year, the soldier gave up the gadget, deciding that, while helpful in some instances, it wasn't useful to his unit, which conducted raids and provided convoy security. He had even tried to teach himself Arabic using the device but decided that it was no match for the complex language. Even such simple phrases as "What is your name?" are spoken differently in Fallujah than in Baghdad, he found. "This may have been the reason why many of the Iraqis . . . did not appear to understand the Arabic phrases & words" stored in the device, according to a report prepared for the Army.

An Annapolis firm, VoxTec International Inc., developed the device and said it has steadily made improvements. But the goal of having a machine replace a human interpreter remains elusive, and the military is mounting a multimillion-dollar campaign to find a more capable successor, one that can translate both sides of a conversation, from English to Arabic and vice versa.

"What people would really like is that 'Star Trek' universal communicator, but it doesn't exist yet," said Lynne McCann, former chief of the Army Foreign Language Proponency Office. "That would solve everything."

The stakes are high for the military, which suffers from such a shortage of interpreters that it has had to rely increasingly on contractors -- 6,500 in Iraq and 1,500 in Afghanistan. It can be a dangerous job. Of the 648 contractors killed in Iraq since the war began in March 2003, 153 worked for the division of L-3 Communications Corp. that currently holds the linguist contract, according to Labor Department figures.

Battlefields often turn into impromptu laboratories for new technologies -- with mixed results. During the Persian Gulf War in 1991, the Patriot anti-missile system was rushed into combat to intercept Iraqi scuds, but afterward, investigators questioned its effectiveness. The Predator, an unmanned drone, dropped Hellfire missiles after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, after a quick development process.

In the same way, VoxTec, which was a unit within Marine Acoustics Inc., was asked to rush production of its Phraselator, then a single prototype, shortly after the attacks on New York's World Trade Center and the Pentagon, said Ace Sarich, the company's vice president of development. The device is about the size of a large personal digital assistant and is programmed with about 700 Arabic phrases that can be recalled after it "hears" the equivalent English phrase or a soldier chooses a sentence from a text list on the device.

The company shipped 20 to Afghanistan within a few months, but the prototypes had bugs, including buttons that were hard to push and faulty batteries. "It was supposed to be a weatherproof design, and it leaked like a sieve," Sarich said. Those issues have all been addressed, he added.

While VoxTec continued to improve the device, the military began testing a device made by a California company, Integrated Wave Technologies Inc. It had developed a similar hands-free version of a translation machine that fit into an ammunition pouch, allowing soldiers to say key phrases that are then turned into full Arabic sentences.

"You say 'house search' and then it will say in Arabic: 'We're here to search your house. Please stay in this room. Do you have any weapons?'" said Tim McCune, the company's president.

Over the past few years, Integrated Wave Technologies has produced 1,300 of its machines and VoxTec has made 5,000 devices. They cost about $2,500 to $3,000 apiece, a mini-boom for two companies that have fewer than 20 employees each.

DOJ_NMG_0089309

Neither product, however, proved robust enough to replace human interpreters. What soldiers really needed, the military decided, was to have a conversation with the people they encounter, not just give orders.

"In years past, there wasn't a great need for the individual soldier to speak a foreign language to do his mission," said Wayne Richards, branch chief for technology implementation at U.S. Joint Forces Command. But in Iraq and Afghanistan, soldiers are increasingly interacting with Iraqi civilians, giving advice at checkpoints or guidance during home searches, he said.

"During those door-to-door searches, the soldiers need to be able to calm them down and reassure them," Richards said. "We're fighting for hearts and minds. But if I can't tell her, 'Ma'am, please calm down,' . . . that wouldn't be assuring."

So the Pentagon turned to the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA), which helped develop the Internet, to enlist some technology powerhouses, setting aside $20.8 million this year for translation technologies. Military officials said they do not expect the automated devices to completely replace human interpreters but to augment them. DARPA was a natural fit to lead the project because it has spent the past two years creating a database of thousands of hours of Iraqi conversations to study the voices, speech patterns and commonly used phrases to help with speech-recognition software.

The agency selected SRI International, a nonprofit research group, International Business Machines Corp., and Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh to help put that database to work.

Each of the three has developed systems that use mathematical algorithms to interpret speech, even if it is slurred, accented or muffled, into Arabic and the Arabic response into English. After a second or two, a synthesized male voice produces a response. The systems usually require speakers to limit their conversations to one sentence at a time to avoid confusion.

IBM announced this month that 35 units of its system had been shipped to Iraq, saying it would "facilitate quick" communication. The military is not quite as optimistic.

The systems are being tested only in offices or benign situations with limited background noise, military officials said.

The technology is "just not ready for wide deployment," said Mari Maeda, program manager in DARPA's Information Processing Technology Office. "The translation system is not good enough; the recognition software is not strong enough."

The systems are also not accurate enough, she said. IBM estimates that its system has an accuracy rate of 85 to 90 percent, and that out of 30 phrases, a person may need to repeat four or five. SRI and Carnegie Mellon officials said they couldn't provide comparable figures. But "soldiers are looking for things that work 95 percent of the time," Maeda said.

In the meantime, companies are also experimenting with lower-tech solutions. VoxTec, for instance, is testing a call-a-translator system in Baghdad that allows soldiers to call in from the field so they can put an Iraqi on the phone with one of two Arabic translators on duty who can act as an intermediary.

Integrated Wave Technologies says it may have another interim solution. It is developing a system, which DARPA says it may send to Iraq next year, that will enable limited two-way conversations by "listening" for key words, said McCunne, the company's president. But even that, he acknowledges, has problems.

"If you ask, 'What color was the car?' it will be looking for something like blue or red," he said. But if the person responds by asking which car or says he didn't see a car, the system will not be able to translate, McCunne said. "It's a fairly limited type of communication," he added.

Soldiers Train In Languages (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, November 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089310

The Army has invested $4.2 million in a Web-based software program to improve the foreign-language skills of overseas personnel.

The program was created by Rosetta Stone, which provides training software in 30 languages. The contract, entering its second year, allows software access to any member of the active-duty Army, National Guard or Reserve, and civilian personnel in the Department of the Army.

"You can't send everyone to language training school," said Stan Davis, project manager for the Army's E-Learning program. "But this is a capability the Army needs in today's operational environment."

More than 64,000 soldiers are using the software, Mr. Davis said, and that number is expected to double next year. "We're getting about 2,000 to 3,000 people signing up a month," he said.

The military has been criticized for a lack of foreign-language speakers during the conflicts in Afghanistan and Iraq. Rosetta Stone provides courses in Pashto, spoken in Afghanistan and parts of Pakistan; Farsi, widely spoken in Iran; and Arabic, which is used throughout the Middle East.

Mr. Davis said Arabic and Farsi are among the top courses for soldiers, but Spanish is studied most.

Linda Trude, Rosetta Stone's senior director for institutional marketing, said the "dynamic immersion" process provides more success than traditional language courses.

"It's done in the same way we learn our first languages," she said. "When your mom or dad were teaching you, they didn't give you in-depth grammar and language tests. They pointed to an object and said, 'Ball.' "

The software gives instant feedback without using memorization or translation exercises.

Ms. Trude said the U.S. Military Academy at West Point and other segments of the Army have been using the Rosetta Stone software for several years.

"We've heard from people in the Army who don't necessarily need it in their day-to-day jobs, but have said they can use the basic communication skills when they are interacting with Iraqis at the local market," she said.

Ms. Trude said soldiers in the field have given positive feedback.

"Our goal is not to make them linguists, but to help provide them with basic communication skills," she said.

Mark Foley on Film,

Before He Got Famous

Here you probably thought you knew everything about Mark Foley . But a month after the Florida rep resigned in disgrace for cyber-stalking teenage pages, a young journalist has uncovered perhaps the one juicy angle yet unplumbed in the scores of profiles and investigative reports -- Foley's brief movie career.

The movie was a low-budget, straight-to-DVD vigilante flick called "Strike Force" (original title, "The Librarians"), filmed in 2000 in Foley's Palm Beach County district. It starred veteran tough guy William Forsythe , "Baywatch" babe Erika Eleniak , Burt Reynolds (as high-roller "Irish," who lounges by a pool surrounded by his bikini-clad "grandnieces") -- and Foley, in a tiny but pivotal role as, well, a congressman.

Kenneth P. Vogel , an investigative reporter for the soon-to-launch Capitol Leader newspaper, found this cinematic gem buried deep in Foley's 2001 financial disclosure records, recording the $400 payment he got for the role. Vogel tracked down a copy of the movie on Amazon ($12.99) and -- we're just so glad he did! The opening scene is a cartoonish shootout between Forsythe's gang and the bad guys who have kidnapped Foley's daughter. Forsythe returns the girl to her dad's black stretch limo, where we get to see Foley emote:

"Oh I missed you, too, baby!" he says, eyes clenched as he hugs the girl.

"There were a lot of bad men," the child says.

"I know, baby, but it's all over now," Foley says, sighing deeply. "God, I love you."

Foley was cast at the suggestion of associate producer Greg Hauptner , a Palm Beach resident who had known him for years. "He was crazy about the movies," Hauptner told Vogel. (Foley was also an extra on the Florida set of "Body Heat," Vogel learned, but was lost on the cutting room floor.)

In all, the former chairman of the entertainment caucus has about 10 lines and several doleful close-ups. You kitsch-loving hipsters may scoff -- it was harder than it looked!

"In a short period of time, he had to go through a gamut of emotions," Hauptner said. "It wasn't as easy as you think it would be. He had to be sad and be stoic at the same time -- to be a strong-willed congressman who was willing to go outside the law." All in all, "he wasn't bad."

UPDATE . . .

Since last we checked in with the lurid Washingtonienne saga, sex blogger Jessica Cutler snagged a new team of attorneys (she's lost three over the past year) to defend her against an ex-boyfriend's claim that she defamed him by airing details of their love life. And she has traded snippy filings with Robert Steinbuch in federal court -- he claiming that her much-circulated blog postings in 2004 (in which he was ID'd by initials) caused him to lose out on a law professor job, she doubting his reputation was even worth the damages he's seeking (oh, snap !).

Legal sources say it likely will be well into the new year before these crazy kids work things out. The drama continues with a judge this week okaying Steinbuch's request to add as a defendant Ana Marie Cox -- founding editor of Wonkette.com, which made Cutler's blog famous. Cox, now with Time.com, declined to comment, and her former bosses did not return calls.

THIS JUST IN . . .

Â· Alberto Gonzales dropped by GWU Law School yesterday, surprising 40 students in the criminal procedure class. The attorney general talked about military commissions, terrorist surveillance and the Patriot Act and took questions for 40 minutes -- before vanishing as mysteriously as he arrived. Turns out this was all his idea: Gonzales just got a hankering for legal chat with some students, and his staff tracked down a willing prof, former DOJ lawyer Renee Lerner . "I guess he really likes teaching," she said. "The students, of course, were delighted to have him." Is the AG mulling a move to academia? "He is not ruling any options out in terms of future careers," said Justice spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos . Any more stealth visits to law schools planned? "I wouldn't rule it out."

Â· Daytime TV icon Bob Barker will come on down! from "The Price Is Right" in June after 35 years hosting the show and 50 years in TV. "I will be 83 years old," he said yesterday, "and I've decided to retire while I'm still young." Barker plans to devote more time to his animal rights causes.

Fresno Prosecutor Heads For Iraq Duty (SACBEE)

By John Ellis

Sacramento Bee, November 1, 2006

An assistant U.S. attorney hopes to help bring law and order.

Marlon Cobar so believes in the virtue of the rule of law that he has volunteered to go to Iraq and promote it.

Cobar, an assistant U.S. attorney in Fresno, next month will start a one-year stint — with the option for a second — advising Iraqis as they work to put together a functioning legal system.

Many areas where Cobar will help already are second nature in the American legal system, such as how to make effective opening and closing arguments, how to pursue a line of questioning, how to preserve evidence and how to develop a chain of custody for prisoners.

Cobar also will give advice about human rights and ethical issues that lawyers, prosecutors and judges in Iraq might face.

"We're not going over there to take over," Cobar said. "We'll be assisting the Iraqis in taking the reins of their justice system any way they can."

DOJ_NMG_0089312

He will be stationed in an undisclosed province far from Baghdad and will be one of only eight such "Resident Legal Advisers" in the war-torn country. These legal advisers advise the U.S. Embassy and Iraq's central and provincial courts.

In total, the Justice Department has more than 200 employees and contract personnel working on law enforcement, security and justice issues in Iraq.

To date, according to the Justice Department, nearly 500 Iraqi jurists and prosecutors have been trained on topics such as human rights, criminal process and the challenges presented prosecuting insurgency and terrorist cases.

Cobar knows there will be risks — and his family is concerned, but supportive — but for an unmarried 34-year-old with a thirst to help and a taste for adventure, the chance was too good to pass up.

Getting to this point, however, was at least half the challenge.

"My colleagues there are veterans," Cobar said. "I'll be the youngest person with the least amount of time as a [federal prosecutor]."

The program dates to 2003, when an initial assessment team looked at criminal justice reform, judicial training and court policy in Iraq. In late 2004, the Justice Department sought volunteers for a second wave as it increased the program.

Cobar, a Bay Area native who has been a federal prosecutor for less than four years — including 21/2 years in Fresno — applied, but was told, basically, that he was too young.

He was skeptical.

Around that time, Cobar, who is fluent in Spanish, began doing temporary stints in Colombia, where he trained prosecutors and agents in basic criminal trial advocacy. He has been there four times, including time in Medellin and Cali, which were at one time the power centers in the Latin American drug trade.

With that training in hand, this past January it was the Department of Justice that sought out Cobar.

The interview process was intense, and included a panel that spent half a day grilling him.

McGregor W. Scott, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of California — which includes Fresno — had to sign off on the deal. Scott said he never gave it a second thought.

However big or small the role, he said, the Eastern District must do its part to help the Justice Department "re-establish the rule of law" in Iraq.

"The bottom line is we in the Department of Justice have a very significant role to play over there," Scott said.

And, he said, Cobar is the right choice for the job. "Marlon has a profound work ethic," he said. "He has a sense of what it is to serve" as a federal prosecutor.

With that blessing, Cobar began several months of preparation. Among them: becoming a special deputy U.S. marshal, which allows him to carry a firearm in Iraq — which he will do.

He traveled to Washington, D.C., where he went through diplomatic training, a monthlong crash course in Iraqi language, history, culture, religion and politics. He learned to recognize explosives and how to react to biological and chemical agents.

In Iraq, Cobar will trade his U.S. attorney credentials for a diplomatic passport, and he will give up ties and dark suits in favor of dress-down khaki. He will live on a secure military base and travel via convoy. He will receive hazard pay, along with his normal salary, definitely not a factor in his decision to go.

"I didn't even know I was getting hazard pay until I got into the program," Cobar said.

It won't be luxurious, and it will be dangerous, he said. But with billions being spent each month and more than 2,800 U.S. soldiers killed, Cobar said, it is vital that significant American investment pay dividends. His contribution to that end is what he knows — the law.

"One key to a sustainable democracy," he said, "is a fair and workable criminal justice system."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ex-CEO Of Cendant Is Found Guilty In Third Trial (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0089313

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

A federal jury found former Cendant Corp. Chairman Walter A. Forbes guilty of conspiracy to commit securities fraud and two counts of making false statements in a massive fraud scheme that inflated the travel and real-estate company's earnings and crippled the company's once-stellar reputation.

Mr. Forbes was found not guilty of a fourth count -- securities fraud -- in U.S. District Court in Bridgeport, Conn.

The conviction came in Mr. Forbes's third trial in three years, after juries deadlocked in trials earlier this year and in early 2005. The Cendant case was among the first in a series of corporate-accounting scandals that sparked outrage from investors in recent years, but is one of the last to reach a conclusion.

"We are gratified by today's verdict," said Christopher J. Christie, the U.S. Attorney in Newark, N.J. "The innocent victims of this $14 billion fraud engineered by Walter Forbes have waited a very long time for justice to be done. This is a great day for those who believe that everyone in our society must be held accountable for their conduct."

"It's the third time and was worth all the effort," said Michael Drewniak, Mr. Christie's spokesman. "We always believed fully in all the evidence against Mr. Forbes. We are extremely gratified by today's results."

A Cendant spokesman said, "We're gratified that after all this time justice has finally been served."

Mr. Forbes's attorney couldn't be reached for comment. Prosecutors said they expect Mr. Forbes to appeal.

New York-based Cendant was formed by the merger of HFS Inc., a travel and real-estate company, with CUC International Inc., a membership-marketing company in 1997. Within months, employees from the HFS side uncovered extensive fraud in CUC's accounting, which inflated revenue by $500 million and earnings by $252 million.

Cendant disclosed the fraud in April 1998, causing its market value to drop by $14 billion in one day. Prosecutors say that Mr. Forbes, who had been chief executive of CUC before the merger, participated in the scheme.

Mr. Forbes has argued he had nothing to do with the fraud and put the blame on underlings, saying he was out of the loop. His co-defendant, former Cendant Vice Chairman E. Kirk Shelton, was convicted last year of 12 counts of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, securities fraud and making false statements to the SEC. Mr. Shelton had been president of CUC before the merger created Cendant.

Prosecutors narrowed the scope of their charges in the third trial to four counts, down from 16 in the first trial, in a bid to avoid another hung jury, which some blamed on the months of testimony about arcane accounting procedures.

Mr. Shelton was sentenced to 10 years in prison and ordered to pay $3.27 billion restitution to the company, now called Avis Budget Group. The restitution order includes a balloon payment of $15 million and monthly installments of $2,000 after he is released from prison.

Cendant's CEO and founder Henry R. Silverman held the company together by selling off assets and jettisoning Messrs. Forbes and Shelton, but Cendant was never able to regain its premerger growth or overcome the tarnish of the fraud. In 2000, Cendant settled shareholder class-action lawsuits with a record $2.85 billion settlement.

Mr. Silverman announced a year ago that he would break up the conglomerate into four pieces. Cendant sold its travel-distribution company, Travelport, and spun off its real-estate and hospitality businesses as Realogy Corp. and Wyndham Worldwide Corp. That left the company with its rental-car brands.

Chief Guilty At Cendant In 3rd Trial (NYT)

By Stacey Stowe

The New York Times, November 1, 2006

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., Oct. 31 — It took eight years and three trials, but federal prosecutors finally won their case on Tuesday against Walter A. Forbes, the former chairman of the Cendant Corporation.

Mr. Forbes was convicted here on charges that he masterminded an accounting fraud that was considered at the time it was discovered — 1998 — to be the largest on record. Investors lost $19 billion when Cendant's stock fell after the disclosure. The Cendant fraud was later eclipsed by the scandals at Enron and WorldCom.

A jury of eight men and four women in Federal District Court deliberated for two and a half days before finding Mr. Forbes, 63, of New Canaan, Conn., guilty of conspiracy and of two counts of submitting false reports to the Securities and Exchange Commission in overstating his company's earnings by more than $250 million. He was acquitted on a fourth count, securities fraud.

Mr. Forbes remained free on $1.2 million bail. He is to be sentenced on Jan. 17 and faces as long as 25 years in prison.

Prosecutors said Mr. Forbes inflated the income at his original company, CUC International, which merged with HFS Inc. in 1997 to form Cendant — with holdings including the Avis and Budget car rental companies and the Century 21 and Coldwell Banker real estate brokerage firms, among other businesses.

Two months ago, Cendant stockholders changed the company's name to the Avis Budget Group. Besides Avis Budget, Cendant has been broken up into real estate, hotel and mortgage financing businesses.

As the verdicts were read on Tuesday, Mr. Forbes bit his lower lip but otherwise showed little emotion. His wife, Caryn, who attended each day of the proceedings, left the courtroom after the jurors were dismissed by Judge Alan H. Nevas.

"Justice was served," said Michael Martinez, an assistant United States attorney for New Jersey, who prosecuted Mr. Forbes along with Craig Carpenito, another assistant United States attorney. Mr. Forbes's defense team declined comment.

The trial was held in Connecticut after his lawyers succeeded in having it moved from New Jersey, where HFS had its headquarters.

Defense lawyers may have considered the transfer an advantage at one point because it had the effect of delaying the trial.

But James D. Cox, a professor of corporate and securities law at the Duke University School of Law, said Mr. Forbes might have been better off if the defense not been able to delay the proceedings. Instead, the trial followed a succession of accounting and stock fraud defendants at WorldCom, Enron, Tyco and Adelphi.

"It would have occurred in an era before there was a big revulsion against such defendants, before 'C.E.O.' became a code word for felon," Mr. Cox said.

The jury foreman, David Cunningham, a business analyst from Wilton, Conn., said the jury did not think that prosecutors proved their case on securities fraud. Asked if there had been a crucial piece of evidence that swayed the jury to vote to convict on other counts, Mr. Cunningham replied simply, "We were just following the evidence."

John C. Coffee, a specialist in securities law at Columbia University Law School, said he was certain that Mr. Forbes would appeal, as is common with white-collar defendants. Given that it took three trials to convict him, Mr. Coffee added, the appellate court could be expected to give the case a high level of scrutiny.

In Mr. Forbes's two previous trials, the jurors failed to reach a unanimous verdict despite lengthy deliberations. In this trial, as in the earlier ones, his lawyers portrayed Mr. Forbes, who was paid more than $100 million as chairman and chief executive of the CUC Corporation, as a global visionary who did not get involved in the workaday operations of the company. Similar defenses were tried — also unsuccessfully — in the Enron cases of Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling.

The initial prosecution of Mr. Forbes ended in January 2005, with the jury unable to reach a verdict after an eight-month trial and 33 days of deliberations. But the jury did convict his co-defendant, E. Kirk Shelton, the former vice chairman of Cendant. Mr. Shelton, who was sentenced to 10 years in prison, is free on appeal; the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit heard the appeal on Tuesday.

At Mr. Forbes's second trial, in February, jurors were again unable to agree on a verdict, this time despite 27 days of deliberations. The foreman in that case said the accounting issues were too complex.

At the trial just concluded, prosecutors winnowed their case to three weeks from four. Once again, Cosmo Corigliano, former chief financial officer of CUC, testified that the books had been cooked for years at Mr. Forbes's direction and that he and Mr. Forbes met regularly to discuss how much money would be taken from inflated reserves and used to increase profits to meet targets.

Mr. Forbes, in his third time on the stand, denied taking part in those conversations. His lawyers, particularly in closing arguments, portrayed Mr. Corigliano as a liar. He is awaiting sentencing after pleading guilty to fraud-related charges.

But in the third trial, the prosecution called a new witness: Henry R. Silverman, the former chief executive officer of HFS, who now runs one of Cendant's successor corporations. Mr. Silverman testified that Mr. Forbes lobbied him to keep the books of CUC and HFS separate and to retain CUC's auditor, Ernst & Young. Mr. Silverman also said that Mr. Forbes, who maintained that he delegated company financial details to others, in fact, presented detailed financial data to potential investors.

DOJ_NMG_0089315

The criminal conviction of Mr. Forbes, who resigned from Cendant with a $47 million severance package, followed the settlement in 2000 of a civil case, in which Cendant paid $2.9 billion and Ernst & Young, $335 million. That combined $3.2 billion settlement is, for now, the largest securities class action on record. It, too, may well be eclipsed by Enron.

Cendant Ex-chairman Found Guilty (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, November 1, 2006

The longest-running white-collar-criminal saga of the past decade finally came to a close Tuesday in Bridgeport, Conn., where a jury found former Cendant chairman Walter Forbes guilty of conspiracy in the $252 million overstatement of his company's earnings.

The fraud, exposed in April 1998, precipitated one of the biggest sell-offs in the history of Wall Street, chopping Cendant's market capitalization by 50%, or $14 billion, in one furious day of trading. Prior to Enron, it was considered one of the largest accounting frauds ever perpetrated on investors in modern times.

The victory proved sweet for federal prosecutors from New Jersey, who have been pursuing Forbes for eight years. Two previous efforts to convict Forbes for his role in the Cendant fraud ended in mistrials, although jurors in the first trial found Forbes' top lieutenant, E. Kirk Shelton, guilty of participating in the fraud. Shelton was sentenced to 10 years in prison.

"We are gratified by today's verdict," said Christopher Christie, the U.S. Attorney for New Jersey. "The innocent victims of this $14 billion fraud engineered by Walter Forbes have waited a very long time for justice to be done. This is a great day for those who believe that everyone in our society must be held accountable for their conduct."

Jurors convicted Forbes of conspiracy as well as of two counts of making false statements, but acquitted him of one count of securities fraud. U.S. District Judge Alan Nevas scheduled sentencing for Jan. 17. Forbes' attorney, Brendan Sullivan, vowed to appeal the verdict.

Prior to the exposure of the accounting fraud at Cendant, Forbes was the widely respected CEO of Comp-U-Card International, a pioneer in the field of shopping clubs. Through organic growth and a constant stream of acquisitions, he built CUC into one of the hottest stocks of the 1990s. Prosecutors said Forbes and Shelton used reserve accounts set up for every acquisition to massage the company's income. Over several years, CUC padded its ledgers with hundreds of millions in phantom revenue.

In opening arguments to jurors last month, Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Martinez alleged that in 1997, Forbes needed an enormous merger to keep the game going. He met several times with Henry Silverman, the billionaire investor who controlled HFS, parent company of Avis and Days Inn. The two decided to merge their companies to form a new entity, Cendant.

For the first time in three trials, Silverman testified in court. He told the jury that Forbes wanted to keep his longtime auditor, Ernst & Young, in charge of reporting CUC's financials, even after the merger was completed. As the dominant shareholder of HFS, Silverman was the biggest victim of the fraud, losing hundreds of millions of dollars in his stock's value in a single day.

Forbes testified in his own defense, saying he had no direct involvement in CUC's accounting practices, and that he relied on Ernst & Young to make sure the numbers were correct.

Cendant never fully recovered from the fallout of the fraud. Earlier this year, it split into four separate public companies.

Cendant's Ex-Chair Convicted In Fraud (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

A Connecticut jury yesterday convicted former Cendant Corp. chairman Walter A. Forbes of conspiracy and filing false financial reports, bringing to a close one of the government's longest-running fraud investigations after eight years and three trials.

Forbes, 63, faces more than 10 years in prison on the charges, which stem from a $250 million earnings manipulation at CUC International Inc., which through a merger became the travel and real estate conglomerate known as Cendant.

Two previous juries had failed to reach a unanimous verdict. Prosecutors this time cut the number of charges against Forbes and streamlined the presentation of their evidence, a strategy that made the case easier for jurors to digest, legal analysts said.

Cendant's disclosure of accounting tricks eight years ago slashed the stock price in half and erased $14 billion in shareholder value, ultimately leading the company to hand over a $3.2 billion settlement to investors, which was a record at the time.

The verdict closed the book on the Cendant case, which, at the time, before scandal-infused bankruptcies at Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc., was considered the largest accounting fraud of the past decade. It also marked the third time in recent years that jurors rejected a top executive's claim that he failed to detect accounting tricks because he only breezily reviewed financial reports and delegated the details to subordinates who deceived him.

Two other businessmen who advanced that defense, WorldCom founder Bernard J. Ebbers and Enron founder Kenneth L. Lay, were convicted of all criminal charges against them. Ebbers is serving a 25-year prison sentence. Lay died in July before he could be sentenced, and a judge last month wiped away his conviction because of legal precedent.

Yesterday, U.S. District Judge Alan H. Nevas ordered Forbes to return to court Jan. 17 for sentencing. Nevas also increased Forbes's bail to $1.2 million and barred him from making significant asset transfers without court approval. Prosecutors had presented evidence that Forbes had shifted more than $25 million to his wife and children before his first trial.

U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said he was "gratified" by the verdict and pleased for victims who "have waited a very long time for justice to be done."

"This is a great day for those who believe that everyone in our society must be held accountable for their conduct," Christie said in a statement.

Prosecutors contended that a scheme to produce steady earnings growth at CUC International got out of hand but that the fraud came to light months after the company merged with HFS Inc. to create Cendant in 1997. Cendant, which housed the Avis and Budget car rental businesses, Ramada hotels, and Century 21 Real Estate operations, among others, has since split into four companies.

In Forbes's case, government lawyers scuttled a dozen charges and focused on proving just four potential crimes. After three days of deliberation, jurors in Bridgeport, Conn., found Forbes not guilty of a related securities fraud charge. That strategy of paring down a complex case also proved successful against former Tyco International Ltd. chief executive L. Dennis Kozlowski. Kozlowski's first prosecution ended in a mistrial, but he was convicted of larceny and other charges in a second attempt. He is serving a prison sentence of 8 1/3 to 25 years in a New York state facility.

Forbes's chief deputy, onetime Cendant vice chairman E. Kirk Shelton, was sentenced to 10 years in prison last year after a jury that deliberated for 33 days found him guilty of conspiracy, fraud and false statements. A trio of former Cendant executives, including finance chief Cosmo Corigliano, earlier pleaded guilty and agreed to cooperate with the government in exchange for leniency at sentencing. Corigliano was the sole insider who tied Forbes to wrongdoing.

During the brief trial, which began last month, Forbes's attorneys attacked Corigliano as a liar who engineered the fraud, then struck a deal with prosecutors that allowed him to keep millions of dollars in cash and other assets.

Cendant, which had been paying Forbes's legal bills because a company spokesman said it was "obligated" to do so, may have grounds to recover some of the money because Forbes has been convicted.

Defense attorneys Brendan V. Sullivan Jr. and Barry Simon of the Washington law firm Williams & Connolly LLP did not return calls for comment, but Sullivan told Bloomberg News that he would appeal.

NEW HAVEN, Conn. (AP) -- A jury found former Cendant Corp. Chairman Walter Forbes guilty of conspiracy to commit securities fraud and two counts of making false statements Tuesday in a massive fraud scheme that cost the travel and real estate company and its investors more than $3 billion.

He was found not guilty of a fourth count, securities fraud.

The verdict could end what was, when it was first brought, the largest case of accounting fraud in the country. The Cendant case was among the first in a series of corporate accounting scandals that sparked outrage from investors in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0089317

The case was being tried after two previous juries deadlocked.

"It's the third time and was worth all the effort," said Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office in New Jersey. "We always believed fully in all the evidence against Mr. Forbes. We are extremely gratified by today's results."

Prosecutors say that Forbes participated in a scheme to inflate the stock of Cendant's predecessor, CUC International, by $500 million. The fraud was reported in 1998, causing Cendant's market value to drop by $14 billion in one day.

Forbes has argued he knew nothing about the fraud. His co-defendant, former Cendant Vice Chairman E. Kirk Shelton, was convicted last year of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, securities fraud and making false statements to the SEC.

Shelton was sentenced to 10 years in prison and ordered to pay $3.27 billion restitution to the company, which stockholders renamed Avis Budget Group. (NYSE:CAR) The restitution order includes a balloon payment of $15 million and monthly installments of $2,000 after he is released from prison.

Forbes was chief executive officer of CUC and Shelton was president before CUC merged with HFS Inc. to form New York-based Cendant in December 1997.

CUC, which ran a membership marketing operation, merged in 1997 with HFS Inc., a travel and real-estate services company, to form Cendant. Cendant's brands included Ramada, Howard Johnson, Avis, Coldwell Banker and Century 21.

Cendant was based in New York, but the litigation has been in Connecticut because the CUC division was headquartered in Stamford at the time the fraud occurred. The case was prosecuted by the New Jersey U.S. Attorney's office because HFS was headquartered in Parsippany, N.J.

In September, Cendant stockholders changed the company's name to Avis Budget Group to reflect its Avis and Budget vehicle rental brands. Its real estate and hotel businesses were spun off as stand-alone companies and the company sold its travel distribution operations.

SEC Shines Light On Obscure Market (WSJ)

By Serena Ng And Gregory Zuckerman

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

Behind a regulatory probe into possible manipulation of Treasury prices is a strategy that helps traders make certain bonds scarcer and more valuable, say people familiar with the matter.

The Securities and Exchange Commission is investigating whether UBS AG was involved in improper manipulation of Treasury-securities prices. Separately, a Credit Suisse Group bond trader recently left the firm amid regulatory scrutiny of the market. No regulator has alleged wrongdoing by any individual or at any specific bank.

Regulators are focusing on a large and somewhat obscure corner of the market where investment banks, hedge funds, mutual funds and other investors use bonds as collateral for short-term cash loans. It is called the repurchase-agreement, or "repo," market. Wall Street uses the repo market to borrow large sums of cash quickly, and the Federal Reserve uses the market to help manage short-term interest rates.

People familiar with the government's investigation say some firms might be intentionally restraining supply in the repo market by borrowing scarce bonds and then entering deals that park a large proportion of those bonds with custodian banks, keeping them from being lent out to other traders. By constraining supply this way, traders can make their holdings -- or the holdings of clients -- more profitable.

The deals, known as triparty repurchase agreements, are part of normal trading activity, but regulators are concerned they are being abused.

The custodian banks in these cases -- banks like J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and Bank of New York Co. -- act as intermediaries, managing the use of the bonds as collateral and ensuring funds are transferred and interest is paid on the loans.

Triparty repos are widely used and generally make it more efficient to finance transactions. But these arrangements "also allow firms to park scarce securities in a collateral pool without losing control of them," says Lou Crandall, chief economist at Wrightson ICAP.

DOJ_NMG_0089318

A firm that has control over the supply of a Treasury issue in high demand can profit by lending some of the bonds to other market participants and pay an interest rate on the cash it borrows that is well below the market rate.

A UBS spokesman declined to comment on the firm's trading strategy. A Credit Suisse spokesman declined to comment.

James Clouse, a Treasury Department official who in September publicly warned dealers about market manipulation, also discussed the use of triparty repos as a way for firms to control the supply of bonds.

"This strategy can be an exercise in monopoly pricing," Mr. Clouse said in the September speech.

Bond Prices Rise

Treasury prices rose, as weaker-than-expected economic data inspired investors, and the market benefited from month-end buying.

Prices climbed after the Conference Board reported a drop in consumer confidence levels for October. A decline in the Chicago Purchasing Management's regional business activity index last month also helped to push prices up.

At 4 p.m., the benchmark 10-year note was up 16/32 point, or $5 per $1,000 face value, at 102 2/32. Its yield fell to 4.610% from 4.671% Monday, as yields move inversely to prices. The 30-year bond rose 31/32 point to 96 16/32 to yield 4.721%/

Yesterday's data, coupled with last week's soft gross-domestic-product figure, left investors with a "sense the economy is going to be slower in the fourth quarter than expected," said Scott Gewirtz, head of Treasury trading at Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. in New York. "That's helping to move the market higher," he said.

The market also was pushed by money managers buying bonds to rebalance portfolios at month end, said Michael Cheah, vice president and portfolio manager at AIG SunAmerica Asset Management in Jersey City, N.J.

McAfee Ex-Official Settles Case By A WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A former McAfee Inc. treasurer agreed to pay $758,000 and accept a five-year ban on serving as an officer of a public company to settle civil charges that he aided the computer-security company's multimillion-dollar fraud from mid-1999 until he left the company in July 2000, the Securities and Exchange Commission said.

Eric Borrmann, who served in various senior positions including treasurer, settled without admitting or denying wrongdoing.

Mr. Borrmann was accused of assisting McAfee's executives and senior managers in preparing and distributing false and misleading information about the company's financial results. He also was accused of making $314,517 in illegal profits by trading on inside information about McAfee's fraud.

Earlier this year, McAfee, based in Santa Clara, Calif., agreed to pay a $50 million civil penalty to settle charges that it engaged in a fraudulent scheme that overstated cumulative net revenue by $622 million from 1998 through 2000.

An attorney for Mr. Borrmann couldn't be reached to comment.

Mr. Borrmann must return the money that he illegally earned and pay $128,529 in interest. In addition, he will pay a $314,517 civil penalty.

Power To The People By JAMES DOW And PAOLO VOLPIN (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 1, 2006

Executive compensation scandals are back, in Europe as well as in the U.S. Just think of the news during the last couple of weeks. There were stories about the backdating of executive stock options, a court ruling ordering former New York Stock Exchange boss Dick Grasso to repay tens of millions of dollars in retirement pay, the retrial of members of Mannesmann's supervisory board, the controversial BHP Billiton's bonus awards, and a 30% pay increase for Siemens CEO Klaus Kleinfeld at the same time that 3,000 of his employees lost their jobs. Whew!

Economists have traditionally taken a benign view of stock options and generous executive compensation. Basic economic theory suggests that they align management interests with shareholders'. If managers were simply paid moderate, flat salaries, why would they ever allow takeovers by a predator who might fire them, or implement painful but necessary restructurings, or take on the risks of major new investment projects?

But the excesses of the last few years have fueled the resurgence of the contrarian view: that high incentive pay can actually exacerbate conflicts between shareholder value and CEO interests. While executive pay is supposed to be awarded by shareholders to their managers in order to improve incentives, the reality is that managers often control their own pay awards. Thus, a culture of high pay may be a signal of expropriation rather than a tool for value creation.

So is incentives-based pay a symptom or a cure for corporate governance ailments?

Let's look at some of the recent controversies. Since options backdating was unearthed last year, over 30 U.S. CEOs and board members have lost their jobs. Last Friday a court in Germany began the retrial of six former Mannesmann board members accused of giving themselves €57 million in bonuses for facilitating the 2000 takeover by Britain's Vodafone. Noel Forgeard was forced out as Airbus CEO after exercising options in March, shortly before news of delays to the company's most important project sent the share price crashing down. The Association of British Insurers (who represent approximately 20% of shareholders in all U.K. companies) has recently put out an alert after BHP Billiton awarded bonuses in excess of its stated policy without first consulting shareholders.

Some of these events suggest the possibility of serious corporate governance abuses, such as options backdating in the U.S. For a CEO to cash in options while in possession of negative inside information would also be a serious abuse, which is why the Airbus case attracted so much attention despite explicit denials from management. But in other cases, while management received a large amount of money, this may have induced an outcome that is favorable to shareholders. The Mannesmann takeover created value for its shareholders. The corporate governance problem at BHP Billiton was one of process rather than outcome: Shareholders were not particularly opposed to the compensation package in itself, but the fact that it violated the company's declared guidelines.

What is the right balance between encouraging effort and preventing top management from simply helping themselves to corporate resources?

Different countries have adopted various responses to this question, combining three main elements: better disclosure of information on executive compensation, more power for shareholders to participate in compensation decisions, and stricter ex-post enforcement via regulation and legal sanctions.

Most countries now require listed companies to disclose much more information than in the past. While continental Europe has traditionally tolerated opaque reporting, complete disclosure of individual board members' compensation, including stock options, has been mandatory in Italy since 1999, in France since 2001, and in Germany since 2006.

Traditionally, U.K. shareholders have enjoyed more power over their companies than have shareholders in other countries. For instance, they cast a nonbinding vote on the report of the compensation committee. Boards promote shareholder interests by maintaining independence from management. The CEO normally cannot also serve as chairman. Boards should have a majority of independent directors. The compensation committee must comprise exclusively independent directors, and directors who have served more than 10 years on the board are no longer considered to be independent. Similar measures have now been introduced by the main U.S. stock exchanges and Continental Europe, although they both lag behind the U.K.

Ex-post enforcement takes two forms. Securities regulators can initiate proceedings including criminal prosecutions, or shareholders can take private action. The U.S. system relies heavily on both forms of enforcement. In Enron and other high-profile cases, top executives have received heavy jail sentences which would be out of the question in most other countries. Also, the class-action system in the U.S. facilitates civil suits on behalf of shareholders. Although most countries have given increased power to securities regulators, and some such as Germany have also tried to facilitate shareholder lawsuits, none compares to the U.S. in terms of severity of punishments.

Disclosure, shareholder empowerment and ex-post enforcement are all ways of improving corporate governance. Which one is best? Disclosure not only helps but clearly is necessary: "Sunshine is the best disinfectant," as Louis Brandeis wrote. But disclosure alone cannot solve the big problems in corporate governance.

We have no doubt that shareholder empowerment is the way forward. We would like to see more mechanisms for shareholders to voice their claims as owners, such as more democratic board elections, since potential board members too often run unopposed; a more open takeover market, since incumbent managers too often can rely on various means of fending off hostile takeovers; or better representation for minority shareholders, since larger shareholders too often can abuse their power against the interests of others.

We disagree with the view that aggressive enforcement is the key to improved corporate governance. We'd certainly like to see blatant transgressors punished, but available evidence shows that relying on enforcement by securities regulators does not suffice. If there is one lesson to be learned from the options backdating scandal, it is that even the most devious lawmaker could never anticipate and prohibit all the devices that managers might conceive to abuse their shareholders.

Intuit Emerges Unscathed From Government Stock Option Investigation (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

(AP) - MOUNTAIN VIEW, California-Intuit Inc. said the Securities and Exchange Commission has closed its investigation into the software maker's stock option accounting practices without taking any punitive action.

The conclusion removes Mountain View-based Intuit from a long list of companies under SEC scrutiny as regulators examine whether employee stock options had been manipulated in a way that inflates profits and decreases tax bills. The SEC began its Intuit inquiry in June.

Most of the problems to surface so far have revolved around "backdating." Under this practice, insiders try to make the rewards more lucrative by retroactively pinning the option's exercise price to a low point in the stock's value. Backdating can distort a company's books if the activity isn't properly recorded.

Intuit, which makes the popular TurboTax and Quicken programs, had previously disclosed that it did not need to restate its past profits because an internal investigation found no evidence of stock options misconduct.

The U.S. Attorney's office subpoenaed Intuit for information pertaining to its stock options around the same time the SEC began its investigation. Intuit said the U.S. Attorney's office hasn't sought additional information since the company passed along the findings of its internal inquiry.

Intuit shares rose 64 cents Monday to close at $35.07 on the Nasdaq Stock Market, then added 15 cents in extended trading.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Florida Searches For Root Of Surge In Violent Crime (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, November 1, 2006

ORLANDO — It was another day of brilliant sunshine and big crowds last Thursday at Walt Disney World and Universal Studios.

A few hours earlier, however, and a few miles away from the resorts that draw millions of visitors each year, a grim milestone had been reached: Orange County, excluding Orlando, recorded its 50th homicide of the year, topping last year's record of 49.

Orlando itself also is reporting homicides at an unprecedented pace: 42 so far this year, nearly double the 22 slayings last year in the city of 200,000.

The escalating number of killings in the Orlando area has made it one of the most extreme examples of the increasing violent crime rates being reported in dozens of cities across the nation, according to a recent analysis by the Police Executive Research Forum, a police advocacy group.

The FBI, which issues an annual report on crime nationwide, has not released numbers for 2006. However, the police group's report led the Justice Department to launch a review of possible demographic and economic triggers for violence in cities from Philadelphia to Sacramento. Meanwhile, the FBI has directed more than 100 additional agents to help local authorities fight violent crime.

There are a range of theories on the reasons for the jump in violence nationwide, including escalating gang wars and turf fights among drug rings. The Police Executive Research Forum used its analysis to underscore its claim that the U.S.

government's focus on counterterrorism has undermined local authorities by directing federal money away from law enforcement.

In Florida, however, the violence seems to have roots that are more complex. Local authorities such as Ron Stucker, criminal investigations chief for the Orange County Sheriff's Department, say that although traditional gangs have a presence here, most of the homicides in this area appear to have stemmed from robberies or drug-related disputes that suddenly turned violent.

This month, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement reported that homicides statewide were up by 27% through the first six months of 2006, compared with the same period last year. Robberies were up about 11% from 2005, the department reported. Local officials gave similar reports:

•In Jacksonville, homicides were up 30% during the first nine months of 2006, compared with the same period last year.

•In West Palm Beach, homicides were up 50% in the first six months of this year, compared with the first half of 2005. Since then, Police Chief Delsa Bush says, murder has stabilized, but robberies have soared.

•In Miami, homicides and robberies rose during the first half of 2006. Homicides were up 15%; robberies were up 7%.

"I don't think there is a particular reason (for the violence) that can identified," Florida Gov. Jeb Bush said recently. "Yeah, I'm concerned when there is that level of violence. It's happening across the country."

Ask Stucker what's driving the surge in violence in the Orlando area, and he points to cases such as a slaying Oct. 25 outside a strip club and a brutal robbery hours earlier of a 78-year-old former sheriff's lieutenant.

Both, Stucker says, illustrate a new and increasingly deadly escalation of behavior in which offenders are quick to use lethal force. In the strip club case, an argument in the parking lot quickly became an exchange of punches and then a knife attack that killed a 24-year-old man.

Stucker and Sgt. Allen Lee, head of the Orange County Sheriff's Department's homicide division, say there was no evidence of a history of violence between the victim and an undisclosed number of suspects.

The same apparently was true of the robbery involving Paul Murphy. The retired sheriff's lieutenant was leaving a convenience store after buying a candy bar and a newspaper when he was beaten.

"It goes from zero to 100 mph and sometimes murder, just like that," Lee says. "You see minimal confrontations blow (up), and there is no hesitancy to kill."

Especially alarming, Lee says, is a rise in robbery-related homicides. At least 12 of the county's 50 killings this year have been linked to robberies, compared with three or four such incidents in recent years.

The random nature of the robbery-related murders makes it more difficult to identify and pursue suspects, he says, and has contributed to a decline in clearance rates — from near 70% in previous years to about 50% today.

"It's flabbergasting to see suspects sit across from you" during questioning, Lee says. "They talk like death is the cost of doing business, an acceptable loss."

Orlando and the University of Central Florida are reviewing homicides in the city over the past five years to try to pinpoint causes of violence. Orlando Police Chief Michael McCoy and police Sgt. Richard Ring, who directs the city's homicide unit, say researchers will analyze the connections between offenders and victims.

There is little evidence to suggest the violence is slowing the region's $28 billion-a-year resort industry, which attracted 50 million tourists to the area last year, according to the Orlando/Orange County Convention and Visitors Bureau.

The area's tourist attractions have not been immune to violent crime, however. Last Friday, one person was wounded in a shooting in a parking lot at the Universal Orlando resort.

Resort spokesman Tom Schroder says it was the first such incident in the resort's 16-year history.

Stucker says that for the most part, the local violence has been limited to the west and south sides of Orange County, about 15 minutes from the resort areas. Beyond those areas, Stucker says, he isn't sure whether most residents view the rising violence as a big concern.

"People should be concerned, because it will spill out," he says.

Crime Continues To Rise In Montgomery (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, November 1, 2006

Crime in Montgomery County increased by 7 percent during the year's second quarter, largely driven by a sharp rise in robberies, according to statistics released yesterday.

Robberies increased by almost 68 percent during the reporting period, which ran from April to June. Another significant rise was in auto theft, which increased by 22 percent.

Taking into account the 12 percent increase in the first quarter, the county experienced a nearly 10 percent increase in reported crime during the first six months of 2006, compared with the same period last year.

Police Chief J. Thomas Manger said the increase is part of a national trend. Across the country, violent crime is on the rise, partly driven by an increase in juvenile delinquency.

"I certainly react to it in a measured way," Manger said of the second quarter statistics. "My folks have a good handle on what the trends are, the locations where these things are happening. As best as we can, we're trying to buck this national trend."

Other jurisdictions in the area, including Fairfax and Prince William counties, also recorded more robberies in the second quarter. But Prince George's County, which generally has a higher crime rate than Montgomery, says reported robberies fell significantly.

Manger said he has added slots for robbery detectives and launched initiatives, including surveillance operations, in an effort to make a dent in the robbery rate.

He said Latinos in the county are being disproportionately targeted by robbers.

"There is a trend that Latino individuals are being targeted because the thought [among criminals] is that they don't keep money in the bank and they're going to have more money on them," Manger said.

The chief said groups of juveniles, some of whom belong to gangs, are responsible for a considerable number of robberies and other serious crimes. Montgomery police says crime committed by gang members in the county is on the rise.

The chief said victims could take steps to prevent many of the crimes that are driving the numbers up.

"In our burglaries and thefts, primarily, the victims in these cases are making it awfully easy for people to steal their stuff," Manger said. "They're leaving garage doors open, leaving car doors unlocked."

The number of reported homicides rose from three to six in the second quarter and from six to 10 in the first six months. The number of rapes decreased from 37 to 31 in the quarter and from 71 to 64 in the first six months.

Aggravated assaults decreased slightly during the second quarter. Burglaries and larcenies rose about 9 percent each. Less serious crimes -- such as minor assaults, forgery, embezzlement, prostitution and drug-related offenses -- increased by nearly 5 percent.

The number of reported arsons rose considerably during the quarter, from 15 in 2005 to 34 this year.

Attorneys: No Backstory In CIA Leak Case (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, November 1, 2006

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald and former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby agree on something: keeping Libby's perjury trial in the CIA leak case focused solely on his actions. The two are separately asking a federal judge not to allow three years of politically charged backstory in the case to seep into Libby's trial starting in January.

In new court documents, Fitzgerald argued that he shouldn't have to explain why Libby was charged while others, including the source of the leak, escaped prosecution. Libby said jurors shouldn't hear about New York Times reporter Judith Miller's 85-day jail term for refusing to discuss her conversations with him.

The court documents, filed late Monday, are an effort to keep the trial focused on whether Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, lied to investigators about his conversation with reporters regarding CIA officer Valerie Plame.

Libby's supporters have accused Fitzgerald of singling him out while not charging the source of the leak, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage. Fitzgerald wrote Monday that discussing that issue would be irrelevant.

DOJ_NMG_0089323

"If Mr. X was investigated for leaking classified information, the government's decision not to charge Mr. X should have nothing to do with the jury's role as the finder of fact in Libby's case," Fitzgerald wrote.
